In 1842, before the war between the United States and Mexico occurred, General Santa Anna, a brave, talented, and energetic soldier, who has, during his long and active political career, sometimes given a compelled assent to the federal principle, but who seems, nevertheless, to have been all the time a centralist at heart, had attained the provisional executive power. During his administration, Don José Garay, a citizen of Mexico, and a favorite of the Dictator—for all Dictators have their favorites, and I am sorry to say that Santa Anna is not the most pure of that class of magistrates—Don José Garay, and other members of his family, obtained from Santa Anna, besides the monopoly of opening the passage across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, four other monopolies—one, the exclusive right to navigate with steam the Rio Grande; a second, the exclusive right to navigate the river Panuco; a third, the exclusive right so to navigate the river Muscala or Zacatula; a fourth, the exclusive right of connecting Vera Cruz by railway with the city of Mexico; connected with a fifth, an averia or assessment upon the customs of the port of Vera Cruz. I am informed that the products of that averia have exceeded $1,000,000. With that vast sum of money a railroad has been made from Vera Cruz towards the capital of Mexico to the length of thirteen miles and no more, within a period of ten years.

It was on the 1st of March, 1842, that Don José Garay approached the Dictator with a precious offering of the incense of flattery. He reminded Santa Anna that he had caused the Mexican people to look to his administration as one of a new and gigantic advancement in the career of national aggrandizement. He suggested to him that the great project with which the world had been engaged for near three centuries, of opening an interoceanic communication across the continent, was yet to be undertaken, and declaring that the mind was bewildered with the difficulty of embracing in one comprehensive view the astonishing consequences that must follow so great an achievement, he concluded that a great revolution would take place in the commercial, and even in the political affairs of all nations when it should be effected; and that the epoch which should see it effected would be more memorable than that of the discovery of the continent, and the name of him under whose auspices it should be consummated, would be at least as glorious as that of Columbus. And then Don José Garay proposed, of course, that he should be authorized to undertake this grand work. The execution of the work was committed by Santa Anna to his favorite, with vast concessions of land and privileges, by a contract made under the decree of the date which I have mentioned. It is claimed by the Committee on Foreign Relations that that contract, after having passed through the hands of intermediate British assignees, has come now to be vested in the hands of American citizens, and that it is still in force; while the Mexican Government refuses to allow it to be executed by them. The assignees have appealed to this Government to put forth its power to enforce upon the Mexican Government the duty of carrying it into effect. The committee, in this view of the case, have submitted the resolutions which have been read.

My first remark upon these resolutions is, that the responsibility of adopting them is a very great one. They are somewhat vague in their language. But inasmuch as they pronounce that there shall be an end to pacific negotiations, except upon a condition which it is not expected Mexico will assent to, a review of existing relations in the event of her expected refusal, and finally that such measures shall be adopted as the dignity of the country and the interests of our citizens shall require, they look towards, although they do not distinctly point at, some measure of hostility, of reprisal, or of war. It seems to me that the Senate is not now in a proper condition to assume that responsibility. One third of this body will go out in less than thirty days from this time, and their places will be filled by those who are not now here. A resolution adopted when the Senate is changing, may convey advice which will not remain the opinion of the Senate through the next Congress. Again: the President of the United States is a coordinate power with the Senate in the conduct of foreign relations. He has the responsibility divided with us; and we are not now in a condition to have the benefit of his advice, and to give to the country the benefit of his share of the responsibility which is to be assumed; for the present President will go out in less than thirty days, and within that time a new one will come in, whose opinions are quite unknown.

It would be discourteous to the incoming Chief Magistrate, under such circumstances, to conclude ourselves by an action like this. This discourtesy by itself would be a matter of small moment; but in all national transactions, discourtesy between coördinate branches of the Government is liable to result in permanent differences of opinion, in controversies; and by such controversies in this case, we should embarrass the incoming Administration. It is quite apparent that the probability of adopting any right and effective measure would be diminished by a disagreement between the President and the Senate. These objections would seem to me to be conclusive for the postponement of these questions, unless those who press their consideration now can guarantee that the course which hey recommend will receive the approbation of the incoming President. If they are able to give is such a guarantee, and will produce the evidence of it, this objection will be removed.

But, Mr. President, if it be the pleasure of the Senate to proceed in the consideration of these questions, then I have to examine their merits as briefly as I can. In the first place, I ask the Senate to take notice that all these resolutions assume —but I admit not without a fair show of argument —first, that the American assignees of Don José Garay have a complete, perfect, and absolute title to the right to open a communication across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec; and secondly, that Mexico unreasonably and unjustly refuses to permit them to do so according to the terms of the grant which they exhibit.

My first answer to these assumptions is, that the contract under which this title is claimed, and upon which it is founded, expired by its own limitation eighteen months after the grant was made. The Senate will please take notice that this grant was made by General Santa Anna on the first day of March, 1842; that the surveys were to be made by Garay within eighteen months; and that the work was to be actually commenced within twenty-eight months, which would expire on the first day of September, 1844. So the period of limitation has arrived and passed, it being admitted on all hands that that limitation was the condition of the grant. The contract then is void, unless it has been shown by the Committee on Foreign Relations that it has been since renewed or extended. The committee say it has been extended; and they produce a decree of General Santa Anna of the 28th December, 1843, by which it was extended to the first of July, 1845. Well, the extension is at an end, for that day also has passed. So the contract has then ceased, unless it has been still further extended. The committee say that it has been further extended by a decree of Salas, the Provisional President of Mexico, dated fifth November, 1846, by which the time for commencing the work was prolonged to the fifth November, 1848, within which time the committee say the title vested in the American assignees, and the work was actually commenced. Now, it will be seen, in the first place, that the commencement of the work before the fifth of November, 1848, was indispensable to the continuance of the contract, even on the assumption of the committee. The committee say that the work was begun within that time. I have not been able to find proof that it was begun in the papers which have been sent to us by the President. Indeed I think it quite clear, from all the papers submitted to us, that even the preliminary surveys which were to be made within a period of eighteen months from the date of the grant, were never actually made; but however this may be, on the 22d of May, 1851, near three years after the decree of Salas prolonging the contract, the Constitutional Congress of Mexico enacted a decree in these words:

"The decree of November 5, 1846, [the decree of extension by Salas,] is declared null and void, because the powers with which the Provisional Government of that period was invested were insufficient to authorize it. Accordingly the Government will see that this declaration is rendered in every respect effective in regard to the privilege granted to Don José de Garay."

Here, then, is a grant made on the 1st day of March, 1842, by the Provisional President of Mexico, and here is a law of the Congress of Mexico, passed on the 22d of May, 1851, abrogating the grant. The grant, then, has been abrogated and is void, unless the contrary can be shown. The Committee on Foreign Relations have undertaken to show the contrary; and they took three positions. First, that the Congress of Mexico had no power to repeal the decree of Salas. Second, that Salas was the Government de facto of Mexico, and that his acts, as such, bound that nation, especially when an interest had become vested in a foreigner. The third is, that Mexico has, since the decree of Salas, recognized the existence and the validity of the grant, notwithstanding the Congressional decree of repeal. I shall briefly notice these replies in their order. The first position of the committee is, that the Congress of Mexico had no power to repeal the decree of Salas. By the Constitution of Mexico, the Federal Constitution of 1824, if in force at the time, not only had Congress power to repeal the grant, but no power but Congress had authority to make any such grant. I refer the Senate to the fifth section of the Constitution of Mexico, which Constitution is here:

"SEC. 5., art. 47. Every resolution of Congress shall have the character of a law or decree."

"Art. 49. The laws and decrees shall be for supporting the National independence; the union of the States, and peace and order; to maintain the independence of the States; to secure an equal proportionment in the assessment of taxes.

"Art. 50. The exclusive powers of Congress shall be the following:" * * * * * * *

"Part 2d. To augment the general prosperity, by decreeing the opening of roads and canals, and their improvement, without preventing the States from opening or improving their own; establishing posts and mails; and securing for a limited time to inventors, improvers, or those who introduce any branch of industry, exclusive rights to their respective inventions, improvements, or introductions."

This is the Constitution of Mexico, and the Executive power to make such a grant upon the Isthmus of Tehuantepec was reposed in Congress, and was never in the President, according to that Constitution. But what is more, the power of Congress was limited. Congress, while it had an exclusive power to make canals and railroads without interfering with the States, had no power to open the Isthmus so as to interfere with the rights of the States of Vera Cruz and Oaxaca which occupied it. The provisional President, Santa Anna, who had come into power in an interregnum of the Constitution of 1824, under certain conventions called the conventions of Estanzuela, and certain bases, called the bases of Tacubaya, modified and adopted by those conventions, had in 1842 given to his favorite a grant, which, for want of compliance by the grantee with its conditions, had expired and was void.

In 1846, the Government established by Paredes, and administered by Bravo, was in power. A revolutionary movement, distinguished as the Revolution of the Citadel, deposed Bravo and recalled Santa Anna, then in exile, and ad interim advanced Salas, a brigadier general, to the Supreme Executive power. He came into that office on the fourth of August, 1846, and limited his own powers by the terms of the plan of the Citadel, and proclaimed the reëstablishment of the Constitution of 1824. Here is the decree of Salas, which I have translated and copied from the book of the decrees of the Mexican Republic, which lies before me:

"Ministry of Foreign Relations of Government and Police.

"His Excellency the Señor General in Chief in the exercise of the supreme Executive power, has directed to me the following decree:

"José Mariano de Salas, General of Brigade and Chief of the Liberating Republican Army, in the exercise of the Supreme Executive power, to all whom these presents may come: Know ye, that in consideration of the state in which the Republic is now found, he has been moved to decree the following:

"Art. 1. Until the new Constitution is published, that of 1824 shall govern in all that is not in conflict with the execution of the plan proclaimed in the citadel of this capital on the 4th of the present month, and that the present state of affairs of the Republic will permit."

Thus Salas was in power, acknowledging the Constitution of 1824, and self-bound to support it, when, on the 5th of November, 1846, he made a decree, extending an already expired grant, which was equivalent to making the grant itself, which grant was in direct conflict with the Constitution. He exercised no absolute power, but a qualified dictatorial power, which was limited by the Constitution and by the bases of what was called the Act of the Citadel.

We have, then, the decree of Salas, Provisional President, extending this contract for two years; and we have, in the first place, the Constitution of Mexico declaring it void. Here is one ground upon which the Constitutional Congress, on the 22d of May, 1851, abrogated the decree of Salas.

It is now necessary to go back in the history, to bring into review another ground. Santa Anna, in 1842, was President under the bases of Tacubaya, and the conventions of Estanzuela. By the sixth basis of Tacubaya, all the decrees to be made by the President were directed to be submitted to the first Congress, (a central Constitutional Congress,) that they might be approved or rescinded. The grant to Garay was made of course subject to that basis. So also was the other extension which was made previously to the one granted by Salas, in his decree of the 5th of November, 1846. Santa Anna never submitted the decree of March 1st, 1842, (by which the original grant was made,) to Congress, and so that grant was held for that reason to be void by the Congress, which abrogated it on the 22d of May, 1851.

It will be said that Santa Anna had abrogated that sixth basis of Tacubaya. The facts are, that on the 3d of October, 1843, Santa Anna issued a decree to the effect that the responsibility of the acts of the Provisional Executive to Congress, created by the bases of Tacubaya, and the conventions of Estanzuela, was merely a responsibility of opinion, that none of his acts could be annulled—and that the contracts entered into by the Provisional Executive were inviolate.

It will be seen that even this decree recognizes the bases of Tacubaya, because it treats of the responsibility of the Executive, which was established by the bases of Tacubaya. Then this decree of Santa Anna was not a subversion of the Central Constitution and sixth basis of Tacubaya, but only a palpable perversion of them, for the purpose of increasing his own administrative power. Did that stand? Was that left the law of Mexico? No. On the first day of April, 1845, the first central constitutional Congress of Mexico was in session; and this decree of Santa Anna, absolving the Executive from responsibility to Congress, came under review, and they on that day adopted an act revising and abrogating this decree of Santa Anna, and declared that his responsibility was a direct one; that no act of the Executive was valid unless it was submitted to Congress; and that no act was valid that was submitted to them and rejected, or not approved by them. So, then, the central Constitution was in force on the first of April, 1845, and the Executive power was limited to the making of contracts, subject to approval by Congress; and the original grant to Garay was, by virtue of the bases of Tacubaya and this Constitution, rendered void, by reason that it was not submitted to Congress and approved by them.

I am aware that this examination has led us through a tempestuous season, in which civil government was often overborne in that unhappy fraternal Republic. But I have shown, that during the time of the extension of this grant by Salas, the legislative power was in force, and that in that respect the Constitution was in absolute effect. I ask the Senate now to consider two propositions. First, that every citizen and every foreigner knew, or ought to have known, of the limitations of this grant when taking an assignment of it, and that he knew he took it at whatever hazards attached to it by virtue of the Constitution and the reserved power of Congress; and the second, that the constitutional Government of the United States, and especially the Senate of the United States, is bound to make, and will make, every fair and just and liberal intendment in favor of the wounded constitution of a people, who have struggled with so much fidelity, and so much energy, through seasons of anarchy at home and of aggression by a foreign Power, to preserve a Constitution modeled and copied after our own. It is not here that I expect to see intendments prevail in favor of dictators and usurpers even in Mexico.

The honorable and distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. MASON] has already furnished his replies to this argument. First, he says that the Constitution of 1824 contained a provision that the Congress should have no power to pass an ex post facto law, and that Congress should have no power to pass a law impairing the obligations of contracts. I rejoin: A law of Congress refusing consent, which it was stipulated that Congress might give or refuse, is not an ex post facto law. A contract which by its terms is not valid if Congress shall disapprove, is not impaired by the decree of Congress refusing to approve it. Secondly, the chairman replies that Salas, nevertheless, was the Government de facto of Mexico, and that his acts bound the Republic of Mexico, especially where foreigners had obtained an interest. I rejoin, with great respect, that Salas was not an absolute President, nor even a President at all; but he was de facto the head of the Government, subject to the Constitution of 1824. He obtained power, I confess, irregularly; but he exercised it under the Constitution, and was thus a limited and constitutional Executive.

But the Committee on Foreign Relations make a still further reply, which is, that the Mexican Government has, since the 6th of November, 1846, the date of Salas's decree, recognized the existence of this grant, and the validity of its assignment to the American claimants. I shall examine with great deference the evidence which they give of this recognition. The committee rest their assumption, first, upon the fact that in 1846 and 1847, the assignment of the grant to Manning & Mackintosh was duly notified to the Government of Mexico, and on their complaint President Herrera issued orders to the governors of Oaxaca and Vera Cruz to prevent the cutting of mahogany on the granted lands by any others than those acting under their authority. I rejoin: The notice given by Manning & Mackintosh to the Government of Mexico, and relied upon by the Committee on Foreign Relations, is not produced. It is not here. No assignment has been produced except that made on the 26th of July, 1847, which was an assignment by Garay to the British proprietors, Manning & Mackintosh, and Snyder & Co., and which notice was given to the Mexican Government after the decree of Salas, and was an assignment expressly limited to the lands ceded by the grant of Santa Anna, and it excluded the privilege of opening the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. I rejoin, secondly: The assignment was made under the conditions annexed to the grant of Salas; and the assignees took the benefit of the acceptance of the notice with an express acknowledgment that the right to open the Isthmus of Tehuantepec remained in Garay, and had not been at all ceded to the assignees; and consequently, whoever held it after that period held it subject to the condition prescribed in the decree of Salas—that foreigners taking the benefit of the assignment, should be denationalized.

But what was the effect of these orders of Herrera, the President of Mexico, to the Governors of Oaxaca and Vera Cruz? They were orders to prevent depredations and trespasses on those lands by anybody except those who claimed to have obtained them under the grant ceding the lands to Garay; but it appears that the Government of Mexico at that time understood that those claimants did not claim the right to open the Isthmus, and only asked protection for the enjoyment of their lands. That protection and enjoyment of their lands has never been denied by Mexico. But even if this were not conclusive, there is another point. If the President of Mexico could not make such a grant, he had no power to make an admission, the effect of which would be to establish the grant. If the President of the United States should admit that half the State of Maine, or any part of it belonged to Great Britain, that admission would not affect the boundary line of Maine in the least.

The committee rest their assumption, secondly, upon the fact that—

"In 1847, whilst the treaty of peace was under negotiation, Mr. Trist, the Commissioner on the part of the United States, by instruction from his Government, proposed a large money consideration to Mexico for a right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and was answered 'that Mexico could not treat on this subject, because she 'had, several years before, made a grant to one of her own 'citizens, who had transferred his right, by authorization of 'the Mexican Government, to English subjects, of whose 'rights Mexico could not dispose.'"

On this point the Mexican Government explains, that the grant to which their Commissioner alluded in making this reply was the grant of Garay, and the assignment to Manning, Mackintosh & Snyder, of which the Mexican Government then had notice; which assignment, as I have before shown, was an assignment of the lands conceded with the right, and not of the right to open the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, which last-mentioned right, according to the notice which had been served upon them, expressly remained in Garay. This is a sufficient answer until the committee can show that the Mexican Government knew that some other assignment had before that time been made conveying the privilege, and that notice of that assignment had been received by the Mexican Government. But suppose the Mexican Commissioner did make a statement which was unintentionally, or even intentionally erroneous in point of fact, would that statement divest Mexico of her right? The law of estoppel which prevails between individuals in conducting their own affairs has never been, and never can be, applied to the intercourse between nations who are passive, and whose communications with each other are always carried on by agents possessing such measure of capacity and of virtue as they may happen to obtain.

The committee rest their assumption, thirdly, upon the facts as stated by them, that—

"After the assignment of the grant to the present American holders, the Minister of the United States in Mexico was instructed by his Government to apprise that of Mexico of the desire of this company to commence their work by a thorough survey of the Isthmus; and the Minister was further instructed to make overtures for a treaty securing to the enterprise the joint protection of the two Governments. The Mexican Government, as we learn from the correspondence of Mr. Letcher with the Mexican Minister of Foreign Relations, 'made not the slightest opposition in 'forwarding passports, and issued orders to the departments 'of Oaxaca and Vera Cruz, not only to avoid interposing 'any obstacles in their way, but, on the contrary, to afford 'them aid and hospitality.' 'The engineers,' Mr. Letcher adds, 'were accordingly sent, the ports thrown open for 'their supplies, and more than $100,000 have been expended 'in surveys, opening roads, &c., besides a large sum of 'money in furnishing materials,'" &c.

Will the Senate look into these papers? They will find that although we have the letter of John M. Clayton, Secretary of State, of the date of February 20th, 1850, to Mr. Letcher, our Minister in Mexico, informing him that Mr. Hargous had notified the Department that he was the representative of the claim in this country, and had employed engineers whom he wished to send to Mexico for the purpose of making surveys, and requesting Mr. Clayton to give such instructions, yet we have not the letter written by Mr. Letcher to the Mexican Government asking for the passports and instructions; and so we have no evidence whatever of what communication was made, and upon what communication by Mr. Letcher to the Mexican Government it was that the passports and the orders to the Governors of Oaxaca and Vera Cruz were given. Without this knowledge, unless the passports which were obtained, and the orders which were issued, recognized the validity of the grant, the transaction implied no recognition of a right. I will not trespass upon the Senate by reading these Spanish passports. They are like all other passports, mere printed circular letters of protection, given by a Mexican consul at New Orleans to foreigners traveling into Mexico. They are such as any American citizen, whether engineer, or any other belonging to New Orleans or to New York, obtains from his own Government whenever he sees fit to go abroad.

Here is the letter of the Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Letcher, which accompanied a copy of the orders issued to the Governors:

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
MEXICO, April 5, 1850.

ESTEEMED SIR: I have the honor to inclose to you a copy of the order of this day, directed to his Excellency the Governor of Oaxaca, for the object which it expresses; another copy of the same will be sent to the commandant general of the said State.

I hasten to give information of the same; repeating myself your attentive servant, who kisses your hand,

J. M. LACUNZA.

His Excellency R. P. LETCHER, &c., &c.

And here are the orders themselves:

Mr. Lacunza to the Governor of Oaxaca.

MEXICO, April 5, 1850.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Several American engineers having been appointed for the purpose of examining the possibility of opening the communication between the two seas, by way of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec; and desirous as is his Excellency the President, during their travels in your State, that they should meet with no embarrassments, but on the contrary, be treated with all hospitality, he has been pleased to direct that his wishes should be communicated to you, as I now have the honor to do, officially; repeating, at the same time, the assurances of my esteem.

God and liberty!

LACUNZA.

His Excellency the GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF OAXACA.

There is nothing in the letter, nor in the orders, which recognizes the validity of the Garay grant, or of any title of any assignees under it. It is utterly preposterous to ground upon this act of courtesy and hospitality by the Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs, a recognition of the validity of the grant to Garay, or the assignments to those who claim under him.

The committee rest their assumption, fourthly, upon the facts stated by them, as follows:

"This is not all: the Government of Mexico at once assented to enter into negotiations for the proposed treaty; and a convention for the joint protection of the work thus to be executed by American citizens, as assignees of the Garay grant, was concluded at Mexico, in June, 1850, and sent to the United States. To this convention certain modifications being suggested by the Secretary of State, at Washington, it was returned to our Minister in Mexico, and the whole terminated by a new convention, signed at Mexico, on the 25th of January, 1851, with the approval of President Herrera. This last convention was ratified by the Senate of the United States, and returned to Mexico, and finally rejected by the Mexican Congress, in April, 1852."

The committee do not mean to be understood—it would be discourtesy to them, it would be unfair to suppose they meant to be understood—that the facts that the President of Mexico signed one treaty, which was sent to the United States and rejected by them, and then signed another and sent it to the United States, and it was accepted by them and returned to Mexico and rejected by the Mexican Congress, which had power to reject it, constituted a recognition of any fact recited in either of those incomplete treaties. That would be to draw the recognition of the validity of a claim from an attempt to negotiate a settlement of it. All pretense that Mexico has in any way compromised herself by this negotiation will disappear from the case when I shall show the history of them. The first treaty was made during the time of that good, just, and true old man, Zachary Taylor, and in the time of the administration of the State Department by that distinguished and accomplished diplomatist and just negotiator, John M. Clayton. Here is the first article of the first draft of the treaty which was sent to Mexico:

"ARTICLE 1. Individuals upon whom the Mexican Government may have bestowed or may bestow the privilege of constructing a road, railroad, or canal across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and those employed by them, shall be protected in their rights of person and property from the inception to the completion of the work."

Not only is there no recognition of the American assignees of the Garay grant, and no recognition of that grant itself in this article, but there is a careful exclusion of any such statement.

Here is the fifth article of that treaty of Mr. Clayton's:

"ART. 5. In any difference which may arise between the undertakers, either the present or the future, of the work, which may involve the loss of the right to the privilege, the complaining party shall draw up a statement of its pretensions and motives, and a similar statement shall be drawn up by the other party, and both statements shall be submitted to two arbiters who hold no diplomatic appointment or commission, and who reside in the Mexican territory. One of these arbiters shall be appointed by the holders of the privilege and the other by the Government of Mexico; and these two, in case of disagreement, shall appoint a third, with the qualifications above required, and from the decision of these arbiters there shall be no appeal or recourse whatsoever. Of all other questions which may arise the Mexican tribunals shall take cognizance."

But then came into power the successors of General Taylor and Mr. Clayton; and then also reappeared Mr. Peter A. Hargous, a merchant, claiming to be the representative of this grant; and then it began to appear that there was a speculation behind this great enterprise, more important to the Government of the United States, and more objectionable to the Government of Mexico, than the enterprise itself. Here is precious evidence of it: On the 26th day of August, 1850, Peter A. Hargous wrote a letter to the Secretary of State, in which, after reviewing the treaty of Mr. Clayton, which had then been remitted by Mexico duly signed by the Ministers of the two Governments, he said, (referring to Mr. Letcher:)

"I trust, therefore, that you will pardon me for suggesting that it might be advisable, that he should be officially informed of the movements above adverted to, and instructed to lose no time which can be saved, in bringing his negotiation to a speedy and satisfactory close."

Mr. Webster complied with this request of Mr. Hargous, and made a new draft of a convention, carefully recognizing the Garay grant. Here is the first article of it:

"Art. 1. The person to whom the Government of Mexico may have granted, or may in future grant the privileges for constructing a road, railroad, or canal, across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, pursuant to the decrees of that Government of the 1st of March, 1842, 9th of February, 4th of October, and 29th of December, 1843, and 5th of November, 1846; all those employed in the works of construction, and all others who may reside on the territory within the limits defined by the grant according to the terms of the grant itself, shall be protected in their persons and property from the commencement of the work until its completion, and during the period for which the privileges are granted."

The decrees here recited are those which conveyed the grant to Garay. So Mr. Webster rejected the treaty drawn by Mr. Clayton, sent to Mexico and accepted there, which did not recognize the Garay grant, and sent back a treaty which did, in express words, recognize it, and he instructed Mr. Letcher to try to get this treaty adopted by Mexico. On the 22d of October, 1850, Mr. Letcher reported his ill-success in these words:

"I submitted to the notice of the Minister of Foreign Relations the several alterations you desired to make to the Tehuantepec treaty, expressing at the same time the confident hope that his Excellency would find no difficulty in readily yielding his assent to each and all of them. In reply to this observation he remarked, his Government had been most severely and shamefully censured for agreeing to the treaty as it now stands; that he was sorry to say it was quite unpopular in his country; that he himself had been denounced as a vile traitor for the part he had taken in it; still he was resolutely determined, he said, fearless of all consequences, to do any and everything he could to carry out in good faith, a measure of so much importance to the two Republics."

"A further discussion of an hour ensued. He adhered most obstinately and fiercely to his objections. Whereupon I took the liberty to tell him, in very plain language, I was not at all satisfied with his opinions, or with his reasons; and therefore requested to be heard before the President and his Cabinet upon the points in dispute."

Sir, I should like to see what answer the minister of any Power on earth would receive who should come to the Secretary of State of this nation, and tell him that he was not at all satisfied with his reasons, and his opinions, and demand a hearing before the President and Cabinet! What is just and right for one Power, is just and right for another. If we exact justice or courtesy from the strong, we should concede it to the weak. Mr. Letcher obtained his hearing before the President, as will be seen from his report in these words:

"To this he cheerfully agreed; and the next day at 11 o'clock was the time fixed upon for this meeting by the permission of the President. At the appointed moment, I found the President and his Cabinet all in attendance. They gave me a cordial reception, and the most attentive and respectful hearing imaginable, for an hour and a half; and upon taking leave, I was assured, in the kindest manner, I should have everything I desired that they could possibly give me."

* * * * * * * *

"The chief arguments urged against the amendments in question appear to be these:

"1. That they infringe upon the sovereignty, the honor, the dignity, and national pride of Mexico.

"2. To adopt them would be at once to paralyze, to disgrace, and in short to overthrow the present administration.

"3. That a treaty with such provisions would be rejected by the Mexican Congress (probably) without a single dissenting voice, and therefore would be of no use to the United States, whilst at the same time it would be the ruin of the party in power."

Mr. Letcher then appears to have tried what virtue there was in threats. Here they are:

"Since the final decision was had, the President and every member of his Cabinet, have manifested the deepest concern lest you should be displeased at the result. General Arista, who is the master-spirit of the Government, is exceedingly uneasy. Every day or two a message is sent by some of the members of the Cabinet expressing regrets and hoping I am not dissatisfied. The only answer I have made is, Mexico has committed a great error.

"It may also be proper to add, during the various discussions which took place in relation to the points in dispute, I availed myself of a suitable occasion to say, in the event Mexico refused to enter into a fair treaty for the protection of the enterprise, my Government, in justice to her own citizens, who had made large investments in the undertaking, was determined to take the affair into her own hands."

Now, let us hear the answer of this exotic and wind-shaken branch of the ancient and chivalrous family, which, on its native peninsula, once gave laws to both hemispheres. Here it is; and it will remain imperishable as the answer of an oppressed, but high-minded, and generous people:

"Your Government is strong; ours is weak. You have the power to take the whole or any portion of our territory you may think fit; we have not the faculty to resist. We have done all we could do to satisfy your country, and to gratify you personally. We can do no more." * * *

"What is required of us we cannot grant. If Mr. Webster knew our exact condition, if he knew the precarious tenure by which we hold power, the violence and strength of the opposition, the refractory spirit of the States, and the peculiar prejudices of our people, surely he would not exact such terms."

But Mr. Webster did exact. Castilian pride gave way. Arista and his ministers succumbed, and the Tehuantepec treaty, with its odious recitals, was signed. And now for the result. Hear the report of the Minister, Mr. Letcher:

"Legation of the United States of America,
Mexico, April 8, 1851.

"Sir: The Tehuantepec treaty, I regret to say, was rejected last night by the Chamber of Deputies, a bare quorum being present, in a few minutes after it was submitted by the Government for consideration, by a vote of seventy-one to one. The result, so far from being a matter of surprise to me or to any one else in this country, was most confidently anticipated. The few Deputies who were favorably disposed towards the measure, knowing perfectly well that they would be instantly denounced as traitors to their country in case they voted for it, deemed it expedient to absent themselves from the Chamber when the vote was taken.

"Such was the intemperate and uncompromising hostility to the Garay grant, that no Mexican in or out of the Chamber, not even those who held a direct interest in it, dared to whisper a single word in its support. In fact, the Deputy who voted for the ratification declared his judgment was opposed to it in every particular, but fearing its rejection might occasion another war between the two countries, he felt compelled to vote for it.

"It is altogether impossible to make a treaty having the least connection with the Garay grant."

That is Mr. Letcher's report. And now I ask my honorable friend from Virginia where it is in these negotiations that he finds that Mexico recognized the validity of the Garay grant?

I have no hostility to the Garay grant, or to its assignees, or to their enterprise. I therefore shall hold my own mind in reserve to form a favorable judgment upon them in future, instead of endeavoring to bring other Senators to the conclusion that the grant is invalid, or that the assignment is unavailing; and I will now present the deductions I make from the case, which I have thus traced out by history and argument, in a negative form, to wit: First, that the Committee on Foreign Relations do not show that the American assignees have an existing title to the right to open the Isthmus of Tehuantepec; and, secondly, that they do not show that the validity of the grant has been recognized by Mexico since its abrogation by the Mexican Congress.

Here I might leave the question; but in that case I should leave undone what it is the duty of some Senator to do—exhaust the subject and present fully the grounds of the votes which must be given against the resolutions before the Senate.

You will perceive that hitherto I have assumed, in this argument, two things: first, that the grant to Garay was assignable; and secondly, that an assignment was made by Garay which has come to be vested in the hands of American citizens. Proceeding upon these assumptions, I ask you to take notice of another important point in the case. It is indisputable that whatever conditions Salas attached to his decree, entered into the assignments when made. Let me show you the conditions imposed by Salas:

"Art. 13. It shall be an express condition in all contracts with colonists, that they shall renounce the privileges of their original domicil so long as they reside in the country, subjecting themselves to all the existing colonial regulations which are not in conflict with the present law.

"Art. 14. The enterprise shall submit for the approval of Government all contracts which it shall make for the introduction of families and laborers, and it shall keep a public and authentic register of all its transactions in respect to all matters of colonization."

I have translated these conditions from the record of the decree which is before me. Let me show what was the contemporaneous exposition of them given by Salas, and which accompanied the approval of the assignment. Here it is:

"According to the spirit of the aforesaid law, this renunciation must take place in the most positive and conclusive manner on the part of the settlers, so that, whatever circumstances may happen, and whatever measures these may require, neither the settlers aforesaid nor the proprietors may not, in any case, nor for any cause, plead alien privileges, nor any other privileges except those which have been granted, or may be granted, to them by the laws of the country to which both their persons and their property must be subjected; and without this requisite they will not be admitted."

Here are American citizens claiming the extension of this grant by an assignment which was made upon the express and published condition of an absolute denationalization; and yet we are interposing in their behalf upon the ground of the very privileges of alienship, which they renounced to acquire the rights, and we are claiming rights for those who, if they have an assignment, are held by it to have renounced altogether their citizenship of the United States. We are required to make reprisals or war against Mexico for violating their rights under that very contract. Let us see how, in point of fact, the assignees stand in regard to this assignment. You will take notice that no assignment was ever publicly known, or communicated to the Mexican Government before the decree of Salas extending the grant; but after the decrees of Salas, Garay made known to the Mexican Government that before the decree he had made an assignment to Manning & McIntosh, and Snyder & Co. They have never produced that previous assignment to this day. It is not among the papers before us. Whether such a one was ever made, and whether it was fraudulent, whether it contained what they said of it, or not, there is no evidence; but the only evidence they have is a title by an assignment subsequent reciting that they had a transfer made before the decree. Here is the notice which Garay gave to the Mexican Government of the assignment which he had made to those parties:

"With these views, (those concerning colonization,) I succeeded in concluding a contract with the house of Messrs. Manning & McIntosh and Snyder, & Co., independent of that for constructing a way of communication between the two seas, by which (contract) those gentlemen are to introduce settlers on the lands."

The fifth article in that very deed of assignment recited that Garay did not convey to them, but actually reserved to himself, the right to open the Isthmus, in these words:

"That by this transfer on the part of the covenanter, Don José Garay, it is not to be understood that he confers upon Messrs. Manning & McIntosh and upon Snyder & Co. any right whatever to carry on navigation from one sea to the other;"

And then grants them the navigation of the little river on this side of the Isthmus, (Coatzacoalcos,) so far as may be necessary to the enjoyment of their lands; and then adds, as a further and superlative precaution, an additional reservation of non-interference with his privilege of interoceanic communication. On the 13th of January, 1849, to wit: two months after the expiration of the two years of extension allowed by the decree of Salas, Manning & McIntosh announced to the Mexican Government, "that Don José Garay had transferred to their house the privilege of constructing a way of communication between the two seas by the way of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec." On receiving this note, the Mexican Government acted decidedly and promptly, reminding the assignees that that part of the grant was untransferable, and also that the whole grant was extinct; the last extension granted by Salas, like all the preceding ones, having expired without commencing the work.

It remains on this point only to say, that whatever title any American citizens may have, they have only the same title which Manning & McIntosh and Snyder & Co. had, with all its imperfections on its head.

I shall omit the question whether the original grant of Santa Anna to his favorite Don José Garay, of the privilege of opening the Isthmus, was assignable. The Mexican Government say that it was not; that Garay was intrusted to execute a great national work as a mere agent. If such a question as that should arise in the United States, what should we say? The President of the United States every day issues commissions to individuals to perform certain duties. Congress every day pass laws authorizing individuals to build custom-houses, &c. I would like to know who there is in Congress, or out of it, that would admit that an administrative officer, or an architect upon a public building, has a contract which he can assign to a foreigner, and thereby convey to a foreign Power the right to tell us that we must execute the contract with its subjects.

Mr. DOWNS. I would ask the Senator to state, if this contract be not assignable, why it was that the Mexican Government declared to Mr. Trist that it was assignable, and that it had been assigned? Is not the Mexican Government as competent to decide that question as the Senate of the United States?

Mr. SEWARD. If my honorable and very esteemed friend from Louisiana, who argued this case with great ability the other day, had not had his attention diverted, he would have seen that I have already anticipated the question which he has propounded to me. I threw out this view of the subject to show that what Mexico insists upon has at least the merit of plausibility. I ask only that it be so considered. It is enough for my purpose that according to the view which I have taken, the committee have not shown the validity of the assignment, and the validity of the title of the claimants.

I ask you now to consider what are the unreasonable demands which Mexico makes, and which it is supposed that we cannot allow; and I shall take that in the words of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. MASON:]

"In all the propositions which have since emanated from the Mexican Government, in their proposals inviting new companies to construct this work, they have imposed limitations and restrictions which must discourage all from attempting it, or which would have the effect, if complied with, of leaving that work exclusively in the charge of the Mexican Government. The propositions are of this character: the contractors are required, in the first place, to acknowledge the unqualified sovereignty of Mexico over the transit, and her right to impose any political charges whatever upon persons or property passing over it. They are required to acknowledge a concurrent right in the Government of Mexico to fix the corporate charges. They are required to agree to place their mail steamers under the national flag of Mexico, and all their vessels are to be subject to tonnage and lighterage duties. They are required to agree to transport no troops or munitions of war across the Isthmus, except with the express permission of Mexico. They are required to discriminate in favor of such nations as shall guaranty this monopoly, by deducting twenty-five per cent. from the corporate charges in their favor; they are required to transfer the work at cost to Mexico, and, more than all, those who are there constructing this work are required to renounce their right to the protection of their own Governments, and become de facto Mexican citizens."

Now, sir, you see what the whole difficulty is; that what is claimed for these American proprietors is that they shall not be obliged to denationalize themselves, but that Mexico shall be obliged to denationalize herself; that the Congress of the United States, or the citizens of the United States, shall have control over the commerce of the Isthmus in all the particulars which have been read from the speech of the honorable Senator. Now, consider the condition of the United States, which I will not portray; consider the present condition of Mexico, which I need not describe; consider the character of the population of the United States and of Mexico, which I need not illustrate; consider the extent of the franchises thus insisted upon, and tell me what result can happen to Mexico, by her conceding what is demanded of her, short of a dismemberment, sooner or later, of the Mexican nation, a dissolution of the Federal Union of the States, and the extinction of the Republic of Mexico, even if, while we are here, that extinction has not already come about. Sir, in that case Mexico will not be a self-sustaining Power. She must be sustained by somebody. Except the United States, there is no American power that can guaranty the maintenance of a Government in Mexico. The United States will not consent that any European Power shall guaranty the preservation of a Government there. The Monroe doctrine, and the traditions cherished by us, prohibit that. What then? As a consequence of making these concessions, Mexico must fall into the United States.

Mr. President, I began this examination, if not in favor of the propositions of the committee, at least favorable to a result which would enable me to support these claimants. The result is not satisfactory. I am obliged, therefore, to say that I cannot vote to sustain the resolutions. I will now briefly review the points made by the committee, in my own order. And first, this point is made by the committee:

"That the United States stands committed to all of its citizens, to protect them in all their rights abroad as well as at home, within the sphere of its jurisdiction."

I hope the Senate has considered the length and the breadth of this proposition. I am obliged to ask some modification of it. I am glad to know that I have the support of Mr. Hargous, who has charge of this claim, and also of the late distinguished Secretary of State. What is the opinion of the New Orleans company upon that subject? Mr. Hargous tells us, in his letter to the late Secretary of State, Mr. Webster, when invoking the intervention of the Government:

"They are aware that in ordinary cases it is not the practice of the United States Government officially to interfere in behalf of citizens of the United States, who may complain of the violation of a contract which they may have entered into with a foreign Government; but inasmuch as all general rules have their exceptions, and as the interest of the American Government and public, and especially those of the citizens of the West and Southwest, are largely involved in the success of the Tehuantepec enterprise, they flatter themselves that in any just complaint they may have cause to prefer against the Mexican Government, they shall receive the hearty protection of their own.

"Your answer upon this point especially is respectfully solicited, and will be anxiously awaited."

Here are these proprietors telling the Government of the United States that they know that what they ask for is an exception to the law of nations, as practiced by this Government. There is the honorable Committee on Foreign Relations telling us that the rule is universal. I shall subscribe to this rule with some qualifications, which I will submit to the consideration of the Senate. The first qualification is, that the rights of a citizen, which the Government is bound to protect, are just rights—not unjust ones; that they are not unjust, unconscientious, or immoral rights.

Mr. MASON. What is an unjust right?

Mr. SEWARD. I say just rights in distinction from legal rights. According to the honorable Senator's notions and mine, there are things that are right because they are declared by law. There are things that are right whether they are declared by law or not. The second qualification is, that the rights which the Government is bound to protect, must be certain and absolute, not uncertain or doubtful. Third, that the right of the individual to the protection of his Government is subordinate to the general welfare and interest of the State. Upon this point, as the honorable chairman of the committee will give some authority, I will repose myself on Mr. Webster's reply to the letter of Mr. Hargous, which I have already submitted:

"Should the event prove otherwise, however, it cannot be doubted that in such a case, in which the interests of individuals would be obviously subordinate to those of the public, any other means which might be necessary for your protection would be authorized and employed."

The protection which a Government owes to its citizens is a protection according to circumstances—a protection consistent with public justice and the public welfare. The Government may discharge itself of its obligations in some cases, by leaving the individual to maintain his domestic rights in the domestic courts, and it may leave the citizen who has rights under a foreign Government to seek redress from that Government in its courts or otherwise. There never was, and never will be a Government which can be under an obligation to its citizens by which one of them, having, for the purpose of commerce or speculation, made a contract with the subjects of another country, or with the Government of another country, can ipso facto involve the nation to which he belongs in reprisals or war, to compel that Government to execute its contract. That would be to enable one citizen, at the suggestion of his own interest or caprice, to put in jeopardy the interest, welfare, happiness, or safety, of all other citizens. Least of all can there be any such principle of the law of nations applied in a case where the contract is disputed, or of doubtful morality or validity. This disposes of the first proposition of the committee.

Their second proposition is:

"That should Mexico within a reasonable time fail to reconsider her position concerning said grant, it will then become the duty of this Government to review the existing relations with that Republic, and to demand such measures as will preserve the honor of the country and the rights of its citizens."

This is a corollary from the first proposition, and falls with it. Their third proposition is:

"That in the present posture of the question, it is not compatible with the dignity of this Government to prosecute the subject further by negotiation. If Mexico, therefore, shall offer further negotiation, it shall be declined, unless it shall be offered based upon our own terms."

This, also, is a corollary from the first proposition, and falls with it. Moreover, if it be consistent with the dignity and honor of this nation to abide by its treaties—treaties solemnly and sacredly made—then it is consistent with the duty of the United States, and it is their bounden duty, either to tender to Mexico, or to wait till Mexico shall tender to them, a proposal to submit this dispute to an arbitration consisting of two persons, one of whom shall be named by each Power, or to the arbitration of a foreign nation. This disposes of the resolutions of the committee.

Mr. President, I am approaching the end of this long discussion, and I shall dismiss now Don José Garay, his grant, his assignment, his assignees, and their grievances. I come to a second ground, which has been assumed, not so much in the report, as in the speeches of the honorable Senators who support these resolutions, viz: That the United States have a public interest in opening the Tehuantepec communication as an oceanic connection, which renders it the duty of the United States on this occasion to adopt the resolutions submitted to us upon this subject. I have to say, in the first place, that as any defect in the Garay claim, or in the assignments of it, cannot be cured by the existence of a coincident public interest on the part of the nation, so also this public interest which is thus brought before us is not aided at all by the Garay claim. If it is the right of the United States to compel Mexico to enter into a stipulation to open the way, that right is absolute and independent of the Garay grant, whether that grant be valid or otherwise. Upon what ground is it that the Committee on Foreign Relations claim this right? Hear the honorable chairman of that committee.

"I come now to look at this question in another point of view. I lay it down, without hesitancy and without fear, that we have a right to a way across Tehuantepec. According to public law, this Government may demand of Mexico a way across Tehuantepec; and Mexico cannot refuse it unless she becomes disloyal to the general compact of nations. What is a right of way? Every one is familiar with that. It pertains to individuals in life as it pertains to nations. I understand that writers upon public law derive it from that primitive state, when the entire earth was common to all men, and passage over it was free to all, according to their varied necessities. Such was the nature of this right before Government was formed, or the institution of separate property ordained. By these, the right in question was only limited in its exercise; it was not destroyed; and it revives and resuscitates whenever there is a necessity making the way indispensable. It is illustrated in familiar life every day. If I purchase a piece of land so surrounded by the possessions of him from whom it is derived that I have no way out to mill or to market, I may take it, as a right incident to the acquisition. It is a principle resulting from necessity, and is modified as circumstances may require. A way impracticable in its use is the same thing as no way at all; and such is the exact position of our present way across the northern continent. We purchased California from Mexico, paid a large equivalent for it, and we have in fact no way across our own continent to get to it."

That is, the law of nations gives us the right to cross the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and it is an absolute right. As it is by virtue of the higher law, higher than treaties, higher than the Constitutions of the United States and of Mexico, the law of God, which is the law of necessity, it is a perfect right. I have to say on this argument, in the first place, that when we had such a right, one so perfect, and descending to us so directly from Almighty power and Divine justice, it was most bungling diplomacy to rest that right upon the grant of the Mexican Government to Don José de Garay. I have to say, in the second place, that while I might not deny that we have the right to a way across Mexico, there is still another question which the honorable Senator has not disposed of. I remember a comedy which I saw acted once, in which the parents of two lovers sought to oppose their union under a mutual mistake. It resulted in their flight and marriage, and when they presented themselves for forgiveness, the parents found that just exactly the union which they had desired and studied to bring about was what had taken place, and which they had opposed, under the supposition that each had some other party in view. The father of the groom was obdurate. The father of the bride said, "Well, now, will you not forgive your son? Have you not got your own way after all?" The inflexible parent replied, "Yes, I have got my own way, but I have not got my own way of having it." Now, I ask the honorable chairman of the committee, whether besides having an absolute right, by the higher law, to the road across Mexico, we have a right to our own way of having it? I think not.

But, sir, the honorable Senator supposes that this right of way over Tehuantepec inures to us by virtue of a higher law, upon the ground, that a portion of our territory is behind Mexico and another portion before Mexico, and it is necessary for us to pass through Mexico in order to go from one part of our possessions to another, like a farmer who has a right to go to another part of his own farm over another man's lands, I remind the Senator that we voluntarily placed ourselves behind Mexico; and I think that if I go and take a farm behind another man's farm, or the soil under his farm, I have no right to reach that new possession by going across, and over, or upwards, and through his farm.

Fourthly: At the time we acquired our possessions on the Pacific, we applied to Mexico to give us this very right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and she gave us good reasons why she thought she had rather not. We assented and waived the demand, and permitted her to rise from the earth, upon which we had prostrated her, without surrendering this right. Now, I think it is too late to insist upon it.

Fifthly: If our real object in obtaining the right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec is to open an interoceanic communication for our own benefit, and for the welfare and benefit of mankind, the right has already been offered for our acceptance, and the offer is still open. What has been already quoted proves this. But for greater certainly, hear your Minister, Mr. Letcher:

"Recently I have had several earnest conversations with Mr. Ramirez, regarding the treaty of Tehuantepec. Our interview two nights ago lasted upwards of four hours. His Excellency, upon each occasion, manifested great concern upon the subject, and was evidently very much surprised at my apparent indifference. It is quite obvious he now feels sensibly the responsibility of his position. I listened calmly and patiently to all he had to say. He reiterated, in strong language, what he had often previously declared, that the treaty, in its present form, could never be ratified by the Mexican Congress; that any attempt on the part of the Government to favor its approval, would end in nothing but its own immediate downfall; that he was sorry to say the feeling of his country, at the present time, against the United States, was exceedingly strong; so much so, that no one in power could venture to advocate a more intimate association with that country; that he was altogether satisfied the interest of Mexico, and in fact that of the whole commercial world, demanded the contemplated connection between the two oceans; that so far from throwing obstacles in the way of that connection, Mexico was fully prepared to go every reasonable length to secure that great object; that Mexico was poor and oppressed, but so far as he had it in his power to guard and protect her honor, he was determined she should not only be free from just reproach, but should stand upon elevated grounds before the world, in every particular, in reference to a matter of so much importance; that although she had been and was at this moment badly treated by many of my countrymen, still, from motives of sound policy, she was disposed—and such was his own sincere wish—to concede to the United States, in preference to any other Power, all the privileges which might be necessary to accomplish the greatest enterprise of the age; but that, in the event of such concession, no allusion must be made to the Garay grant.

"'Leave out that grant—say nothing about it, and I am ready,' said he, 'to enter into a treaty with you which I think will be satisfactory to both countries.'"

Hear, also, the letter of President Arista, of the 15th of April last, to President Fillmore:

"Among the differences enumerated by your Excellency, there is no one which can produce any serious difficulties between the two Republics; for Mexico has always been disposed to consent to the opening of a communication through the Isthmus of Tehuantepec for the free and unrammeled commerce of the whole world; in this respect she agrees entirely with the ideas and principles expressed by your Excellency in your last message to Congress. Her Government has given assurance of this in all its official acts: the explicit and full confirmation of this intention your Excellency will have remarked in the projet for a treaty, which the Minister of Relations presented on the 3d of January last to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States as a substitute for the treaty then pending, but which presented insuperable difficulties in the way of its being approved. The same feeling now exists—for even after this sentiment had been misunderstood by Mr. Letcher on the one side, and reproved by Congress on the other, (as shown by rejection of treaty,) as late as yesterday, a bill was introduced into the House of Deputies imposing on the Government the obligation to proceed immediately to open the communication by Tehuantepec, and authorizing it at the same time to make use of all the means that it may judge proper and necessary for the attainment of the object. These facts, presented in an authentic form, prove most indisputably that Mexico, far from opposing this great work, encourages it as much as possible; and most conclusively shows that it cannot be a cause for disagreement between her and the United States.

"But by the side of this merely apparent difficulty there is one which is so in reality, not from its own intrinsic character, but from the circumstances which are connected with it. These are found in the pretensions advanced by the agents of the New Orleans company, who appear to be determined that the opening of the communication shall take place in no other way, except under the privilege granted to Don José Garay. This pretension (which Mr. Letcher believes himself bound resolutely to uphold) has caused the utter failure of all pending negotiations by blocking up all the doors to a prudent compromise; it is altogether incompatible with the decree of Congress, which declares the privilege of Garay to have become extinct, in consequence of the illegality of its extension; under such circumstances it was impossible to negotiate a satisfactory treaty, and if negotiated, nothing would have been gained by it, for Congress was determined to reject it."

Now, sir, you have only to contemplate one more grade in the humiliation to which you have brought Mexico, to bring compunction to your heart. Here it is: Mexico has not only offered you this very right on the condition that you would relinquish the Garay grant, but she has offered to indemnify—ay, to indemnify the assignees of the Garay grant for pecuniary losses:

"In answer to a suggestion or two I had the honor to offer, I understood his Excellency to say, in so many words, in order to avoid all difficulties that may probably arise, in case the treaty shall be rejected, Mexico is willing to indemnify the holders of the Garay grant, and also the New Orleans company, for the money they have heretofore expended in the enterprise.

"In my dispatch of the 29th of October, I mentioned that the minister had used this remark, in substance: 'Mexico is prepared to stand all the consequences that may result from a rejection of the treaty.' I am now pretty well satisfied he meant pecuniary consequences, and nothing more."
—Letter of Mr. Letcher.

Senators, behold here the fundamental error in all these transactions—the error which might have been, and ought to have been, perceived—a private speculation with which the Government had nothing to do, combined, mingled, confounded with a great national enterprise—a private speculation, undertaken on public account. A great national interest, brought down to the mire, and polluted by contamination in an association with private speculation. Now I ask, is it not about time to separate this private speculation from this great national world-wide important concern? Sir, our dignity as well as our interest requires us to review our own position, and not to ask Mexico to reconsider hers—to retrace our own steps—to dissolve our connection with this New Orleans company: to dissolve the connection of our Government with speculators—speculators whether upon the levee upon the Mississippi, or upon South street on the East river; to dismiss them to the remedies afforded by the nation with which they have contracted—which remedies are the only ones they have a right to expect, or in making their contract could have contemplated. Then prosecute this great design of interoceanic communication across Mexico, by fair, open, single-handed, single-hearted diplomacy. The Isthmus of Tehuantepec will be opened in good time. It cannot long remain closed against the spirit of the age. The advance of our country, and of civilization throughout this continent assures us that it will be opened.

But you want it opened now—you cannot wait. There is no urgency, there is no haste for Tehuantepec. You want first and most, a communication which shall bind New Orleans, and Washington, and New York on the Atlantic, with San Francisco on the Pacific. The safety of your country, the safety of its Pacific possessions demands such a communication, not over oceans exposed to all nations and through a foreign territory occupied by a discontented, aggrieved, and probably hostile people, but inland, and altogether through your own country. You want for your own use, for your own commerce, and for the commerce of Asia, a road which shall have the advantage of the best Atlantic and Pacific harbors which can be obtained, with one continuous connection by land, so that there shall be no necessity for reshipment between the Atlantic and Pacific ports; not a way between ports yet to be artificially made, on the Caribbean sea and on the Pacific coast, with changes from land to water carriage requiring breaking of bulk at least twice in the course of transit.

If you aim to erect a high commercial structure, you must lay your foundations broadly in agriculture, in mining, and manufacture; and all these within your own domain; and use the resources which God and nature have given to you, and not those which Providence has bestowed upon your neighbors. And you want, for the same reason, a passage across the continent of your own, not shared with any foreign Power, and through your own domain, and not through a foreign domain. If you will be the carriers of Europe and of Asia, if you will be the carriers in even your own interoceanic commerce, you must receive, you must convey, you must deliver merchandise within your own temperate zone, not within that torrid zone whose heats are noxious to animal and vegetable productions, and while so deleterious to the articles most abundant and most essential to the subsistence of man, pestilential also to human life itself. This is the communication across this continent which you want.

But I shall be told, as I have been told by the advocates of these ill-starred resolutions, that a railroad across our own domain is not feasible. I shall give but a brief answer to that—an answer in the letter of an illiterate man, whose experience enables him to bear conclusive testimony:

WASHINGTON, February 4, 1853.

SIR: I have the honor of replying as follows to your note of the 2d instant, making certain inquiries regarding the practicability of building, and the best location for the proposed Pacific railroad, that I think it is perfectly practicable, and the best route will be found by going into the valley of the Rio Grande at Albuquerque, and thence crossing over by the Moqui villages and Little Colorado river to Walker's Pass in the Sierra Nevada, and from there down the San Joaquin valley to San Francisco.

I have crossed from New Mexico to California by four different routes, namely: Cook's Sonora route, the Salt river route, that recently followed by Captain Sitgreaves's party, and the old Spanish trail; and the one I have before described (Captain Sitgreaves's) is, in my opinion, decidedly the best. It is shorter, more direct, and has more timber and level country, fewer mountains, more cultivated, and perhaps more cultivatable land than any other route.

I have trapped on nearly every stream between Cook's route and the Great Salt Lake, and am well acquainted with the region of country between these places.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ANTOINE LEROUX.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

I shall be told that if it be feasible, the length of the road is so great as to deter us from attempting it. What is it? Two thousand miles. What are two thousand miles of railroad for the people of the United States to make, who, within eighteen years past, have made twelve thousand miles? The railroads which have been made in the State of New York alone have an aggregate length of two thousand three hundred and one miles, exceeding the distance from lake Erie to the Pacific ocean. And if you add the canals, the chain would reach from the banks of the Hudson river to the shores of the Pacific ocean. The railroads already made in the United States, if drawn out into one lengthened chain, would reach from Liverpool to Canton. The railroads which have been made and are now being made in the United States, if stretched continuously along, would more than encircle the globe. Again, I shall be told of the cost of this railroad. And what will be its cost? One hundred millions of dollars. A cost not exceeding the revenue of the Government of the United States for two years only—a cost not exceeding the revenue of the Federal and State Governments for one year. One hundred millions of dollars; why we have offered that sum for one island in the Caribbean sea! One hundred millions of dollars; why New York city spent one sixth of that sum in supplying itself with water, and grew all the while! One hundred millions of dollars; the State of New York has already spent, in making canals and railroads, one hundred and thirteen millions, and prospered while spending it as never State or nation prospered before. That one hundred millions of dollars, if it should never be directly reimbursed, will be indirectly replaced within ten years by the economy which it would enable us to practice in the transportation of the Army, and of the supplies of the Army and Navy over it, not to speak of the still more important benefits of bringing the public domain into cultivatien and into increased value, and developing rapidly the mineral wealth of California, which can be only imperfectly realized now, because labor on that side of the Continent is worth four dollars a day, while it is worth but one here.

I shall be told there are constitutional difficulties and political dangers attending the opening of this railroad stretching across our own country to San Francisco. Does, then, our Constitution authorize us to make a canal or a railroad through a foreign country, and inhibit such a work in our own? If there is a right under the Constitution for that, why is there not for this? What new gloss of the Constitution or the resolutions of 1798 invests us with the one power and deprives us of the other? Political danger! Is there less political danger in opening a passage through a foreign country, exposed to the hostilities of an armed people and of rival nations, than in peaceably opening a passage through our own possessions, beyond the reach of foreign Powers, and even unobserved by them? But grant that a railroad can be made through the Isthmus of Tehuantepec; can you manage and control that road, as you demand that Mexico shall permit you to do, without overturning, sooner or later, the States of Vera Cruz and Oaxaca through which it will pass? Can you do that without breaking your treaty obligations to Mexico? No, sir; the national power which controls and manages that road, with only the small States of Vera Cruz and Oaxaca on the route, will soon overcome them. If you take those two States, will you leave the remaining twenty States of Mexico? Will the other twenty consent to remain out of the American nation, when you have taken the two principal States, and have cut off their communications with the Caribbean sea and the Pacific ocean? Not a day. Will you consent that anybody else shall have them? Not you. Will they consent that anybody else shall have them? Not they. So you will have Mexico.

Well, before you conclude upon this important matter, consider well whether you have settled the preliminaries and prepared the way for receiving the twenty-two States of Mexico. If you have, pray enlighten me. Will they come in slave States, or will they come in free States? Can you admit them as slave States? Can you take them in as free States? Can you adjust the balance between slavery and freedom? If not, can you evas the Union from convulsion? And if you plunge the Union into convulsion, can you tell me whether you can bring us out in safety? Well, suppose that these preliminaries are all settled. Those States cannot govern themselves now; can they govern themselves better after they are annexed to the United States? No. Will you govern them? Pray tell me how. By admitting them as equals, or by proconsular power? If the one, you must have an army perpetually there to suppress insurrection. If the other, still you must have a standing army in the provinces, ultimately to come back and open the same disastrous drama of anarchy, civil war, desolation, and ruin at home, which the armies of Mexico have enacted there. If you bring them in as States, have you settled the question whether you are to govern them, or whether they are to exercise self-government, and so govern you? Have you reached that point in your charity that you will be willing to be governed by five millions of Indians in Mexico?

These are no idle questions. They are coming upon us, and they will be here when Mexico, exhausted by internal factions, and by resistance to your own aggressions, shall implore you to give her rest and peace and safety, by admitting her to your Confederacy, as, before long, in any event, she surely must and will do. That time is coming soon enough without hastening it. Why hasten it? You answer that you want a passage across the continent by way of Tehuantepec. Have you not more passages already across your own domain to open than you can open in twenty-five years? Have you not more land already than you can people in fifty years? Have you not more gold and silver than you can dig in an hundred years? These dangers are real, but only real if precipitated. Time will speedily fill the regions which you already possess with a homogeneous population and homogeneous States; yet even long before that event, so soon to arrive, shall have come, this nation will have acquired such magnitude, such consistency, such strength, such unity, such empire, that Mexico, with her one million of whites, her two millions of mixed races, and her five millions of Aztecs and other aboriginals, can be received and absorbed without disturbing the national harmony, impairing the national vigor, or even checking for a day the national progress.

Wisdom, justice, and magnanimity, combine in recommending to us the moderation, the forbearance, the pity, which Mexico, exhausted by efforts, simple, sincere, and earnest, at once to imitate our political virtues, and to defend herself against our hostile encroachments, so touchingly implores, and which our faith, plighted amid the ruin of her most precious hopes, and with compunctions on our part, never before and nowhere else betrayed in our diplomacy, so solemnly enjoins.

I submit the following as a substitute for the resolutions:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert:

That the United States cannot suspend diplomatic negotiations with Mexico without tendering to that Power, or waiting a reasonable time to receive from it, an offer of arbitration, according to the terms of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

TEXAS DEBT.

SPEECH OF HON. J. A. PEARCE,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE SENATE, February 10, 1853,

On the bill to provide for the payment of such creditors of the late Republic of Texas as are comprehended in the act of Congress of September 9, 1850.

Mr. PEARCE said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: This bill has been introduced by the Committee on Finance in consequence of various memorials from the creditors of the late Republic of Texas which were referred to that committee at the last session of Congress. In order to understand this whole subject fully, it is necessary to go back to the period of the annexation of Texas. It will be recollected that by the resolutions of annexation passed by Congress, and adopted by the convention of the people of Texas, sundry conditions were agreed to by this Government and the people of Texas. By those conditions the powers of the Government of Texas and its property were divided between the Government of the Union and the new State of Texas. The late Republic of Texas ceded to the Union its external sovereignty, but retained its internal sovereignty, modified, to be sure, in some particulars, by the operation of the Constitution of the United States. As to the property, Texas ceded to the Government of the Union all its military and naval property, forts, arsenals, navy-yards, dock-yards, &c. It yielded up also to the Government of the Union its revenue from duties on imports, and it retained full right to all its public lands. I propose to read from the articles of annexation a single passage:

"Said State, when admitted into the Union, after ceding to the United States all public edifices, fortifications, barracks, ports, and harbors, navy and navy-yards, docks, magazines, arms, and armaments, and all other property and means pertaining to the public defense belonging to the said Republic of Texas, shall retain all the public funds, debts, taxes, and dues of every kind, which may belong to, or be due and owing to the said Republic; and shall also retain all the vacant and unappropriated lands lying within its limits, to be applied to the payment of the debts and liabilities of said Republic of Texas; and the residue of said lands, after discharging said debts and liabilities, to be disposed of as said State may direct; but in no event are said debts and liabilities to become a charge upon the Government of the United States."

The Senate will perceive that when the Government of the Union took from Texas that which was ceded to her by the articles of annexation, the remaining property was not left solely to the future operation of the dominion of Texas, but a stipulation was made that the public lands of Texas should remain to it, to be applied by it to the payment of its public debts; and then there was a further stipulation, that in no event should the Government of the Union be liable to be charged for those debts. Now, sir, this seems to be a little extraordinary, upon the supposition that the effect of annexation by itself would create no such liability on the United States. Why provide against a liability which by no possibility could arise from the act which you were about to do? Certainly the least that could be said would be that it was supererogatory, that it was a very unnecessary course.

But we know the fact to be, that when these resolutions of annexation were pending, many members of the Senate not only entertained the idea, but avowed it in argument, and maintained with great force and vigor, that the operation of the resolutions of annexation would be to transfer to the Government of the Union a part of the obligations of the late Republic of Texas. I very well recollect that a member of this body on that occasion exhibited one of the revenue bonds of Texas, and called upon the Senate to mark its terms, to notice the pledge which it made of the revenues from duties on imports, and bade them beware how they entered into an arrangement which would inevitably charge the Treasury of the United States with the payment, at all events, of that class of liabilities. It was certainly, to say the least, to guard against the apprehension of this liability, that this provision was inserted. If the United States were under no liability, if the resolutions of annexation could impose no charge upon the Treasury of the United States, the provision in the articles of annexation, that in no event should the debts and liabilities of Texas become a charge upon the Government of the United States, was evidently nugatory. A liability created by the act you were about to perform by the new associations into which we were preparing to enter with Texas, would not be avoided by the mere declaration of the will of this Government, that it should not operate such a change. The very attempt to rid ourselves of a liability thus apprehended, is pretty good evidence of a conviction that such a liability would attach.

The consequence was, that almost as soon as the annexation of Texas had been completed, and she had become a member of this Union, certain of her creditors petitioned this Government for the payment of her debts to them. In 1846, several such petitions were presented, upon which, in one case, at least, a bill was introduced and debated. So things remained until 1850, when the boundary act was passed, by which we agreed to give to Texas ten millions of dollars, in consideration of the cession by her of her claims to territory exterior to her present limits, and of her relinquishment of certain other claims upon the United States, including a liability, or a supposed and alleged liability, on the part of the United States for certain debts of Texas. Of these ten millions, the act stipulated that no more than five millions should be issued to Texas until releases should be filed at the Treasury of the United States of all their claims by a certain class of creditors, to wit: those creditors who held claims against Texas secured by a pledge of revenues derived from duties on imports. This reservation sufficiently signifies the opinion of Congress at that time, that the United States, if not under an absolute and perfect obligation to pay that class of debts due by the late Republic of Texas, were, at all events, under some sort of obligation, liable in some way—only equitable if you please—to a charge upon their Treasury in respect to these debts. There could not be any pretense for retaining in the Treasury of the United States any part of the stipulated sum, if it were not that the Treasury of the United States was supposed to be either primarily or eventually liable for a part of the obligations which Texas had incurred in the days of her separate existence.

And, sir, if we look back to the debates which took place in the Senate at that time, this view will be amply confirmed. I recollect that before that time, when Mr. Clay introduced his celebrated resolutions, he proposed to provide for the payment by the United States of that portion of the debt of Texas to which this bill applies. His fourth resolution was in these words:

"Resolved, That it be proposed to the State of Texas, that the United States will provide for the payment of all that portion of the legitimate and bona fide public debt of that State, contracted prior to its annexation to the United States, and for which the duties on foreign imports were pledged by the said State to its creditors, not exceeding the sum of $——— in consideration of the said duties so pledged having been no longer applicable to that object after the said annexation, but having thenceforward become payable to the United States; and upon the condition, also, that the said State of Texas shall, by some solemn and authentic act of her Legislature, or of a convention, relinquish to the United States any claim which it has to any part of New Mexico."

In the course of his remarks on this resolution, Mr. Clay said:

"It proposes that the Government of the United States will provide for the payment of all that portion of the debt of Texas for which the duties received upon imports from foreign countries were pledged by Texas, at a time when she had authority to make pledges. How much it will amount to, I have endeavored to ascertain; but all the means requisite to the ascertainment of the sum have not been received, and it is not very essential at this time, because it is the principle, and not the amount, that is most worthy of consideration. Now, sir, the ground on which I base this liability on the part of the United States to pay a portion of the debt of Texas, is not new to me. It is one which I have again and again announced to be an opinion entertained by me. I think it is founded upon principles of eternal truth and justice. Texas being an independent Power, recognized as such by all the great Powers of the earth, invited loans to be made to her to enable her to prosecute the then existing war between her and Mexico. She told those whom she invited to make these loans, that 'if you make them, the duties on foreign imports shall be sacredly pledged for the reimbursement of the loans.' The loans were made. The money was received and expended in the establishment of her liberty and her independence. After this she annexed herself to the United States, who thenceforward acquired the right to the identical pledge which she had made to the public creditor to satisfy the loan of money which he had advanced to her. The United States became the owner of that pledge, and the recipient of all the duties payable in the ports of Texas."

"Now, sir, I do say that, in my humble judgment, if there be honor, or justice, or truth among men, we do owe to the creditors who thus advanced their money upon that pledge the reimbursement of the money, at all events to the extent that the pledged fund would have reimbursed it if it had never been appropriated by us to our use. We must recollect, sir, in relation to that pledge, and to the loan made in virtue and on the faith of it, there were three parties bound: the United States, Texas, and the creditor of Texas, who had advanced his money on the faith of a solemn pledge made by Texas."

When the boundary bill was introduced, after the failure of Mr. Clay's project, called the omnibus bill, similar arguments were addressed to the Senate, which gentlemen must well recollect. The retention of five millions in the Treasury was vindicated, upon the ground that it was the duty of the United States to protect their Treasury from liability which might thereafter be brought against it, upon the supposition that Texas might possibly apply the money which she was to receive under that boundary act, in a manner not satisfactory to her creditors, and that if she did not satisfy her creditors, this Government would be liable to perpetual demands by those creditors for the payment of their claims.

In the remarks with which I introduced the boundary act I presented similar views, acknowledging at the same time the reluctance with which I had come to such conclusions. I justified the large sum which that bill proposed to give to Texas, by the consideration that we had absorbed that source of revenue to whose future productiveness her creditors had looked for relief and payment.

I held that it was not "a sufficient answer to 'say that, without annexation, Texas would have 'had no security, and therefore no increase of 'commerce, for we know that her independence 'would have been acknowledged by Mexico on 'the condition of eternal separation from the 'United States; and that if this scheme guaran-'tied by England and France had gone into oper-'ation, she would soon have gathered strength 'and grown in prosperity." I did not propose, as some did, to reserve to the United States the right of distributing the money among the creditors of Texas, partly because I was unwilling to seem to cast any reproach upon the State, and in part because I supposed that she could herself better settle with her creditors. But as the money voted to Texas was given with the view of enabling her to discharge those obligations which seemed to be also a charge upon the United States, I endeavored to guard the Treasury of the Union against the contingencies which might flow from the measure by the proviso which reserves five of the ten millions until the revenue creditors have filed at the Treasury releases of their claims.

Then, sir, I hold that Congress, both by the terms of the resolutions of annexation and by the boundary act of 1850, has recognized that the United States were under some sort of liability for that portion of the debts of Texas for which her revenues from customs were pledged. The general argument as to this liability is stated with sufficient distinctness in the remarks which I have read from Mr. Clay's speech. The United States having taken that fund which was pledged by the late Republic of Texas for the payment of a certain portion of her debt, must take it with the obligation of satisfying that debt. That is the general proposition.

This doctrine is not new. It is not unknown to the publicists; on the contrary, it has been well recognized. I find in a book of authority on international law a reference to the well-known case of the Province of Silesia. Wildman, in his work on national law, says:

"But in that case the conqueror acquires no rights but those of the State with which he is at war, and takes subject to all absolute or qualified alienations previously made. Thus the King of Prussia, when he acquired Silesia by conquest and cession, bound himself by treaty to pay the debts for which that Province had been mortgaged to British merchants. But without such express stipulation, Silesia would still have remained subject to the mortgage, for he could conquer no rights but such as were vested in his enemy."

This mortgage of the revenues of Silesia was made by Charles VI., Emperor of Germany, in the year 1734, I think. Its conquest by Frederick was consummated in the time of his daughter, Maria Theresa, and the cession was made by the preliminary treaty of Breslau, in 1742, the seventh article of which treaty provided that the King of Prussia should pay those debts for the revenues of which the Province of Silesia was mortgaged to certain English merchants.

One would suppose that that analogy was tolerably perfect; but I may be told that there was a very great difference; that the mortgage of the revenues of Silesia included all the revenues of Silesia; that it was equivalent to a surrender of the whole taxing power, and that Texas has not by her union with the United States given up the whole of her taxing power. But let us look at it a little further. When Silesia was ceded to Prussia, the contracting party that had engaged to pay this debt, was the head of a great subsisting empire; shorn, indeed, of a very small part of her immense possessions, but still with a vast extent of territory, and with most ample resources. While Silesia could no longer be taxed by the Empress Queen, all the rest of the vast possessions over which her sovereignty remained intact, could be taxed.

It was not, therefore, anything but the transfer of the thing pledged which made the King of Prussia liable. The ability to pay remained in the original contracting party, almost, if not quite undiminished; for, in comparison to the revenue of such an empire as that of Maria Theresa, the revenue of Silesia must have been inconsiderable, and scarcely worth mentioning. But not so with Texas. In surrendering up her revenues from imports, she surrendered that which was the principal source of her revenue; she gave up more than four fifths of all her annual income.

I find, by reference to a tabular statement which I have examined, that in the year 1844, the revenue of Texas from imports amounted to $177,000, and that her revenue from all other sources was less than $50,000. Besides, we know that in modern times the principal source of revenue to all nations, certainly to all maritime nations, is revenue from duties on imports. Why, sir, it was the surrender of the duties from customs by the States of this Union, upon the formation of our Federal Constitution, which was one of the principal grounds for the assumption of the debts of the State governments by the Government of the Union.

In the case of Silesia, to which I have referred, the liability of the imperial head of the Germanic Empire remained, and the ability of the Empress to pay the debt, which had been contracted to these British merchants, remained, but the thing pledged having been assigned to the King of Prussia, that monarch took it with the burdens upon it, and therefore bound himself to pay, and, after some very curious controversies, did finally satisfy the claims of the British merchants.

The same principle may be found in Bynkershock's treatise on the Law of War. At page 191 he says: "Conquered countries, like lands purchased, pass cum onere." He illustrates it by reference to certain territory of the King of Spain conquered by the States General, and which, before that conquest, had been hypothecated by that monarch. He says that if the States, instead of conquering, had purchased it from the King, the creditor would still have been entitled to his pledge, as he was upon its transfer by conquest.

After the passage of the boundary act of 1850, the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States found that it was their duty to consider what classes of the debts of Texas came within the provisions of that act, and the Secretary made a report upon the subject, in which the President concurred.

The debts of Texas may be divided into six classes. There is the debt contracted under the Texan act of 1837, called, I believe, the ten per cent. consolidated fund. There is the debt commonly known as the five million loan, all of which was not issued, created under the authority of various laws of Texas. There was another class of debt created under one of the acts of February 5, 1840, called the eight and ten per cent. funded debt; and there was another debt created under another act of February 5, 1840, called the eight per cent. treasury bonds. Then there were Treasury notes of three different classes, and finally another item of public debt which consisted principally of drafts, audited and unaudited, which were, in fact, drawn upon the Treasury of Texas for the current expenses and supplies of the Government, and sometimes properly called the domestic debt. Of these six classes, two did not appear to the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to come within the principle assumed by the bill. The eight and ten per cent. funded debt of February 5, 1840, called in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury "class C," was one of those which did not come within the principle assumed by the boundary act, because by the act which created that debt, there was no pledge given of revenue from imports either for the payment of principal or interest, or any provision making this debt receivable for public dues. Class F, consisting of audited and unaudited paper called "domestic debt," not being funded, or put into the shape of stock, bonds, Treasury notes, or promissory notes of any sort, had no pledge of duties on imports, and, of course, it was decided not to be within the bill. All the other classes had, in some way or other, a pledge of the revenue from imports for their payment. Class A, which amounts to $1,651,590, principal and interest, on the 1st July, 1850, had a pledge on import duties for the perpetual payment of interest. This special pledge, being a perpetual one, for the payment of the interest, is, of course, equivalent to a pledge for the payment of the principal; and that class, therefore, comes within the provisions of the act of 1850, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, as approved by the President. The loans designated in "schedule B" of the report made under various acts, amounted to about $2,582,000.

By a section in the Texan act of January 14, 1840, the revenues of Texas generally were pledged for the redemption of all loans negotiated by the authority of the Republic; and although the revenues from customs were not mentioned eo nomine in that pledge, yet as the pledge was a general one of all the revenues, it was considered by the Secretary and President to include, and to be, in effect, a pledge of the revenue from the customs, since, if it did not pledge each and every item or source of revenue, it did not pledge any, and did not amount to any pledge at all; and, therefore, if it had any operation or effect at all, it must be considered as a pledge of the revenue from customs.

Class D, as it is called in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, consisted of eight per cent. Treasury bonds created under one of the acts of February 5th, 1840. That act provided that those bonds of the Republic should be at all times receivable by any collector of revenue or at the Treasury Department in payment of any debt to the Government, or of any duties on imports. This quality of receivability in payment of all public dues, including duties on imports, is in effect as full a pledge of the revenues from customs as if those revenues had been pledged eo nomine.

Schedule E comprised the three classes of Treasury notes, all of which were made receivable for the payment of public dues, including the duties from customs.

The amounts of these different classes of debt, principal and interest, on the first July, 1850, may be thus stated:

Class A.....	$1,651,590 02
Class B.....	2,582,902 70
Class D.....	1,472,918 80
Class E.....	2,586,546 00
	$8,293,957 52

If there be any error in this statement it is probably too large by some forty or fifty thousand dollars. I take it, however, as I find it in the Secretary's report, based upon the statements of the Auditor and Comptroller of Texas.

These are the four classes which were recognized by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the President of the United States, and they, with the full amount of interest on them up to July, 1850, amounted to about $8,293,000. The whole amount of the debt of Texas is about $12,400,000. So much as comes within the principal assumed by this bill is, or was at the time I have indicated, about $8,294,000.

The Legislature of Texas having seen this report of the Secretary of the Treasury, approved by the President, have passed an act by which they seem to have recognized the soundness of the principles assumed by that report, and they have provided out of the $5,000,000 which have already been paid to them from the Treasury of the United States, for the two classes excluded by me in the enumeration which I have mentioned, and excluded by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. They have provided for their domestic debt, (class F,) and they have provided for the class called C, or the eight and ten per cent. funded debt of 5th February, 1840, and I understand that in many instances claims under those two classes of debt have been presented at the Treasury of Texas, and actually paid and receipts filed. For the other four classes they have provided conditionally; and here comes the difficulty which has rendered it necessary to introduce this bill. They have provided for the payment of some of these claims at par, of some at eighty-seven and a half cents to the dollar, of some at fifty cents, and of some at twenty cents on the dollar. The whole amount of these four classes, as scaled by the act of the State of Texas, is something less than $4,000,000, including principal and interest.

The creditors of Texas are not willing to accept the terms thus offered them by that State. They contend for the payment of their claims, dollar for dollar. While Texas alleges that she has scaled these claims according to the rates at which she actually received value for them, the creditors contend that that was no part of the contract. Their contract was, to be paid so much as the obligation on its face states to be due; and they deny the right of the Legislature of Texas to reduce the amount of their obligation from its face value to that which the State alleges it actually received, or to that which it alleges to have been the average of what it actually received; for, in some cases, it being actually impossible to tell what was received by the State, on the particular bond, or evidence of debt, the Auditor and Comptroller of Texas have averaged the whole class. Texas has also provided that these four classes of debts which she has thus proposed to pay according to the scaled rates, shall not be paid until the United States shall have modified their proviso in the boundary act. Annexed to her scaling act is this proviso:

"Provided, That payment shall be made on any claim against the State, included in or forming a part of articles 1st, 2d, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 11th, or for interest which may have accrued thereon, included in articles 12th and 13th, in the first section of this act, when the Governor of this State shall be notified by the President of the United States that the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States has been required by law to issue to the State of Texas the five millions of dollars of stock withheld under the provisions of said act, approved September 9th, 1850, until certain creditors shall have filed releases at the Treasury of the United States, as therein required; or that said Secretary has been required by law to issue to the State of Texas sums of said stock, equal to the sums for which the State may at any time present the required releases from any portion of said creditors at the Treasury of the United States; after which notice, such claim or claims shall be paid, as provided for in other cases."

Texas, therefore, requires the Government of the United States to modify the proviso of the act of 1850, by which the five millions were retained in the Treasury of the United States, before any portion of these claims can be paid under her liquidation act. In 1848 Texas passed an act "to 'provide for ascertaining the debt of the late Re-'public of Texas, by which she required her 'creditors to present their claims to the Auditor and 'Comptroller of public accounts, on or before the 'second Monday of November, 1849, and declar-'ing that all claims not then presented should be 'postponed." The government of the State subsequently passed another act extending the time within which those claims should be produced at the Treasury of Texas, and provided that all not produced by the first Monday of September, 1851, should be forever "barred." Then followed the liquidation act, the terms of which I have endeavored to state to the Senate.

The Senator from Virginia, [Mr. Mason,] in the substitute which he proposes to offer, and which has been printed and laid upon our tables, proposes so far to adopt the action of Texas as to authorize the creditors who hold these claims to receive at the Treasury of the United States the payment of the amount at which their debts have been scaled by Texas. It is very unpleasant for me to say anything upon this subject, and I would very gladly avoid it if I could, but I am bound to say, while I endeavor as far as possible to avoid casting any reproach upon Texas, that it seems to me the Government of the United States owes it to its reputation not to participate in the act by which it is proposed to reduce the claims of these creditors below the value stipulated on their face. This Government has never done so; except under the influence of an inexorable necessity.

We negotiated loans during the war of 1812, when for every hundred dollars of stock issued we received only eighty dollars, and that in depreciated paper. I believe that according to the calculations of a former Secretary of the Treasury, (Mr. Walker,) the depreciation of the bank paper in which we received the money for which we issued the stock, was so great that eighty millions of stock and Treasury notes only yielded the Government about thirty-four millions in specie value, being less than fifty per cent. The British Government, and almost every Government under the sun, has negotiated loans at less than par. Great Britain during the wars which followed 1793, and between that period and 1815, negotiated enormous loans at rates which yielded her, some only sixty-six dollars, some sixty dollars, and one loan of thirty millions sterling, only fifty per cent. In that one instance, she received only £15,000,000 for £30,000,000 of stock issued; yet no one ever heard any objection to paying the full amount of the obligation as stated upon its face. So sacred has the public faith been held, and so important the maintenance of public credit.

I shall probably be told that our revolutionary debt was not paid at par. That is true of a part of it; but it must be recollected that we paid all our foreign revolutionary debt at par, without reference to the amount we received for the stock which we issued. That debt in the year 1790 was, including principal and interest, about $12,000,000, every dollar of which, including even the three per cents., was paid according to the value upon its face. It is true we had incurred an enormous domestic debt by the issue of continental money, which I think a Secretary of the Treasury stated many years ago, in a report, to amount to about $242,000,000, and this with the issues of the States during the Revolution amounted to over $400,000,000. It is very true that these issues of continental money had been promised to be paid at par; but very soon after they had been issued to an amount more than sufficient to supply all the purposes of a currency, they began to decline; and as the issues were enormously increased, so the depreciation went on until finally they fell from par; at which the money was received on its first issue, down to as low as $300, and in some States to $1,000, for one of specie. It is true that a good deal of this money was afterwards funded at the rate of forty dollars for one, and some of it, I believe, was funded, under the act of 1791, at the rate of $100 to one; but that was not because we considered that we had a right to reduce our liabilities arbitrarily or by the scale of depreciation, which at any time indicated the market value of our issues, but because inexorable necessity left us no alternative.

Had not the continental money, under the arrangement of 1780, been redeemed at forty dollars for one, the Government of the Union, in 1790, would have found itself encumbered by a domestic debt, including the issues of the States, of quite $400,000,000, the interest of which, even at three per cent., would have amounted to $12,000,000. It would certainly have been impossible that it could have given any additional value to these enormous sums by funding them; because it never would have been able to pay the interest. The whole exports of the country, in 1790, were only $15,000,000. All the expenditure of General Washington's Administration were only $2,000,000 a year, and it would have been utterly impossible to pay the current expenses of the Government, and also even the fourth part of the interest of this enormous sum of money. The truth is, it was a question of possibility and impossibility. The nation was in a state of bankruptcy, and to this inexorable necessity we yielded, paying, however, our foreign debt-holders every dollar of their demands. Such, however, is not the necessity of the Government now. Such is not the necessity of Texas at this time; and although gentlemen may conclude that Texas is able to pay those debts of her own contracting, the fact is, that she has not paid them; that she does not propose to pay them, dollar for dollar; and that the plan upon which she proposes to liquidate them is not satisfactory to her creditors. They are unwilling to accede to it, and come back to us, reminding us of our original obligation, on the transfer of the pledged fund, to apply at least that fund to the payment of their claims. They remind us of our vain endeavors to escape from our obligations, by the conditions of the resolutions of annexation, of the admission made, at all events, by the boundary act of 1850; and they make an appeal to us on grounds of manifest justice and equity, and make it apparent that if Texas were now in the possession of the revenues from duties in her own ports, and on her own consumption, she would have ample means to pay those pledges. The United States are receiving all those duties on imports, to an amount greatly exceeding the interest upon this debt, for which it is claimed that they are liable to the creditors of Texas. For it will be recollected that her revenue, in 1844, from customs, was $177,000. Her population has been quadrupled since that time, and the capacity of that population for consumption has increased in a much greater ratio than the population itself; so that, in all probability, the revenues which this Government derives from the duties on goods imported into and consumed in Texas, are not less than $1,000,000 a year, and they are rapidly increasing. This Government, therefore, has got from the annexation of Texas and the diversion to our Treasury of duties on her consumption of imported articles, a fund much more than sufficient to enable it to pay all this debt of Texas, principal and interest, in a reasonable time.

It is true that we have provided for the issue of $5,000,000 of stock to Texas, which has not yet left the Treasury, and which, under this bill, will not leave it. The condition upon which these five millions were to be issued to Texas is, that releases shall be filed at the Treasury of the United States of all the revenue debt of that Republic. A literal compliance with this provision is necessary before the stock can be issued. When that provision was made, it was anticipated that Texas would make an arrangement herself with her creditors, and that was the course of argument used here. Gentlemen will very well recollect that it was then said that the State of Texas could better arrange with her creditors than we could, and that it was much to be desired that she should make such an arrangement. But, sir, she has not made such arrangement. Two years and more have passed away since the passage of the boundary act, and no progress towards such an arrangement has been made with any of the creditors of these classes. How long is the Government of the United States to wait? What is a reasonable time? It seems to me that we have arrived at a period when it is proper, since Texas does not make the arrangement which was contemplated under the provisions of the boundary act, and does not thus protect the Treasury of the United States from the demands of these claimants, that we should now, taking care that we do not violate our compact with Texas, make such an arrangement for ourselves; and that is what this bill proposes to do.

This bill, as amended, or as proposed to be amended by the Committee on Finance, authorizes the issue of this stock to the creditors of Texas, and in return we are to take from them assignments of their claims against Texas. We are not to take releases but assignments. Then the condition upon which the reserved $5,000,000 are to be paid to Texas will not occur, and the necessity for their issue can never arise. Indeed, if it be necessary, we can hold these evidences of Texan debt which we may receive under the provisions of this bill as an offset against any claim that Texas might have for the $5,000,000.

Texas herself has proposed to us that we shall modify the act of 1850; but we do not propose to modify that act. We propose that, inasmuch as the provisions of that act do not seem to be likely to be carried into effect by Texas, (by her procuring releases from these creditors,) to make an arrangement with them ourselves; and that arrangement in nowise conflicts with the provisions of that compact. There is nothing in the compact itself which forbids it; nothing in reason and common sense which shows a conflict between them. We know very well that the Government of the United States is under an obligation to pay five per cent. on the sales of the public lands to certain States of the Union, and that too by compact; and yet when we hold stocks of such States as are entitled to this five per cent. fund, and they are in default for payment of interest or principal on our investments in their bonds or stocks, we do not hesitate to withhold that five per cent. fund; and indeed, by a joint resolution of Congress, passed in 1845, the Secretary of the Treasury has been expressly directed to withhold the percentage upon the proceeds of the sales of the public lands within the limits of any such defaulting State. This bill proposes, at the most, nothing more than that; and I am not sure that it goes even to that extent. Provision is made for satisfying the creditors and taking assignments of their claims. No provision is made for withholding the five millions from Texas, because it was not supposed to be necessary, since the occasion upon which the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to issue the five millions of stock would not occur.

I shall now consider the amendments which the Committee on Finance propose to the bill. The first is to strike out, in the second section, the words "a full discharge and relinquishment of 'any alleged or actual claim upon the United 'States for, or on account of the same, and also 'assigning to the United States, and delivering all 'the certificates or other evidences of said debt," and inserting in lieu of them these words: "A full 'assignment of the said certificates or other evi-'dences of said debt, and where any original cer-'tificates or other evidences of said debt have been 'surrendered up to the authorities of the State of 'Texas, and new certificates have been issued 'therefor by the said State, said new certificates 'shall be received as evidence of the original 'amount of the claim." It is well, perhaps, that I should explain this. The first part of the amendment is to make the bill correspond with the plan which I have sketched out to the Senate, so that assignments of those certificates shall be filed at the Treasury, instead of releases. The second part of the amendment provides for this case. Under the acts of the State of Texas, by which her creditors have been called upon to file their claims at her treasury, many of the original evidences of debt have been surrendered up, and new certificates of debt have been issued. These new certificates state the original amount of the claim for which they were given, the rate of interest payable upon them, &c. In order to show what the original character of the claim was, the original certificate not being in the possession of the holder, it is necessary to provide that the substituted certificate shall be received as evidence of the original claim; otherwise it would fail entirely.

The next amendment is to insert a third section, the object of which is to make more specific the general provisions of the second section; and to state distinctly what are the classes of the public debt to which the stock provided by this bill shall be applied in payment, so that there shall be no possibility of any mistake in any future Secretary of the Treasury, or by the claimants themselves. It therefore distinctly provides—

"That the classes of the public debt of the Republic of Texas mentioned in the foregoing section are those for payment of the principal or interest of which the revenue from customs was specially pledged, or for which a pledge of the revenues generally was made, whether borne on the face of the obligations or given by the act of the Republic of Texas of January 14th, 1840, or which were made receivable for public dues, excluding such evidences of debt as were authorized by law subsequent to the said act of January 14th, 1840, unless the act so authorizing them contained such pledge, or made them receivable for public dues; and excluding also all other debts not evidenced by Treasury notes or interest-bearing bonds."

The other amendments are merely formal.

Now, sir, I may be asked why I have not provided for payment out of the Treasury of the United States of these claims in cash? To that I would answer, in the first place, it is rather a large amount, and it might not be altogether convenient to the Treasury of the United States to pay in cash, especially in view of contingencies which may arise, and for which every prudent Government will always take care to hold a sufficient amount of funds in reserve. In the next place, the issue of three per cent. stock will be perfectly satisfactory to the creditors of Texas, and if they are satisfied I do not see any reason why others should complain. And in the third place, this plan is unquestionably more advantageous to the Government.

If it be objected that we are about to pay a much larger sum of money to the creditors of Texas, than was reserved under the act of 1850, all I have to say is this: that while the principal of the stock proposed to be issued is undoubtedly $3,333,000 more than that of the reserved five millions, the interest is precisely the same; and that, inasmuch as a three per cent. stock having a long time to run, is never as valuable as a five or six per cent. stock having the same, or a much shorter time to run, and inasmuch as we provide in the bill that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to purchase up this stock in the market whenever there may be more than $7,000,000 in the Treasury, I apprehend the practical effect upon the Treasury of the United States will be to subject it to no greater charge than if the $5,000,000 had actually been issued to Texas. A three per cent. stock, having twenty years to run, will not, I apprehend, command a higher price in market than at most eighty-five per cent. The old revolutionary three per cents, even after the period when they arrived at maturity, commanded, I think, only about ninety, and ten years before, as I am informed by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. CLARKE,] they sold at sixty. I apprehend, therefore, that it would be very easy for the Secretary of the Treasury, in the course of two or three years after the passage of this bill, if it should pass, to purchase the whole of this stock at a saving to the Government of at least fifteen, and perhaps of twenty per cent.; or nearly a million and a half of dollars.

Inasmuch as we can do that within a short space of time, we shall also save interest to a very considerable amount, which would otherwise be accruing. Besides, five millions of five per cent. stock would command a premium in the market, and could not be bought up at par, and probably if an attempt were made to purchase them, they would rise to some eight or ten per cent. premium. The probabilities, therefore, are, especially as five per cent. stocks frequently go into the hands of banks as security for their banking issues, that there might be some difficulty in buying them up at any price; and the Government would go on and pay interest upon those stocks for a series of years, to a greater extent than it would be called upon to pay the interest upon stocks to the amount of $8,333,000 proposed to be issued by this bill, which in all probability can be purchased. There would, therefore, be a considerable gain in the interest, which, added to the difference between the purchase of the stocks in the market at the current rate and their par value, would reduce the amount very much. So that in all probability the Government will suffer no larger loss by the issue of these $8,333,000 three per cent. stocks, than by the issue of five millions of five per cents. If, however, these calculations should be disappointed in part, as they may be, and the United States should eventually lose a million of dollars by the settlement of these claims, it would be a matter of no regret, since it would be a consequence of liabilities incurred by the annexation of Texas, which were foreseen at that period, and which we have vainly endeavored to discharge through the agency of that State.

Having thus briefly presented the principal points of the case, I will postpone further remark until it may be necessary for me to reply to Senators who take different views of the question.

TEXAS DEBT.

SPEECH OF HON. R. M. T. HUNTER,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE SENATE, February 10, 1853,

On the bill to provide for the payment of such creditors of the late Republic of Texas as are comprehended in the act of Congress of September 9, 1850.

Mr. HUNTER said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I was in the minority on the Committee on Finance, from which this bill was reported; and as I have regarded it as one of the most extraordinary demands which I have ever known to be made upon the Treasury of the United States, I should like, in as few words as I can, to present my objections to the measure. I do not think there are any considerations either of justice or equity to sustain this demand; and I believe that if the Senate will give their attention to a brief narrative of the facts of the case, they will concur with me in that opinion.

The joint resolution for the annexation of Texas, contained several provisions which were to be the conditions of that annexation as prescribed in the resolution itself. One was, that the State of Texas should "retain all the vacant and unappro-'priated lands lying within its limits, to be applied 'to the payment of the debts and liabilities of said 'Republic of Texas, and the residue of said lands, 'after discharging said debts and liabilities, to be 'disposed of as said State may direct; but in no 'event are said debts and liabilities to become a 'charge upon the Government of the United 'States." The creditors of Texas were thus notified before the annexation, that the United States would not be bound for its debts, and the public lands of that State were to be set apart to secure the payment of those debts by that State in the event of her accepting the offer of annexation upon the proposed terms. These conditions were accepted by Texas in her act of annexation; and I presume that by those reciprocal acts of mutual legislation, each of them passed upon conditions, the two Governments were as much bound to each other as if the obligation had been incurred under a treaty. I need not argue that point. By those acts the State of Texas became bound to apply her lands as security for the payment of the debts which she owed at the time of the annexation. By that act, too, the creditors were warned that the United States would not be bound for those debts; and as no complaint against the act of annexation or its terms was made by them, it might be fair to imply their assent, if it were necessary to establish that position for the sake of the argument. But as it is not, I waive that point.

The State of Texas was thus annexed to the United States. The United States, it is true, took from Texas its revenue from the customs; but it is also true that the United States relieved it from the charge of a separate army, a separate navy, and a separate diplomatic establishment. In other words, the United States relieved it probably from a burden far more than equivalent to any benefit derived by it from revenue from the customs. Previous to the annexation, Texas had been in an uncertain condition. Its future prospects were uncertain, to say the least of them—so uncertain and so gloomy as to retard settlement and prevent emigration, and the rapid development of its resources. The moment the act of annexation was consummated, the whole state of things was changed. The broad ægis of the Government of the Union was extended over it. Settlement became safe; the country filled up rapidly; and I think that no man can doubt that the creditors of Texas, supposing that they looked only to the State of Texas for the payment of their debts, were placed in a better condition after the annexation than before, when they looked to Texas, even with its whole revenue, for the payment of their debts. I presume that at a time just previous to the period of annexation, if you had put that question to the creditors of Texas, there would not have been one dissenting voice; all of them would have preferred to take their security after the annexation upon the terms prescribed in the act of annexation, than to trust to their chances to the State of Texas alone, if there had been no annexation.

But, sir, the State of Texas was young. It was encumbered with the debt of its revolutionary war. It had vast resources, but they were undeveloped. It was not ready to pay at once. It was in the condition in which our own Government was described to have been by the Senator from Maryland, immediately after our Revolution, and her creditors began to cast a wistful eye towards the Treasury of the United States. We begun to hear it said by them that the United States were bound to pay the debts of Texas, because the United States were in the enjoyment of the receipts from the customs of Texas. The United States have never acknowledged that obligation to this day. It was not acknowledged in the resolutions of annexation, or at the time the boundary act was passed. That act provided that $10,000,000 should be paid to Texas; and inasmuch as that act diminished that fund—to wit: the public lands—which had been established by the act of annexation as security to the creditors of Texas, it substituted what was more than an ample equivalent; it substituted a provision that $5,000,000 of the amount granted by the act should not be paid to the State of Texas until the creditors or at least, all of those for whose debts the customs were pledged, should file their releases in the Treasury of the United States. Thus it will be perceived, that the Government of the United States, throughout the whole matter, adhered to its original theory, to wit: that the debt of Texas, previous to the annexation, was the affair of Texas, and not of the United States. It is provided in the boundary act, that $10,000,000 should be paid—to whom? Not to the creditors—no, sir—but to the State of Texas; reserving, however, the right to retain $5,000,000 in the Treasury of the United States until those creditors who had been secured on the public lands should file their releases in the Treasury of the United States; so that, so far from this provision in the boundary act being a recognition of an obligation on the part of the United States to pay the debts of the State of Texas before the annexation, it is an adherence to the original idea that the debts of Texas were the affairs of Texas, and that the United States would do no more than secure to the creditors whatever was to be received by the compact with the United States, from its public lands.

The State of Texas, in looking into those obligations, has chosen to say that she owed but a certain sum, and that she would scale those obligations; that she was not bound to pay what appeared to be due upon their face, but would only pay the amount of cash value which she had actually received; and I understand from a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Texas, that the table upon which the debt was scaled was one which the creditors at a meeting originally presented as a scheme which they would be willing to take. The State of Texas scaled the debt according to that table; but the creditors finding that they could not receive dollar for dollar from the State, or that they would not receive, according to that law, even the whole five millions, have now come back upon us, and a proposition is introduced here to pay them not only the five millions for which we were bound by the boundary act, but to pay them instead, $8,333,333 33⅓—that is, such a principal sum as will amount, at three per cent., to the same annual interest with five millions at five per cent.

I object to this proposition for several reasons. One is, that if we do this, we assume for the United States a liability for the debt of Texas. Another is, that after assuming that liability, if we discharge it as is here proposed, we do what we are reproaching Texas for doing—we are repudiating a portion of the debt and scaling it; for this sum will not pay dollar for dollar on the face of the obligations for which, according to the Secretary of the Treasury, the revenues from the customs of Texas were bound; and in the next place, not only is it an act of repudiation in that point of view, but it is laying violent hands upon money which we promised to pay to Texas, for the boundary act provides, not that we should pay it to the creditors, but to Texas herself, when the creditors should have filed their releases.

Suppose that we were to pay these $8,333,333 33⅓, does any man suppose that Texas would not come in and claim the $5,000,000 which were due to her by this statute, this solemn compact, upon the consideration of the vast domain which she ceded for the $10,000,000? She would come in, and I do not hesitate to say that she would be entitled to the $5,000,000, if she chose to demand it. She has given the land, and she has a right to insist that we adhere to our compact, whatever it be, and we have no right to refuse to do it. I admit we may refuse to pay these $5,000,000 until these creditors file their release, but we have no right to take that fund out of the Treasury, and distribute it, upon any principles which we may choose to establish, amongst these creditors. In other words, we have no right to take one of the sovereign States of this Confederacy, and put it under a commission of bankruptcy; none whatever.

But I perceive that an attempt has been made by the honorable Senator from Maryland, with that ability and ingenuity for which he is distinguished, to show that we are not in effect assuming the liability of the debt of Texas by paying the $8,333,333 33⅓ instead of $5,000,000, because he says, in point of fact, the two sums are equivalent. Why, Mr. President, there is an easy answer to this. If the eight and one third millions of stock, payable at the end of twenty years, with an interest of three per cent., is worth more to the creditors of Texas than five millions at five per cent., to run for fourteen years, it must cost more to the United States to pay that sum. That is simple enough. But, sir, it is a question of arithmetic—it is one of figures, which is very easily decided. Eight and a third millions with three per cent. interest for twenty years, will amount to thirteen and one third millions; that is, at the end of twenty years, when we shall have paid the three per cent. interest, and when we come to redeem the principal, we shall have paid in the whole thirteen and one third millions. Five millions at five per cent. for fourteen years, after the time is elapsed when we have paid interest and principal, will amount to $8,500,000. So that one proposition costs more than the other, according to that calculation, by $4,833,333 33⅓. Or take it in another way. Take it according to the present value of the stock. I made inquiries last summer, and was informed that it was the opinion of an intelligent financier and dealer in stocks in New York, well acquainted with such things, that at that time a three per cent. stock, to run for twenty years, would yield what the Senator from Maryland said, to wit: eighty-five cents in the dollar. So that the present value of eight and one third millions, or the value at that time for which it sold in the market, would have been $7,083,050. At the same time, the then value of five millions of five per cent. stock for fourteen years, which he estimated at 106, would have been $5,300,000. So that this proposition is dearer to the United States than the other by the difference between $5,300,000 and $7,083,000. Or, if I chose to go into it, there is another way of calculating. I might take the present value of the eight and one third millions payable twenty years hence, and add to it the value of an annuity for $250,000 for twenty years; and upon applying the same principle to a five million loan, we should find almost as great a difference as in any of the modes in which I have presented the calculation. But there can be no doubt about this. There can be no doubt that when we pay eight and one third millions in three per cent. stock to run twenty years, we pay more than if we paid what the boundary act requires us to pay, viz: five millions of five per cent. stock having fourteen years to run.

It is obvious, then, that upon this proposition we shall pay more than we are bound to do by our boundary act; and if we pay it, we must do so upon the principle that we are bound for that debt of Texas If our obligations extend beyond that act and cover a part, they cover the whole This, sir, must be manifest to all.

But if we pay the eight and one third millions, and no more, upon this supposition, is it not obvious that we are doing the very thing for which Texas is reproached? If these eight and one third millions be worth only eighty-five cents on the dollar, and if the debt, for which the customs of Texas were bound, amounts to eight and one third millions, as the Senator from Maryland has stated—and it amounts to more, as I shall presently show—is it not obvious that we are paying that debt at eighty-five cents on the dollar, instead of paying it according to its face? If we owe it, what right have we to scale it in that manner? Or if we do scale it in that manner, how does it lie in our mouths to charge Texas for having adopted a similar scheme? If we are to scale it, there must be some discrimination such as Texas has made. The man who furnished a dollar's worth for every dollar for which the State is indebted to him, must be entitled to more than the man who furnished but twenty-five cents' worth on the dollar. If they are to be scaled, there must be some equitable principle upon which it should be done.

But I deny that the United States are liable for the debt of Texas. I deny that they are liable for the debt of Texas according to the law of nations or the law of nature, and I think I can show it. I know that there is a great array of very respectable opinions—nay, sir, of the highest legal opinions amongst living authorities—opposed to my view; but I must say, from the examination which I have given to the subject, that these opinions seem to have been very loosely and hastily given.

We have the opinion, first, of Mr. Reverdy Johnson. Mr. Johnson says:

"That whatever rights belonged to each State separately before they were united, will afterwards be the rights of the collective State, and the same obligations that each State were under separately before, the collective State will be under afterwards."—Grotius, v. 2, ch. 9, sec. 9.

Let us see now, how far his authority sustains him. I will read the whole of section nine, of chapter nine, of book second, of Grotius, which is as follows:

"But if two nations be united, the rights of neither of them shall be lost and become common, as the rights of the Sabines first, and afterwards of the Albans, were transferred to the Romans, and so when they made one State, as Livy expresses it. The same may be also adjudged of kingdoms which are really and truly united, and not only by a treaty of alliance, or because they have but one prince."

Now, according to Mr. Johnson's quotation from Grotius, the same obligations which each State was under separately, the collective State was under afterwards. Not at all. Mr. Johnson gives us his own inference instead of the text, which refers to a different matter. To understand the text we must look to the instance, which is taken from the early dawn of Roman history—from its early twilight, if I may use the term—and refers to the old history of the adoption of the Sabines and Albans by the Romans, into the rights of citizenship. Livy says in each instance to which Grotius refers, that they were carried to Rome, and there admitted equally to the rights of citizenship; and yet upon this instance, doubtful as it is, so remote, so ancient, is to be founded this grave principle of public law, by which we are to be charged with these $8,000,000. Sir, I know that it was said that the Romans stole the Sabine women, but I believe it is nowhere recorded, either in history or fable, that they ever paid a Sabine debt, or the debt of any other people whom they ever conquered or united to their empire. Such a thing is not found even in the myths of that early day, much less in history. And yet, upon that old instance thus stated by Grotius, and thus unconsciously perverted—because I know it was not designed by that distinguished gentleman—we have the grave position laid down that we are bound to pay the debts of Texas. Where is it to be found in Roman history that the Roman people held themselves bound for the debts of conquered provinces? Where can the instance be shown? Grotius was too well read in that history to make such an assertion.

Next comes the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury. He is a little more cautious. He says that—

"It will be found that all writers on public law, having any authority, are agreed upon this point from the time of Grotius to the present. Indeed, the proposition thus asserted is so obviously just that it is not possible for a nation in modern times to controvert it without forfeiting that character for justice and probity which, happily for mankind, has become indispensable for sovereign States."

This reference is so general, that I do not know how to meet it. I can only stand on the old maxim—De non apparentibus, et non existentibus, eadem est ratio. When the authority is presented, I hope and believe I shall be able to meet it.

The Senator from Maryland is a little more precise. He quoted a dictum of Wildman, taken from Vattel, and founded upon a single instance in German history. I mean the cession of Silesia by the Empress of Austria; a cession made in her right, as Queen of Poland, to the King of Prussia. That was done by the treaties of Breslau and Berlin, about the year 1742, as the Senator from Maryland has said. But it must be observed, when you come to look at this, that the instance referred to does not sanction the principle as laid down by Vattel and Wildman in these general views. Allow me, however, to go one step further before I come to analyze the instance, and show what principle it does justify. I say if that principle were acknowledged by nations as they have stated it, their own case would not be in point here, because when Silesia was united to Prussia, she lost all her former nationality; if, indeed, she could be said to have had any; it was totally merged, and she had no Government left but that of Prussia. She did not reserve an independent Government like that of Texas, with independent resources left her afterwards to which her creditors could refer.

But, sir, I maintain that the instance itself does not sanction the position as laid down by these writers. Why, sir, what was the treaty of Breslau and Berlin? It was a treaty which closed one of those long wars between the Empress of Austria and the King of Prussia. It contained a variety of mutual stipulations; it contained stipulations with regard to religious rites. It ceded Silesia here, and it ceded to the Empress of Austria certain rights in Bohemia there. It settled all the matters in conflict between them, and it was provided, inasmuch as the Empress of Austria had made this cession, that a debt which she owed, not as the owner of Silesia, but as the Empress of Austria, which had been hypothecated upon her revenues in Silesia, should be transferred to the King of Prussia. And what was more natural? It was a debt due to the English and Dutch, and secured upon this branch of her revenue, not as a debt of Silesia, but as a debt of the Empress. And it is to be observed, that the guarantor to that treaty was the Government of Great Britain, which promised to bring in the United Provinces as joint guarantors with itself. What so natural as that in the arrangement of this treaty and the settlement of these mutual equivalents, the Empress of Austria should have provided for the convenience of the parties guaranteeing the treaty, and for the convenience of all the parties to the treaty, that she would pay off her debt to England and Holland, by simply transferring to them the obligation due to her from the King of Prussia? Now, sir, to have made this a case in point—and these authorities seemed to be conscious of it, for they say that without the treaty it would have resulted from a natural law—this ought to have been the state of things. If the Empress of Austria had ceded Silesia without saying one word about the debt to the King of Prussia, and the King of Prussia had paid the debt on the ground that it went with Silesia, then it would have been a case in point to establish the law of nations, as Vattel has laid it down. But this was a mere matter of arrangement between the parties, made not on account of any obligation under the law of nations, but for mutual convenience. And again, I say, that even if it established that, it would fall far short of the case now before us, because in the case of Texas, resources were left to her, which were large enough to meet her debts; a separate and independent government was left to her; she remained a sovereign State, and there was ample security for her creditors.

But let us go a little further, because I wish to trace this principle which has been laid down as one of national law, to show that it never has been regarded by the nations of the earth as national law, and will probably never be so regarded. There are other instances in which one nation, on account of conquering or obtaining by cession the provinces of another, has been bound by its debts. But I believe I may safely assert, that in all these cases it was a matter of express treaty stipulation. As a proof that this was done by arrangement, and not from any view of being bound to it by the law of nations, it will be found that whenever provinces have been taken without any treaty, the conquering nation never has paid the public debt, or any part of it, for the nation from whom the territory was wrested. Thus, in the treaty between Denmark and Sweden, where Norway was ceded by Denmark to Sweden, and Swedish Pomerania was taken by Denmark—I speak of the treaty of Kiel, in 1814—it was specially provided, as a matter of arrangement and calculation, that Sweden, taking Norway, should pay a certain portion of the debt of Denmark; and Denmark taking Swedish Pomerania should pay the debt of that province. But, sir, just before that, a treaty had been made between Sweden and Russia, at Fredericksham, in 1809, under which Sweden lost Finland. There was no stipulation about the debts, and none were ever paid by Russia for Sweden, because the matter was left to be regulated by the law of nations, which prescribed no such thing.

But how was it with us? We took a portion of the territory of Mexico. Well, sir, if the law is good for the whole it is good for a part. If we would have been bound for the whole of the debt of Mexico to third parties if we had taken the whole of Mexico, it would seem to be but obvious justice that we should be bound for a part of the debt of Mexico, when we took a part of her territory. But when we took a part of her territory, were we bound for any portion of its debts? Just as much as we are bound for the Texas debt, incurred before annexation. If this principle were true as a principle of public law, we should be bound to pay a portion of it. How would it operate? Suppose we were to take the position, and admit that we should have been bound for the whole debt of Mexico, if we had conquered it, what is the result? Why, she could have obtained what funds she pleased to fight us with; because the creditors would know that they would be paid in any event. If Mexico succeeded, she would be bound; if we had conquered and absorbed her, we should have been bound to pay the very debt she had contracted to fight us with. Could there be any such principle under the law of nations? Does the history of nations show any such practice to sanction such a principle? Are there precedents for it? None, sir. The only case which has been produced, is one of special treaty stipulation, and it was a case in which it was no debt of Silesia, but a debt of the Empress of Austria, hypothecated upon her revenues in Silesia, and under circumstances which showed the manifest convenience of making this special arrangement. Why, sir, we have come to a pretty pass, if, notwithstanding our own act upon that statute-book, where we affirm that we were not bound and would not be bound, we are made to pay this debt upon such dicta as these, and drawn from such precedents as the history of old Roman transactions with the Sabines and Albans may furnish us with upon such a subject as this. Are, then, the authorities to be produced here to saddle the United States with such a debt as this? I hardly know, sir, how to characterize such a pretension. It is not the law of nations; and so far as we can judge the matter, we have settled and decided that question. We decided it in the joint resolutions of annexation, and we adhered to that theory of our obligation in the terms of the boundary act itself.

That the principles to the extent to which Vattel has carried them are not sustained by the practice of nations, and cannot be true, I think I have proved. Still, sir, there is some foundation of truth for them, and to some extent he is sustained by the practice of nations. When one nation conquers another, a third party which holds a right of way or fishery within the limits of that conquest, does not lose its rights thereby. To argue that, the third party must be conquered, and that is not pretended. Its right to this use of territory is as perfect as if it had held a portion of the soil itself. This right is very different from the one set up here. The one is compatible with the rights of conquest, the other not; the one is capable of definition and capable of enforcement, the other is indefinite and incapable of enforcement.

Well, sir, if we are not bound by our own stipulations, and not bound by the law of nations to pay this debt, how are we bound? Are we morally bound? Why? If so, it can only be because that the fact of our taking the customs of Texas has disabled her from paying her creditors, which it may be maintained would not have been the case, had she never been annexed. If, on the other hand, Texas was placed in a position, and in circumstances of greater ability to pay these debts in consequence of the act of annexation, although she lost her customs, than she would have been without the act of annexation, the creditors have no moral claim against us, because we have improved their condition. How is it, sir? We all know that the effect of the annexation was to give her peace, and to encourage settlements, and facilitate immigration and population. We all know that the State of Texas, as a State, was amply labe to pay the debt which she had conteracted. She had a hundred millions of acres of land which were bound for that debt. She had, last year, at the time I made inquiries into that subject, between eight and nine millions of money in her Treasury and in our Treasury together, which she might have applied to that purpose. In order to show these facts, I would like to have read a letter which I received from one of the gentlemen who represent her on this floor.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, August 23, 1852.

DEAR SIR: I have received your note, asking, "first, What is the amount of the United States indemnity now in the Treasury at Austin?

"Second. What is the estimated quantity of the public domain in Texas?

"Third. Since the act of 1851, are you aware that the creditors of Texas have by any authorized committee petitioned her Legislature to pay the difference between the scaled rate and face value of the securities and certificates of stock of her public debt?

"Fourth. What do you estimate the first class, or, in other words, the debt for which the revenues were specially pledged, estimating the interest to the 1st of April, 1853, according to the admission of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States?"

By the first inquiry, I presume you desire to know what amount of the $5,000,000 already paid over to Texas remains in her treasury. I am informed, upon what I regard as good authority, that she has appropriated to the payment of a portion of the debt decided by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States not to be included in the proviso in the boundary act, $1,096,833 12, which, I presume, has been paid. I understand that about $200,000 have been appropriated for other purposes, which would leave in her treasury $3,794,166 88, besides the interest on the $5,000,000. The Legislature of Texas has appropriated $3,480,297 52, to be paid to the creditors included in the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, on condition that the proviso in the boundary act be so modified by Congress as that Texas may receive from the Treasury the amount for which she may file the releases contemplated in the proviso of the said act.

To the second inquiry: I think the public domain of the State is estimated at not less than one hundred millions of acres.

In answer to your third inquiry: I believe some three or four creditors did so petition. The largest number, I understand, have not, either by themselves or any authorized committee, taken any such steps, and I am informed that no definitive action was had upon the petitions that were filed.

Your fourth and last inquiry presents an interrogatory which it is difficult to answer, as it involves several questions, arising out of the laws of Texas, and the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, of the 13th of September, 1851. I inclose you the joint report of the Auditor and Comptroller of the State of Texas, dated 12th November, 1851, subsequently to the Secretary's decision, which shows that the total ostensible debt, including interest, is $12,436,991 34. If you deduct from that amount $1,738,872 27, decided by the Secretary, as I understand his decision, not to fall under the proviso, it would leave $10,698,119 07, not including the additional interest which seems to be contemplated by the report of the Committee on Finance.

I also inclose copies of the several acts of the State of Texas in relation to her public debt.

Yours very truly, THOMAS J. RUSK.

Hon. R. M. T. HUNTER,
Chairman Committee on Finance,
United States Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, so we see that to meet this debt, which at its highest estimate is $10,000,000, Texas had one hundred million acres of land, and at that time last summer, between eight and nine millions of dollars in her Treasury and the Treasury of the United States together. Sir, she was at that day, and she is at this time, in proportion to her population, perhaps the richest State in this Confederacy. There is no State better able to meet the demands upon it, the legal and just demands upon it, than Texas. How, then, can her creditors say we are morally bound, if we, by the consequences of this annexation, have contributed to such a state of the treasury as exists in Texas? Can it be said that we have diminished her pecuniary and fiscal ability to meet her liabilities by this act of annexation with the conditions presented? Not at all. We have increased that capacity; and I believe that we took away from Texas a source of expenditure fully equal, ay, sir, greater, in the event she had remained an independent nation, than her customs would have met. How is it with us? Our customs, together with the receipts from the lands, hardly maintain this Government in the discharge of just such functions as the State of Texas was relieved from by the annexation. This Government is employed in managing our foreign relations and those between the States, which would have been an additional source of expenditure to independent Texas. To meet these obligations we have expended our whole revenue and are in debt. Is it likely, then, that under the state of things which existed before annexation, the revenue derived from customs by Texas would have sustained her army and navy and foreign diplomatic establishment? I hazard nothing in affirming that it is not probable that the revenue from customs would have sufficed to maintain her independence and her relation to foreign nations. If, then, we are in any way answerable to the creditors of Texas for having deprived them of the means of collecting their debts, it is not because we took from Texas the pecuniary and fiscal capacity to pay it, but because we took from her the desire to do so, and lowered and injured her moral tone. Will that be maintained? Will it be said, that although Texas is able, as everybody admits she is, she will not do it, because of any injury to her moral tone by annexation to the United States? That, sir, is the only ground that can be maintained. It is manifest, if we are to be charged with preventing Texas from paying her creditors, that she is able to pay now, and if we are accountable at all, we are to be charged not because she cannot, but because she will not pay these debts.

With regard to the mode which she has taken for disposing of these debts, what concern is it of ours? Have we a right to intervene between a sovereign State of this Confederacy and its creditors, and say how it shall settle those debts? Are we not bound by those courtesies due from one Government to another, to abstain from such a course of legislation as that would be? For how could we offer a greater insult to a State than thus to put it under a commission of bankruptcy?

Mr. President, are our own hands so clean, according to the history given of our previous financial transactions by the honorable Senator from Maryland, that we can afford thus to intervene, in this summary and high-handed manner? Why, he tells us we scaled our own obligations after the revolutionary war, because we were not able to pay them. If we were not able to pay them then, we have been since. There is a petition now before the Committee on Finance, praying us to pay one of those old revolutionary certificates according to its face. And if we are going to take up this principle of paying every debt due, according to the face of the obligation, why do we not go back and pay our own revolutionary debts, scaled in the ratio of one hundred to one?—scaled, as well as I recollect, upon the principle of paying only the specie value of the certificate at the time of the funding of the debt. Suppose we were to apply the same principle to the Texas debt, how do we know that it would amount to any more than Texas has agreed to pay? But is our Government, or is Texas the only Government that has done this? Did not Great Britain herself in effect repudiate her debt during her wars with Napoleon? Did she not suspend specie payments by her banks, and pay her creditors in depreciated paper? What was that but a virtual repudiation to a certain extent? And what nation that has dealt largely in paper money has not done it?

But at the same time that I say this, I would express the hope that Texas, which has such ample means, will provide for the payment of all that is justly due from her. I believe that ultimately she will. I am not authorized to speak for her. I do not know what is due, nor is it my concern to inquire. All I know is, that there is a stipulation to which I am bound to look, that these five millions shall not be paid without the assent of Texas and the release of the creditors. When I say without the releases of the creditors, I do not mean to be understood as being opposed to paying those separately who are willing to take what Texas tenders, and to release the United States from further demands. I am bound to that, not by the law of nations or the law of nature, but by our own special obligation, and I will stand to that; but beyond the express obligation of the boundary act we are not bound to pay one cent. Especially would I not pay it in this discourteous manner towards one of the States in this Confederacy.

Sir, let us look a little further into this matter, and see to what it would lead us. If this demand is sustained at all, it must be upon the ground, that inasmuch as we have the customs of Texas and are enjoying a portion of her revenue, we are bound to pay her creditors, because the public creditors are entitled to all before any portion goes to domestic purposes; and that our Government in its operation upon Texas, pro tanto, is for domestic purposes, and that therefore we are bound to pay. I say that if it can be sustained at all, it is only upon this ground, for the other pretensions are manifestly without foundations of justice. There is no such obligation under the law of nations, and if we take this position, how will it be with our repudiating States and their foreign debtors? May not those foreign nations, which are accustomed to collect the debts due to their citizens at the point of the bayonet, come forward with much more reason and say to us, "Here are the States of your Confederacy that have contracted debts. We are in the habit of dealing summarily with other nations. You interpose between us and them, and say we shall not collect our debts, and not only that, but you collect your own dues from them for domestic purposes. You collect your customs from them, and yet you do not pay us one cent. Now you must do one of two things: You are bound either to pay us, or you are bound to let us collect our debts from these States as we collect them from other nations." Would not that be a stronger argument for the assumption of any State debt due abroad than the argument here urged in relation to the Texas debt? I think it would be.

I think there is but one safe ground on which we can possibly stand, and that is, that the persons who deal with the States of our Confederacy take the risk, because they deal knowing the relation in which they stand to us, and to the rest of the world. And so those who dealt with Texas knew the risks when they were dealing with her and charged her accordingly. There is no doubt that they charged Texas for everything furnished her with profits enough to cover the insurance.

Sir, we tread here upon dangerous ground; let us take care how we commit ourselves to principles which may possibly have so dangerous an application in the future. The principle as laid down by the creditors of Texas may serve their own purposes of present convenience; but the United States, I think, in view of the peculiar form of our Government, should hesitate long before they adopt it. I do not believe myself that it is a principle either of the law of nature or of nations; for that cannot be said to be a law of nations which nations have never sanctioned by their usages and practices, whatever may be the opinion of elementary writers in regard to the subject as a matter of abstract inquiry. But I will not further prolong my inquiry into the question before us.

It was my purpose to present as briefly as I could the facts of the case, and the reasoning which has led me to a conclusion so opposite to that at which the honorable Senator from Maryland has arrived, and having done that, I take my seat.

TEXAS DEBT.

SPEECH OF HON. SAM HOUSTON,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE SENATE, February 11, 1853,

On the bill to provide for the payment of such creditors of the late Republic of Texas as are comprehended in the act of Congress of September 9, 1850.

Mr. HOUSTON said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am very reluctant to occupy a moment of the precious time of the Senate, and particularly when other matters which are, in the estimation of honorable gentlemen, of so much urgency are pressed upon the attention of the body. But the bill before the Senate seems to implicate the character of the State of which I am in part the representative on this floor, and demands of her Senators at least an explanation. If they are incapable of vindicating her reputation; if she cannot be justified in the course which she has adopted, no excuse will be rendered for it, and to determine upon the merits of her claims to consideration and to the due regard of her sister States, it is proper that we should advert to the circumstances under which those debts originated, and under which they are held by the present claimants.

Texas, when she rose from her revolutionary struggle, did not owe much more than $2,000,000; and more concurred in the opinion that she owed but a million and a half than that her debt exceeded two millions. This constituted the amount of her entire liabilities at that time, and up to the year 1838. From the period of the commencement of her separate Government, in the fall of 1836, down to the winter of 1838, her entire debt did not exceed $2,500,000, embracing all her liabilities; and her entire currency in circulation was less than half a million. It was from 1838 up to the end of 1841, that the debt accumulated from two and a half millions to the enormous sum of twelve millions of dollars. This was not, as gentlemen seem to understand it in most instances, a debt created by the sale of bonds, pledging the faith of Texas for their redemption; for a little more than one million of bonds are all that are outstanding against Texas. The other debts have resulted from her currency. The impression has gone abroad that Texas was placed on a footing with other States, Indiana, Illinois, Pennsylvania, Mississippi, and others, who sold their bonds at a depreciation, and that, therefore, the question would not arise whether she received the full value of those bonds or not; but that she was bound to pay them at their face; that she had received the most that could be obtained for them, and that the risk justified the depreciation of price at which they were purchased.

I know that these are the impressions which have gone abroad throughout the community; and if Texas, when her credit was low and depressed, had been compelled to raise means for the support of her armies and for the expenses of her civil list, and had for that purpose sold bonds calling on their face for a hundred cents to the dollar, and had only received fifty cents, she would yet have been bound in good faith to redeem them according to the letter of the liability, and would have had no excuse for shrinking from punctually meeting her obligations but inability to pay her debts. But when we look into the nature of the liabilities of Texas, we find that, with the exception of about one million of dollars, they are of a very different character from what has been generally supposed. Texas issued promissory notes. Up to 1838, these passed currently at par. A change in the administration of the Government then took place, and the first act of the new Administration was to raise new regiments for the purpose of defending the frontiers, as it was said, and then, although the previous amount allowed to the Executive for frontier defense had been inconsiderable, it was swelled up by appropriations to the amount of a million and a half of dollars, and the civil list had no less than half a million appropriated to support it.

The throwing of these two millions of dollars of promissory notes into circulation, had the effect of lowering the value of the former currency, and the whole depreciated at least fifty per cent., and gradually declined from that to the lowest point of depression. Successive issues were made, and the depreciation continued during the years 1839, 1840, and 1841; and in proportion as the issues were increased the depreciation went on. During that period immense expenditures were incurred and liabilities issued, for which there was not the semblance of authority. The Santa Fé expedition was fitted out, and must have cost more than one million of dollars; and that expenditure was incurred, not only without authority, but in positive violation of the expressed will of the two Houses of the Texan Congress, by a mere dictum of the Executive. The arms and munitions of war of the country were entirely expended in that expedition; and accumulated expenditures were bequeathed to the succeeding Administration. Thus issues to the amount of millions were made without authority, and they became valueless. In December, 1841, Texas suspended payment because she was then unable to pay her debts.

But here let me ask, Who are these creditors who now come forward with such plaintive appeals to this body? Who are they who are imploring the commiseration of Senators: "Help us or we sink?" Are they men who were sufferers by the Texan revolutionary struggle? or are they men who speculated upon the individuals who went through the toils and dangers of that revolution? These promissory notes depreciated in the hands of men who had toiled and fought in the revolution, men who had there given their services and their energies to the cause of independence. In their hands the notes depreciated until they became valueless. They were then thrown upon the market, they were seized upon by speculators. At auctions, in the streets of our cities and villages, they were submitted to public sale and cried off at from three cents to five cents, "Going, going, gone." Then it was that these speculators came in and secured their claims to the generosity and clemency of Texas, and the feeling and commiseration of this body! There were no bonds sold in market for what they would bring; but these were promissory notes sold for a mere song under the auctioneer's hammer, and "in quantities to suit purchasers," for they were piled up as large as cotton bales. When they were cried up till they reached about three cents on the dollar, they would be knocked down to the bidder, and he would be told to go and select from the pile as many as he wanted; he might take a bundle as large as a cotton bale. [Laughter.]

That is the way in which these evidences of debt were obtained. These are the liabilities for which gentlemen claim a hundred cents on the dollar, and which were acquired at the rate of from one to three or five cents on the dollar. No doubt gentlemen in the United States thought the prospect was very fine; they knew that the Texans were descended from the Anglo-Saxon stock, and that they would maintain their liberty in defiance of every difficulty; for the American race never retreated, never took one step backwards, and that from the day they had impressed their footsteps upon a perilous soil, they would go on. Such gentlemen, perhaps, thought that if the Texans were involved in difficulties, they might venture to sell real estate and get money when there was a prospect of investing it in Texas depreciated paper to much advantage. No doubt under these circumstances gentlemen in the United States purchased large amounts of the promissory notes of Texas at ten cents on the dollar, and now come forward and claim one hundred cents on the dollar! To exemplify it more particularly, I will state, that such was the depreciation of Texas currency, that, for instance, if a judge, getting a salary of $3,000, came forward to receive it, and his demand was exhibited, he would receive in Treasury notes $30,000, based upon no issue of bonds, but upon credit. In his hands, the money depreciated, until, perhaps, it became worthless, and then it was thrown into the market in some village, and purchased up by speculators at from one to three or five cents.

This is the character of the Texas liabilities. This is the manner in which they have been bought. What justice, therefore, would there be in giving a hundred cents upon the dollar for their redemption, when they were acquired at rates varying from one cent to five cents? Is Texas bound in good faith to do it? Was the risk to these gentlemen worth the difference between three cents and a hundred cents on the dollar? I think not. Then, let me ask, has Texas evinced a disposition to pay her debts in good faith, and according to the rules of equity?

Upon these funds thus passed away at the most depreciated rates, and that were purchased up at a mere nominal rate, Texas has determined to pay upon none, no matter for what they were bought, less than twenty cents on the dollar, and from that rate up to twenty-five, fifty, seventy, and seventy-five cents, according to the dates of the issues of the notes, and the value at which they were issued, and also including, in most cases, the interest. This is the equitable principle upon which Texas determined to pay her debts. Does this evince a disposition to defraud her creditors, to involve her reputation, to repudiate? In these honest times, if a man gets his due, he is doing very well. Has not Texas done this towards her creditors? Texas, sir, has evinced no disposition to evade the payment of all equitable and just debts and liabilities.

I have every disposition to be very candid on this occasion, and therefore I think it due to the creditors, I think it due to individuals, and I think it due to the Government of the United States, to state plainly that I would not eschew one liability on the part of Texas, and transfer it to the shoulders of the United States. I would say to Texas, "Pay away the last cent in your coffers, bankrupt yourself, give away your hundred millions of acres of land, rather than throw the responsibility on the United States." If we were to be left destitute of a dollar, and without an acre of land available, the times then would not be as gloomy as those through which Texas has already passed. I would be sorry to see Texas not meet her just liabilities, and throw the responsibility of them upon the United States, and that then, through grace and tender mercy to the reputation of Texas, the United States should liquidate our debts.

I am for doing justice, and nothing but justice; but I am determined that something shall be understood in relation to this matter, more than the partial representation of the claimants was disposed to exhibit to the world. Who are those that are most clamorous against the injustice of Texas, and the wrongs which they have sustained from her? Are they men who have peculiar claims upon the sympathy of this body? Are they men who have peculiar claims upon the confidence of Texas? Are they men who blended their destiny with hers in her hours of trial? Are they men who marched with her armies upon their marches? Are they men who upon her vigils of peril watched with her? Are they men who toiled or starved for her? No, sir. They have sprung up, like dragon's teeth, around this Capitol within a few years; and we find the diffusive influence of this speculation upon multitudes that surround the Capitol. Members are besieged at every step with appeals, "Do this for us; do justice for us; save the reputation of Texas; be honorable, and it will do her some good." They do not say, in significant strains, "Fill our pockets, fill our pockets, will you?" though this is what they mean. They mean nothing else than to acquire, and to take away from either Government—I will not say ill-gotten gains—but what would be clear gains, if they got them.

The largest amount of the outstanding issues against Texas at this time arises from obligations that were issued from her treasury, for which she received but from sixteen to ten cents on the dollar; and now a hundred cents on the dollar is claimed for them, swelling the amount of her debts to millions. No matter how irregularly the debt was contracted by Texas, whether there was authority for the obligations issued or those brought in and funded; whether they were made without appropriations or not, Texas has estimated them, and placed them on a footing with the other equitable demands against her. She has extended equity when she might have caviled, and contended that, according to strict law, or common usage, she was not bound. Yet we are told that if Texas would only come forward and redeem her outstanding obligations at par, or pay all the money she has in her coffers, and the $5,000,000 reserved by the United States, she would establish a reputation above all suspicion; that she would then sustain herself with credit; that it would do her more honor, and make her a more glorious nation than ever existed. Sir, Texas as a State is only a part of this Confederacy; one of thirty-one; and she does not aspire to be more glorious than the United States, or the mighty nations of the earth. We find that they have perpetrated offenses against good morality and national honor, which Texas scorns to do. They have repudiated debts, not only revolutionary debts, but others contracted in good faith. This Texas has not done, and will not do. She has not repudiated one dollar of her revolutionary debt, and she will not do it. She will pay a hundred cents upon every dollar she has realized. Is not that worthy of admiration? Yet gentlemen say she would be glorious if she would pay the nominal amount of her liabilities.

When the United States repudiated—I do not claim that as authority, but I wish to bring it in array before the public mind—it was for an amount upwards of $240,000,000 of revolutionary debt. Has Texas done anything of that sort? Has she repudiated one just demand, amounting to a single dollar, of citizens of Texas who assisted her in her hours of difficulty? Not one. The United States repudiated millions, and hundreds of millions, held in the hands of war-worn veterans, who had toiled through a revolutionary struggle of seven years. The United States repudiated the revolutionary debt of the war of Independence, which commenced in 1776. Texas, during her revolution of nine years, did not repudiate one dollar that was held by her revolutionary soldiers. The United States, when they assumed the debts of the several States—the old thirteen—after the war of the Revolution, required the States to scale those debts, and paid them at the scaled rates. If we were disposed to be a little tricky, might we not follow these examples? But if we have been tricky, I do not know what fair dealing means.

We do not, however, claim the benefit of the high examples to which I have referred; but I think that in view of them it comes with a very bad grace from the United States to become administrator on the affairs of Texas, and to determine what are her liabilities.

The amount of $5,000,000 that was reserved in the Treasury of the United States, was reserved at the instance of creditors, who were importuning and surrounding Senators here when legislating on this subject. Some sagacious lawyer had discovered that the United States were liable when they acquired Texas, and received from her means which were intended for the liquidation of her debts. It was not intended by that reservation to determine what the debts of Texas were, but only the debts of a certain character for which the Government of the United States might possibly be held liable. When were they to pay these debts? When ascertained by Texas, and certified to the Treasury of the United States. That was the object of retaining the $5,000,000, as I understood it at the time, and I voted upon the subject in all good faith and confidence, satisfied, as I was, that the amount upon which the impost duties of Texas were pledged did not amount to $5,000,000, and that there would be a large residuum to Texas of that amount.

The President and Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, after the passage of that bill, determined, in effect, that the Government of the United States were liable for all the debts of Texas. It will be remembered that in the administration of the government of Texas from 1841 down to the time of the annexation in 1845, there was not one dollar of debt incurred, nor one liability created. From December, 1841, when the exchequer system was established, and the immense issues of $12,000,000 were suspended, $200,000 was the amount of the currency established by law, and that commenced to issue at the rate of a hundred cents on the dollar. A combination was directly formed of brokers and speculators, gentlemen alien to Texas, who wanted to filibuster, and subvert the Goverment, right or wrong, who said that if they were not admitted into its control or made participants of it, they would subvert it, if by no other way, by revolution. They combined, and by their combination immediately reduced the value of that currency from a hundred cents to seventy-five, and at one time it went down as low as twenty-five cents on the dollar. By economical issues, by extreme economy in the Government, the value rose again. But the Legislature which met annually consumed a large amount, and being opposed to the Executive, sought every possible means to embarrass him; and instead of requiring the taxes to be paid as under the previous existing laws, they repealed those laws for the collection of taxes, or postponed their operation for six months, so as to depreciate the value of, by lessening the demand for this currency, and thereby to embarrass the government in such a way that it could no longer exist. However, the good fortune that presided over Texas, and directed her path, did not desert her. The currency came up again, and was at par; but after a long session of the Texas Congress, it fell to fifty cents, and even as low as thirty-seven and a half cents; but it rose again, and continued at par, in spite of all the combinations and machinations of faction, corruption, and treason. When that administration ended, in 1844, the government of Texas had not only accumulated in the treasury $25,000 of par funds in gold and silver, but it had paid all just and unavoidable demands to foreign nations, and to support the Santa Fé and Mier prisoners in Mexico, and to procure their release, not less than $70,000. So that the Texas debt, with the exception of $2,500,000 accrued between the years 1838 and 1841, not a solitary cent accrued in the administration which lasted from the end of 1841 to 1844. It will thus be seen the debt of Texas did not grow out of her necessities, and that the present creditors who come forward here with their demands, and who, according to their saying, helped Texas in her hours of trial and threw their money into the lap, instead of doing that, threw it into the lap of speculators. Not a dollar of it went to Texas which will not only be paid in par funds, but which will also I, trust, be paid with interest, and at a premium. There were bonds issued,—let them be paid to the letter and to the last farthing; but let those who have accumulated these obligations by speculation, and that too of a most enormous character, receive, like Shylock their "pound of flesh," or two pounds if you please, but "not one drop of Christian blood." Sir, if these men were the assignees, or the descendants of Shylock, they would reflect just credit upon his reputation. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. President, it is thought that it is immoral in Texas—that it is not a clever thing in her not to pay her debts. Now, I should like to ascertain by what standard of morality we are to arrive at the adjustment of her debts? Is it that standard of morality that pays a man not only what he has given, but a hundred per cent. in addition to that? Or is it the standard it is proposed to establish here, that when a man has given three cents for a dollar he is to get a hundred cents? Is it that rule by which we are to judge of the morality of Texas, and the advantage of her creditors? That would be a very agreeable one to the creditors, but I cannot see that it would be complimentary either to the heart or the head of Texas. I do not think there is anything smart in it. It may be smart for the creditors, but certainly most stupid for Texas. They are for fixing their standard of morality for Texas, and she is for fixing her standard of equity and justice for them; and the United States have no business at all with it one way or the other.

If, however, the United States are bound for the debts of Texas, they are bound for much more than this bill proposes to pay. The independence of Texas was not recognized by Mexico when it was annexed to the United States. The domestic debt of Mexico was then about a hundred millions of dollars. They claimed that Texas should pay a part of it. Propositions were even suggested before annexation, that if Texas would assume her proportion of the national debt of Mexico, the independence of Texas might be acknowledged. If the United States are now bound by the act of annexation for the debts of Texas to the extent that the means taken by the United States would have gone, the debt to the Government of Mexico is a prior one, and the United States are bound to Mexico for a much larger sum than they are bound to these creditors. Would you be willing to go back and settle that amount? Yet it has a priority over the present demand. Mexico never recognized the debts that Texas incurred by her revolution, and if you recognize that you are bound to pay them, you should also pay to Mexico the proper proportion of Texas to the one hundred millions of the domestic debt of Mexico.

It is true, the Government of the United States might justly bear a part of the liabilities incurred on the part of Texas, because a portion of the debt of Texas was entered into for the purpose of defending her frontiers against the Indians. What Indians were these? Were they indigenous to Texas? No, sir. Who were they? The Shawnees, the Kickapoos, the Choctaws, the Anadacoes, the Kechies, Wacoes, Caddoes, and other Indian tribes from the limits of the United States, who settled in Mexico, and made war upon Texas. It was therefore necessary for Texas to defend a frontier of six hundred or eight hundred miles against the inroads of these Indians. The Government of the United States was solemnly bound by treaty with Mexico to defend Texas against the Indians, to reclaim them to the territory of the United States, and to inhibit their crossing the frontier. Instead of that, what did the United States do? I intend no reflection upon them, but I intend to vindicate Texas, now a part of the United States, but then a part of Mexico. The United States had solemnly pledged their faith, by treaty, to give protection to the boundary of Mexico; but instead of that, they treated with the Caddoes and acquired their territory, forced them into the boundary of Texas, and paid them in arms, in munitions of war, in powder, in implements of slaughter and massacre, and those Indians drenched our frontier in blood. Weak as we were—pressed upon by Mexico on the one hand, and the wily and sagacious Indian on the other hand, watching his opportunity to maraud upon our frontiers and slaughter our men, butcher our women, massacre our children, and conflagrate the humble hamlets in which they had dwelt in peace, we incurred expenses to keep them off, and for this the United States are responsible, as they are for a hundred other violated pledges in relation to Indians.

But what is the real history of this matter? When the scaling of the debt of Texas took place, in 1848, there was an almost entire acquiescence on the part of her creditors. Some three or four, or perhaps five, were somewhat refractory, and having more sagacity than the others, they concluded that there was some important advantage which they would gain by coming here, and therefore they had recourse to the Government of the United States. They might then have had in view the idea of a reserved $5,000,000 fund out of which they would be enabled to get their demands by appealing to the sympathy of members; by trying to show that they were bankrupted by their liberality in their anxiety to help Texas in the time of her direst need. They thought that if they could represent successfully to the Congress of the United States that they had been munificent and liberal towards Texas, it would entitle them to some extraordinary interposition of the Government of the United States. They came forward after the compromise was proposed, but not until that time. They received a new impulse by the proposal of the compromise. Most of them had acquiesced prior to that time, and we now find that hundreds came in who were not then interested in the debts of Texas. Strangers have come in as participants in the interest and are to be the recipients of its benefits. This is the case, and none will deny that there has been a most extraordinary change. If it had not been that the compromise of 1850 passed, the Texas creditors would nearly all have received their money, or their proportion of it, by this time, and would have been at rest and quiet, each man consoling himself in the advantage of having made a handsome speculation upon his adventure. But it was thought proper that there should be an appeal to the generosity and magnanimity of Texas, and after her to the United States, and that they might make something, and could lose nothing by that course. In that way it is that these claimants have not only multiplied, but they have become more urgent in their pursuit for gain, and are now resolved that nothing will satisfy them but the hundred cents on the dollar, according to the face of the paper.

Well, sir, Texas has incurred liability. She issued bonds to a certain amount. Let her pay those bonds with interest, since she made a tender of them in the market. Let her pay for her vessels-of-war or navy; let her pay all the just contracts she has made; all the equitable liabilities arising from the currency which she threw into circulation. That currency became valueless in the hands of her own citizens, and was then grasped at by greedy speculators. Let her treat them, as she has done, with justice and fairness. It was twice in prospect to repudiate the debt of Texas. But did she do it? It was talked of, and a little encouragement might have produced the result. The conduct of the refractory creditors had no doubt stimulated it. But Texas did not repudiate a cent. Her Executive discountenanced it. It may be that an extract will be read here from the message of her Executive, in 1843, showing that she would pay the last cent which she justly owed. So she will. But if that message is read, let it be remembered that not a word of the extract is recognized until the whole message is produced here upon the floor, and the whole instrument construed together. It was then laid down as a principle that the Government of Texas would equitably redeem every dollar that she owed.

She had evinced a disposition to do it by submitting her public lands to entry at two dollars per acre when her notes were selling at three cents on the dollar; and she had kept them open for years subject to entry at that rate. She has gone further, and says it will be just to redeem money issued at a depreciation at the full value at which it issued from the Treasury with interest thereon. That is the act of Texas. What the refractory conduct of her creditors may do with the feelings of Texas I cannot say. Within a few years a total revolution has taken place in her population. The number of emigrants since annexation, I suppose has more than doubled or quadrupled the previous number of inhabitants. The interest on the money retained in the Treasury here will diminish the necessity of taxation by her. What her people may deem to be politic and expedient hereafter in relation to their debts I know not. I do not encourage repudiation. I hope it never will take place; but if it should, let those be accountable for the result who invoke and provoke their destiny. Let the sin lie at their doors. I hope it will never lie at the door of Texas; but those who have advanced, or who have contracts with her, shall be paid to the last farthing of what they have advanced.

A law was passed by the Legislature of Texas, after annexation to the United States, in 1848, by which it was provided, that any person coming forward and depositing fifty cents at the treasury of Texas, should take a receipt from the treasurer, and for every fifty cents received at the treasury he should be entitled to one acre of land. Certificates to the amount of more than half a million of dollars were deposited under this law, as I was informed, and land drawn, or land warrants issued, to that amount. These gentlemen have gone quietly and located their lands, and now realize several hundred per cent. How are the benefits of this bill to be extended to them? How are they to be recompensed for the losses which they have sustained, according to the plan of this bill? Are they to fall back upon the United States? Are they to become recipients of the benefits proposed in this bill, or, are they to be excluded?

But I am sure that the honorable gentleman who introduced this bill cannot object to the principle of Texas scaling. She is to be the judge of her own matters. She knows very well under what circumstances the debts or liabilities were contracted. She knows their character perfectly; and we find that the honorable gentleman who introduced the bill has not determined to pay according to the face of the paper, or of the demands of the creditors; but he, too, is for scaling the liabilities. He proposes that a certain amount shall be paid, and that, if that does not cover all the liabilities, the creditors shall receive it according to the proportion of their demands, and shall give a receipt in full. Now, Mr. President, as for the morality of the thing, whether one cent or one dollar, one degree or ten degrees of discretion at all changes the standard of morality, I am not prepared to say. I think Texas is the best judge of this matter; so that the United States would incur an additional reproach upon herself, if she were, by this law, to take it out of the hands of Texas to adjust her own affairs. Texas knows what her liabilities are: she knows all the circumstances surrounding them, under which they grew up, under which they dragged along, and by which they were managed. She knows, too, the influences and the means of their acquisition. But she is not acquainted with the means and influences that surround this Capitol, and which grow every day. I know it is perilous, eminently perilous, to oppose an influence so overwhelming as that of the claimants here. I have stood in perilous positions before, but when I felt badly, nobody knew it. I feel well on this occasion, and proud that I have a colleague who has realized all that experience could teach or suffering inflict.

Personally, to those who are the Texas creditors,

I have no objection. I look upon them as I look upon other speculators. I look upon them as I do on men who go into the market every day—men who wish to make, in their estimation, honest gains, and who would not have their consciences smitten if they made one hundred per cent. every day. That would not involve their honor, but it would, in their estimation, sustain the honor of those on whom they make the one hundred per cent. I want no more sympathizers with Texas. I do not want them to appeal in behalf of Texas, to rescue her honor. Her honor, her safety, her existence, her liberty, her independence, were once involved, and I did not see, in her direst need, and when clouds enveloped her in darkness, the face of one of those men who now claim to be her benefactors or her sympathizers. It was not until the last enemy had marked her soil—it was not until our star had risen in the east, and until it was attaining something like its meridian splendor, that the speculators were attracted by the hopes of gain. Then, in that proud day, they were willing to unite their destiny with her; but to grope their way in darkness, to peril their lives in conflict, to confront and grapple with the enemy, not one was there. Let them not talk of Texas' honor, Texas' renown, and Texas' escutcheon cleared. She cleared them herself, sir. It was not a speculation; it was a real transaction; and she will keep it clear. It is her best guardian under the ægis of the Constitution. I desire justice and liberality to all who aided Texas; and no matter how they have acquired their demands, give them an earnest for everything they have, and upon that earnest give them interest, and, if you please, be liberal, but let Texas have the credit of doing justice to her creditors, and let not the United States intervene to save her soiled honor, as it is called. She will take care of that article herself, and she will take care of her money, too, I trust, and make a useful application of it in paying all just demands, but not the demands of Shylocks. Sir, I have done.

COLONIZATION IN NORTH AMERICA.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

SATURDAY, February 7, 1853.

The Senate having under consideration the resolutions respecting colonization on the North American continent by European Powers, and respecting the Island of Cuba:

Mr. CLEMENS said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: When the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] introduced his resolution in relation to the tripartite convention proposed by England and France, I was confined to a bed of sickness; but I gathered from the reported debates that he had consulted with no one but the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] and the Secretary of State. Now, sir, I do not deny the individual right of those Senators, under ordinary circumstances, to exclude whom they please from their consultations; but this is not an ordinary occasion, nor are they ordinary men. One [Mr. MASON] is chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the other [Mr. CASS] has had bestowed upon him the title of Peter Senatus. Whatever they do commits the party to which they are attached, and I think it but fair that those of us who are expected to be bound by their action, should have had some notice in advance of what that action was to be. I think, moreover, that the wishes of the President elect should have been ascertained; that prominent members of his own party should have hesitated before placing him in a position so embarrassing as that in which he now finds himself. If it should turn out, as I sincerely hope it may, that he does not accord with many of the opinions which have been advanced upon this floor, he is placed, in the very outset of his career, in direct opposition to leading members of his party. If, on the other hand, he should concur with them, it would have been more respectful to let him take the first steps, and not to have snatched, with such impatient hands, the wreath, (good or bad,) which his were already extended to grasp. On this, and on other accounts, the resolution of the Senator from Virginia seemed to me impolitic, and those of the Senator from Michigan, which are based upon it, equally indefensible.

Mr. President, there are periods in the history of nations, as of individuals, when one false move must be followed by years of suffering; when the neglect or improper use of the right moment, or the right occasion, infuses a poison into the body-politic no remedy can reach. We are approaching such a period, if it is not already upon us. From the line of conduct now to be adopted, much that is good, or much that is evil, will surely ensue. To render all I have to say perfectly intelligible, it will be necessary to enter upon a brief review of the past.

Heretofore the advice of Washington has been respected, and we have succeeded in steering clear of the tangled web of European politics. Besides, the growth of the American Union has been so rapid as to defy the calculations of European statesmanship. The merchant, when he found a rival taking away his most profitable traffic, the manufacturer, as year by year the demand for his productions diminished, the fisherman, when he saw Yankee sails invading the haunts of the great monsters of the deep, all these understood that a new power had sprung into existence, and felt that they were engaged in a rivalry in which European energy and European intelligence were destined to be overshadowed. But kings and cabinet ministers could not comprehend that a few scattered colonies, but a short time since a feeble dependency on the Crown of Britain, had indeed become a powerful nation. The monarch who looked back upon a line of a hundred sires, could comprehend no stable form of Government save that which was endeared to him alike by interest, and by educational prejudice. If, in his imperial dreams, the vision of America ever rose before his eyes, it was only as a people whose own unbridled passions would drive them into anarchy, whose turbulence and whose dissensions would furnish another reason to the world for committing all government to sceptered hands.

In the mean time, the neglected and despised Republic was moving steadily and rapidly along the road to wealth, to power, and to honor; but its strength was unmarked and its vigor unknown abroad. The war with Mexico followed. A little handful of citizen soldiers overran a nation of seven millions of inhabitants, and dictated the terms of peace from her national capital. Here was a lesson which even kingly dullness could not misunderstand, or ministerial servility misinterpret. Suddenly the whole tone of the public journals of Europe was changed. Prior to that time they had derided our progress and laughed at the feebleness of our military force. It was assumed to be impossible for a Government like ours to carry on a war of foreign conquest. Foolish editors, writing at the dictation of still more foolish masters, argued themselves and their readers into the conviction that the first summons of the drum to an aggressive war would be the signal of ruin and destruction to the Union. That summons came; a powerful nation was vanquished; and so little were the energies of our people taxed, that at home it would scarcely have been known a war was going on save for the reports of battles and victories which floated upon every gale from the South.

Thus vanished one delusion, and with it the old system of political tactics. It was no longer our weakness, but our strength which became the subject of comment. The aggressive spirit and the grasping ambition of America were portrayed in the darkest colors, and Europe was called upon to interpose some check to the territorial aggrandizement of the great Republic. Wrong in their apathy, they were roused from it only to involve themselves still more deeply in error by their action. From newspaper articles they progressed to diplomatic notes; and now, as we have been informed by the President, France and England have made a formal proposition to the United States, that the three Powers should unite in assuring to the Crown of Spain undisturbed possession of the Island of Cuba, through all coming time.

Now, Mr. President, I am willing to go with the Senator from Michigan, and to say that this proposition meant something. I am willing to say that it did not mean what it imported on its face; that it was known it must be rejected; and the idle form of making the offer would have been dispensed with but for ulterior objects. Let it be conceded that it was intended to intimidate the United States—to give us notice that France and England were watching Cuba, and were determined to resist any efforts upon our part to acquire its possession. But, sir, while conceding all this, I do not agree with that Senator as to the mode in which it is to be met. I do not think it is the part of wisdom, or sound policy, to permit ourselves to be hurried into intemperate action, because France and England have made a foolish parade of their future purposes.

To redeem a threat from contempt it is necessary that the party making it should possess the power of carrying it into effect. As long as English statesmen keep their senses, a thousand Cubas could not induce them to declare war against the United States. Withhold the exports of our cotton for one year, and their starving millions will be in open rebellion. We have heard not long since, in a time of profound peace, of banners borne by her peasantry with the fearful inscription, "Blood or bread." Who doubts that that cry would be reawakened, and who doubts that blood would furnish the first, the second, and the third course of the banquet to which she would be invited at home? Add to this the certainty of seeing one hundred thousand American bayonets glittering in the sunlight of Canada, and a thousand American vessels cutting up her commerce on every sea, and you have an amount of danger and suffering no nation will willingly brave. A member of this body, not long ago, declared that England had given bond and security to keep the peace towards the United States. Yes, sir, and that security is her life's blood, her very existence; not merely her provinces and dependencies, though I fancy she would consider it a poor exchange to secure Cuba to Spain and lose Canada herself; but she has something more at stake, and I regard any threats from that quarter as the veriest gasconade in which any Government ever permitted itself to indulge.

France is in scarcely a better condition. She has recently erected an imperial throne above the crater of a volcano, and he who occupies that seat must watch by day and by night, or an eruption will soon come to bury him and his fortunes beneath a burning flood. Even if the great Emperor himself now held the reins, a war with America would be destruction to France. To land an army on our shores would be to devote it to the sword; and the ocean is not an element on which any great portion of French glory has been acquired. I am not unaware that upon paper the naval power of France seems to be immensely superior to ours; but those who so calculate, lose sight of a great truth: guns and vessels do not constitute a navy. If every vessel on our naval register were, to-morrow, burned to the water's edge, France would no more be capable of contending with the United States upon the ocean than the oak of the forest is capable of resisting the thunderbolt of Heaven. It is seamen who make a navy; and wherever they are found vessels will not long be wanting. In this, the main element of success, we are far in advance of every European Power. Our fisheries turn out annually a body of hardy mariners, unequaled for skill, for energy, and for daring. It must be remembered, too, that our tonnage greatly exceeds that of any other Power. And as long as these advantages remain to us, the crumbling dynasties of the Old World may build war-steamers without number; but, whenever a contest comes, the best of them will soon be found sailing under Yankee colors. Vessels-of-war, manned by peasantry, are feeble foes.

Mr. President, I have referred to these things with no view of encouraging a spirit of aggression, but the reverse. The proposition of England and of France has been seized hold of to inflame the popular mind, and I had some apprehensions that the indignation and resentment excited by it might lead to offensive acts which could have but one termination. It is this which I wish to avoid. I wish to show that we can afford to laugh to scorn the implied threat hanging over us, and that this is better policy than yielding to the dictates of a hasty resentment. Cuba will be ours whenever it is right and needful for us to take it. Whenever the might of this Republic is put forth in a just cause there is no human power which can resist it. Under such circumstances, we can well afford to wait until the pear has ripened. I have no sympathy with those who are so impatient to grasp the territory of our neighbors; nor do my opinions at all accord with those who tell us, with such a confident and self-satisfied air, that it is time this Government had a foreign policy. I believe we have always had a foreign policy, nay more, the very best that it was possible to adopt—the policy of attending to our own business, without attempting to assume a sort of general guardianship over all mankind.

I said, Mr. President, in the outset, that we were approaching a period of trial and of danger—but that danger does not threaten us from abroad. In that quarter the skies are clear and bright. It is at home that the symptoms of an approaching hurricane are manifest. These symptoms are everywhere about us and around us. They may be found in the restless and disturbed state of the public mind; in the speeches of dinner orators, dignifying war with the name of "progress," and clothing wholesale robbery with the mantle of patriotism. They might have been seen in the frenzied enthusiasm which followed the footsteps of that sturdy beggar, Louis Kossuth; in the wild and reckless attempts of American citizens to take possession of the island of Cuba. Sir, I deplore their fate as much as any man can, and condemn as strongly the cruel and barbarous conduct of the Spanish Governor. I but refer to them as evidence of a state of things to which all eyes ought to be directed. And last, sir, though not least, the signs of this danger may be found in the ill-regulated, but fierce and strenuous efforts of "Young America" to bring about a war with anybody or upon any pretext.

All these things indicate that a spirit of change is abroad in the land. I may be told that word is written on every earthly thing. Perhaps it may be so; but justice, honor, mercy, are the children of God, and know no change. In the sublime morality of the Christian's creed we may find a guide for our footsteps which cannot lead to error: "Do unto others as ye would they should do unto you." It is not in the book of revelations that we are taught to covet the goods of our neighbors. It is not there we are encouraged to indulge a lawless spirit of war and conquest. We do not learn from thence the duty of progressing backward from a peaceful age to a period of barbarism, when the strong hand was the only law, and the steel blade the only arbiter of disputed questions.

Sir, I have heard much of this thing called progress. In the eyes of some gentlemen, it covers all defects, and makes atonement for every error. I am not its enemy, but I wish to know exactly what it means, and in what direction I am to progress. If it means that glorious spirit which sweeps abroad upon the wings of peace, shedding life, and light, and happiness, on the land and on the sea; which sends the missionary among the heathen, and gathers the infidel and the unbeliever beneath the Gospel's ample shield, which doubles the productions of earth, and lays bare the treasures of ocean; which plants the church of God in the wilderness of the West, and substitutes the Sabbath bell for the howl of the panther; which carries literature and science to the log-cabin of the pioneer, and connects every part of this wide Republic by links so strong, so close, that the traveler feels every spot he treads is home, and every hand he grasps a brother's hand,—if this be the progress which is meant, most gladly do I enlist under its banner.

But, sir, I am not permitted so to understand it. I understand progress, as interpreted by modern politicians, to be quite a different thing. The first lesson they inculcate is a sort of general defiance to all mankind; an imitation of the worst practice of olden chivalry—the practice of hanging a glove in some public place as a challenge to every passer-by to engage in mortal combat—a practice, in no degree based upon wrongs to be redressed, or injuries to be avenged, but upon a pure, unmitigated love of blood and strife. They have borrowed also from the crusaders another vicious and indefensible habit—that of impoverishing themselves at home to raise the means of transportation to other lands to erect altars and inculcate principles by the edge of the sword. They propose to grasp the territory of an old and faithful ally, not only without the shadow of a claim, but without even the robber's plea of necessity; to hush the busy hum of commerce; to withdraw the artisan from his workshop, the laborer from his field, the man of science and the man of letters from their high pursuits; to convert the whole land into one vast camp, and impress upon the people the wild and fierce character of the followers of King Clovis.

Sir, I wish to indulge in no exaggerated statements, but let us, in the cant phraseology of the day, "establish a foreign policy." Let us set about convincing the world that we are indeed "a Power upon earth." Let us rob Spain of Cuba, England of Canada, and Mexico of her remaining possessions, and this continent will be too small a theater upon which to enact the bloody drama of American progress! Like the Prophet of the East, who carried the sword in one hand and the Koran in the other, American armies will be sent forth to proclaim freedom to the serf; but if he happens to love the land in which he was born, and exhibits some manly attachment to the institutions with which he is familiar, his own life's blood will saturate the soil, and his wife and children be driven forth as houseless wanderers, in proof of our tender consideration for the rights of humanity. Sir, this is a species of progress with which Satan himself might fall in love.

Mr. President, there are in this connection still other lights in which the question before us may be presented. Look at America as she now is, prosperous in all things, splendid, magnificent, rich in her agriculture, rich in her commerce, rich in arts and sciences, rich in learning, rich in individual freedom, richer still in the proud prerogative of bending the knee to none but the God who made us, and of worshipping even in His temples according to the forms which conscience, not the law, has prescribed. Gaze upon that picture until your soul has drank in all its beauty, all its glory, and then let me paint for you that which is offered as a substitute. Look upon a land where war has become a passion, and blood a welcome visitant; where every avenue to genius is closed save that which leads through a field of strife; where the widow and the orphan mingle unavailing tears for the husband and the father; where literature has become a mockery and religion a reproach; upon a people, strong indeed, but terrible in their strength, with the tiger's outward beauty and the tiger's inward fierceness; upon a people correctly described by the poet when he said—

"Religion, blushing, veils her sacred fires,
And unawares morality expires;
Nor public flame, nor private, dares to shine,
Nor human spark is left, nor glimpse divine.
Lo! thy dread empire, Chaos, is restored,
Light dies before thy uncreating word;
Thy hand, great Anarch, lets the curtain fall,
And universal darkness buries all."

Let no one tell me that these are imaginary dangers. At the commencement of the French Revolution, if any one predicted the excesses to which it gave birth, he would have been regarded as a madman. What security have we against the occurrence of similar scenes? We are human, as they were. Our law of being is the same; and if we once depart from the plain path of prudence and of rectitude, no human wisdom can foresee the result.

The present acquisition of Cuba, in my opinion, in any way, is of questionable propriety; but if it is to come to us as the result of war and violence, instead of a blessing it will prove a deadly ill. When Caractacus was carried to Rome, to grace the triumph of his conqueror, he gazed with wonder and awe upon the splendor and magnificence with which he was surrounded. Then, turning to the Emperor, he expressed his simple wonder that one so rich, so powerful, so blessed with the possession of everything that earth could bestow, should have envied him his humble cottage home in the forests of Britain. With what force, with what propriety, might not Old Spain address to us a similar appeal! Possessed of a territory extending almost from the Northern ocean to the region of the tropics, embracing every variety of soil, climate, and production, why should we envy Spain the last little island of her once mighty dominions? We do not need it for agriculture; we do not need it for purposes of national defense.

The assertion that Cuba commands the Gulf trade is a fallacy, which it requires a very slight examination to dispel. Tortugas and Key West command the Gulf trade, and not only that, but they command Cuba itself. With those points properly fortified, a hostile fleet in the harbors of Cuba would be powerless for mischief. This fact has long been familiar to English statesmen; and on that account the cession of Florida to the United States was made the subject of excited debate in the Parliament of Britain. Spain was greatly censured for making the cession while she professed to be an ally of England; and the conduct of the Ministry in permitting it to be done was animadverted upon in terms equally severe. Nor are we without authority from our own officers. Commodores Rodgers, Perry, and Tattnall, have all made reports, showing the immense importance of these points, and their absolute command of the Gulf trade. Commodore Porter repeatedly expressed like opinions, based upon practical experience while he was in command of the Mexican fleet. General Totten has submitted to the War Department an elaborate report to the same effect; and Lieutenant Maury, in one of the ablest papers written by him, shows conclusively that no vessel under canvas can leave the Gulf without passing in sight of Tortugas and Key West; and estimates the amount necessary to complete the fortifications at these points at something less than two millions of dollars.

It thus appears that it is the part of economy, as well as of honesty, to fortify our own possessions, and leave our neighbors in undisturbed enjoyment of what belongs to them. It is surely better to appropriate $2,000,000 to complete Forts Taylor and Jefferson, than to expend $100,000,000 in the purchase of Cuba, or uncounted millions in its subjugation and conquest. Nor would the heavy outlay rendered necessary by either mode of annexation cover our whole loss. We derive now from duties upon Cuban imports, an annual revenue of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000. If Cuba be annexed, that revenue ceases entirely. Higher duties must be laid on other articles, and we shall have a renewal of the discontents, bickerings, and dissensions which attended the passage of our earlier tariff laws. I am not in the habit of using arguments addressed to the North or to the South. No argument can be a good one which does not address itself to the whole country; and the statesman whose patriotism is limited by a State line is an unsafe legislator for a great people. But sectional appeals have been made, and I propose to meet them. In no one aspect in which I can look at this question does it present any appearance but that of injury to the South. If Cuba came in as a slave State, it would give us no additional political advantage, no additional political power. The once-cherished dream of southern statesmen of maintaining a balance of power in the Senate of the United States has been completely exploded. The North has already obtained a preponderance, and that preponderance will be increased from year to year. What we have lost can never be regained. For the maintenance of our rights, and the preservation of our privileges, we must look to other sources—to the good sense of the American people, to their deep love for the institutions under which we live, to their innate sense of right and justice, and to the certainty that any serious encroachment must be followed by convulsions which would shake the continent.

Cuba, as a slave State, would not restore the balance of power, and is therefore, politically, of no importance. In a pecuniary point of view, it would be oppressive and burdensome in the extreme. It would bring a powerful rival in direct competition with the most profitable productions of the southern States. Remove the duties now levied upon those articles which come from Cuba, and their culture in the southern States will soon sicken and die. The present tariff upon sugar is highly protective, and its removal would prove a grievous burden; but there is even greater danger to be apprehended from its increased production. Spain has been slumbering for a hundred years. Not long since, I met an intelligent Louisiana planter in Havana, who assured me that he had traversed nearly the whole island; that he found in its fields but one modern plough, and in its mills scarcely a single modern improvement. His opinion was, that if Cuba belonged to the United States its productions would be quadrupled. If that opinion be correct, as I doubt not it is, no one can fail to see the disastrous effect of annexation upon southern agriculture.

As long as Cuba remains in the possession of Spain it will be of inestimable advantage to the United States in the event of a war with any foreign Power. The whole commerce of the Gulf States could be poured into its harbors; merchants would be found there ready to purchase, buying in a neutral port, and reshipping in a neutral vessel, they would be safe from the danger of capture, and thus one of the greatest hardships of war would be almost entirely alleviated. Our previous history is pregnant with proof to this effect. During the embargo of Mr. Jefferson, we shipped to Florida, then a Spanish colony, about eight thousand bales of cotton. As soon as the embargo was removed those shipments ceased entirely. In 1814, during the war with England, we shipped to Florida about thirteen thousand bales of cotton. In 1816, when the war had ended, not a solitary bale. These figures show how great was the advantage of having a neutral Power upon our borders, and how much suffering was avoided which must otherwise have been endured. The vast increase of the Gulf trade renders such an outlet of far more importance now than at any former period, and it is difficult to estimate all the advantages which may flow from it.

Let me turn now to a more general view of the subject. Cuba has a population of one million two hundred thousand inhabitants. Of these about six hundred thousand are whites; a little more than two hundred thousand free blacks, and the remainder slaves, most of them of recent importation. If the island of Cuba were turned over to us to-morrow without cost, with this heterogeneous population, how is it to be governed? Not one of them has ever exercised the right of suffrage. Not one of them ever for a moment felt the iron-hand of military despotism relaxed. They could not be trusted to govern themselves. The habits and the prejudices of centuries are not to be shaken off in an hour. They would still cherish a deep-seated attachment for the splendor of royalty, and as deep a contempt for the plain republican government which would supplant it. To such a people a constitution and State government after American models would be a curse, leading inevitably to anarchy, constant disturbances, and daily scenes of violence and bloodshed.

Another imposing difficulty is to be found in their established religion. With us that could not continue. The magnificent ceremonies which they have been accustomed to see, surrounded and protected by the full strength of the law, would at once lose that protection; and the cowled priest, whose tithes are now paid to him as a legal right, would find himself dependent upon the charity of his flock, whom therefore he would have every motive to render discontented and turbulent. Who can estimate the effect of this upon an ignorant, bigoted, and superstitious race, speaking a different language, accustomed to different laws, despising our institutions, looking upon us with jealousy and fear? This blow at a religion which has been transmitted to them from century to century would dissipate the last hope of a cordial union between the races, and render it nearly certain that in order to govern Cuba peaceably we first must make it a solitude, and then people it with emigrants from these States.

But, sir, if every other objection to the annexation of Cuba were removed, there would still exist an almost insuperable difficulty in the number of free blacks who swarm about the island. Ignorant and vicious, they would be found ready instruments in any work of mischief. Mingling freely with the slaves, they would be constantly exciting the latter to insurrection and revolt, and thus render the lives of the planters every moment insecure. It may be asked why these evils are not now felt? In some degree they are; but they are felt less sensibly, because, over these as over the rest of her subjects, Spain maintains a sleepless military rule. They can turn in no direction without meeting a company of infantry or a troop of horse; and the certainty with which a heavy punishment follows suspicion even, operates as an effectual check upon their vicious propensities. With us it would be wholly different. There would be no soldiers to overawe them, no military executions to keep alive their terrors, no police exercising over them a constant vigilance, and checking every plot in its first inception. In the South, we understand the difficulties and the dangers which arise from this class of population, and most of the southern States have passed laws to exclude them from their limits; but they are already located in Cuba, and the difficulty is to get rid of them.

There are other arguments which I might advance, but it is not needed. In the elaborate discussion which these resolutions have caused, I do not recollect to have seen a single tenable reason advanced in favor of the acquisition of Cuba. Its possession is assumed to be of immense advantage; but in what that advantage consists we are wholly uninformed. We are not told how we are to be benefited by throwing away a revenue of five or six millions of dollars annually. We are not told how we are to be benefited by destroying the culture of sugar in the southern States. We are not told how we are to be benefited by changing the character of a neutral harbor into which our commerce might be safely poured in time of war. We are not told what advantage we are to derive from incorporating among us a mass of wretched human beings, whites, free blacks, and slaves, unfit to govern themselves, and unwilling to be governed by us.

Not one of these things seems to have been considered of sufficient importance to attract attention. In the eloquent speech of the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. SOULE,] I was particularly struck with the absence of all this. I noticed, also, another significant omission. He did not venture to tell us when or in what way he thought Cuba ought to be acquired. He told us that he was not in favor of its purchase, but there he stopped. I am sure he does not desire that it should come to us as the result of an unprovoked and aggressive war. There is but one other mode in which it can come, and that is by successful revolt of the Cubans themselves. Well, sir, if that be his method, we are pretty nearly agreed. I am willing to compromise on that; for it is tolerably certain that he and I will both be cold in the grave long before that revolution is begun, much less accomplished.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] went a bow-shot beyond the Senator from Louisiana, and argued that there was some sort of "overruling necessity" which was about to compel us to snatch this gem from the crown of Spain. I recognize, sir, an overruling Providence, whose law demands that nations should be upright, just, and honest, and deny the existence of any necessity which comes in conflict with that law. Heretofore, "progress" and "manifest destiny" have been considered sufficient to cover all designs upon the property of our neighbors; but these catchwords are nearly two years old, and are therefore approaching the precincts of "fogyism." It was necessary that "Young America" should have a new one; and the Senator from Florida has supplied it—"overruling necessity." I admire his judgment. He could not have selected a more comprehensive phrase. Certain it is that there is no wrong it will not excuse—no outrage it will not extenuate.

Mr. President, I need not say that I do not intend to vote for these resolutions. The one which announces our purpose not to take possession of Cuba by fraud or violence is certainly, that far, in accordance with my own feelings; but I do not see the necessity of making the declaration. It seems to me to be both undignified and unmanly to be making constant protestations of our honesty. Let us show the world by our acts that we are honest, and leave all such declarations to those whose doubtful character requires some such bolstering. Nor do I think the reaffirmation of the Monroe doctrine would add to its importance. Our policy has long ago been announced to the world, and this restless desire to reiterate it upon all occasions, looks to me somewhat as if we doubted our own resolution, and required a few legislative resolves to keep up our courage.

The Senator from Michigan has expressed considerable surprise at what he terms our shrinking from meeting the questions raised by his resolutions. Sir, there may be other causes than fear which render us reluctant to vote for them. When a boy I read a story of the civil wars of England, which taught me a lesson not yet forgotten. An adherent of the Parliament had been cruelly treated by one of the opposite party. His houses had been burned down, and his fields made desolate. Some time afterwards he met an acquaintance to whom he told the story of his wrongs. It was done simply and plainly, without a single threat or execration. When he had finished, his friend asked him with surprise, "And did you not vow revenge?" "No," was the reply; "those who 'take the trouble to make vows are very certain 'that a time will come when they will need a vow 'to steady their purposes. I never doubted what 'I would do, and I made no vows." Sir, there was more danger in one such man than a whole regiment of noisy babblers. Silence is almost invariably the concomitant of determined resolution; and the world will be quite as likely to believe us in earnest, and will respect us as much for refusing to pass, year after year, a series of threatening resolutions.

Mr. President, I find that I am taxing my strength too much, and I must soon close. The pilgrim who, in obedience to a vision oftentimes repeated, seized his staff and set out in search of a land in which he had been promised all the joys of Paradise, after traversing many lands, steadily pursuing his dangerous way through forests, deserts, and jungles, reached at last the only mountain which shut out from his gaze the promised land. Slowly he commenced the ascent; then paused, overcome by contending emotions. If from that mountain top, he should indeed look upon a valley, such as had appeared to him in his dreams, beautiful and glorious, where the flower had lost its thorn, where the sweetest melodies were continually poured into the ear, and the very air was redolent with perfume, how cheaply would it be purchased even by all the toils and dangers he had encountered. But then came the fear that dream had deceived him; that he might find a barren waste of thorns and brambles, desert, cheerless, and inhospitable. Anxious to know the truth, yet dreading to have it revealed, he stood upon the mountain side unable to advance or to recede. Even such emotions, Mr. President, might now well swell the American bosom. We have reached the hillside from whose top the future of America may be viewed. But who can ascend it without a feeling of doubt and terror? Is it to be the America which all of us loved to paint in our boyish days—free, happy, and prosperous, inculcating by its precepts, and enforcing by its example a deep love of law and order, offering a refuge and asylum to the fugitive from oppression, cultivating with assiduous care the arts of peace, and illustrating all the mild beauties of Christianity? Or is it to be that America which "progress," "manifest destiny," and "overruling necessity," are now seeking to make it, where freedom will be lost amid the clash of arms, and the wail of every good spirit will rise above the crushed and broken hope of man's capacity to govern himself? Sir, it is in our action that the answer must be found. Our country is at stake, and he who loves it as he ought, should pause and ponder long and well before tampering, in any way, with so high and holy a trust.*

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, with the permission of my honorable friend from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON,] who seems disposed to keep the debtor and creditor side of the speaking accounts of members, I desire to say one word, in the Senatorial acceptation of the term, but it shall be so brief as I trust not to call for reproof even from him.

I received yesterday a letter from Paris, written as late as the 13th of last month, and by one of the most intelligent and patriotic American citizens now in Europe, well fitted to judge of passing events, and also of their objects and tendency. His letter is a very interesting one, fraught with able speculations upon the present condition of Europe, and especially upon the bearing which the strange phases of European politics may have

*NOTE.—It appears from an explanation made by Mr. MALLORY, that I misunderstood his remarks. I never saw a corrected report of them. I saw an abstract in one of the papers, in which he was made to dwell with considerable unction upon the certainty that an overruling necessity would compel us to take possession of Cuba. I did not doubt its correctness, and commented on it accordingly. In justice to him, I now make the proper correction.

upon the prosperity and progress of our country. I feel at liberty to read one or two passages, not only because they confirm anticipations I have more than once expressed in the Senate, but because, coming as they do from the concentrated point of European policy, they may serve to impress the public mind with a sense of the deep interest which the American people have in the resolutions before us, and of the duty which may devolve upon them, not only to announce them by authoritative declarations, but eventually to support them by arms. The writer says:

"The speeches of yourself and Mr. Mason, of Virginia, on the 23d of December, have attracted so much attention on this side of the water, that I deem it proper to notice the fact in a brief communication. They are freely copied into some of the London papers, and afterwards appeared nearly complete in Galignani."

This is the great English paper, published in Paris, the only one on the continent.

"Of course they have drawn down the lightning of the British 'Thunderer.'"

He means the London Times; but they have also provoked the ire of other papers, not Thunderers indeed, though nearer home.

"The Americans here, however, approve them generally, as not only true to American feeling, but politically wise, in view of our position before the world."

I must confess, Mr. President, that this statement of the sentiments of the American citizens in Europe, so well situated to judge what course of policy the honor and interest of our country demand, and with no feeling to animate them but that proud patriotism which becomes stronger as we recede from our beloved fatherland; I must confess, I say, that this testimonial of true American feeling has gone far to compensate for the sneers and reproaches which the views of some of us, respecting the position and duties of our country, have called forth. But to continue the quotations:

"You have doubtless noticed the peculiar and formidable attitude of Europe, the nations now standing in solid columns, shoulder to shoulder, for conservation. The new British Ministry wheels the three kingdoms into line. The balance of power is complete. Externally, all seems settled, and the future to be secure—at least such is the face the great confederates would make Europe wear. There are, however, some sources of disquietude. The new Emperor has evoked the spirit of the old one, and reigns by virtue of this invocation. He has placed his throne on bayonets, and yet promises peace. This incompatibility is noticed by all reflecting men."

Five days after this letter was written, in some remarks I submitted to the Senate in relation to the resolutions introduced by me, I alluded to this portentous junction of former and of later imperial projects of aggrandizement, and observed:

"Besides, no man can look at the aspect of Europe, without feeling assured that from day to day collisions may arise between nations, and internal convulsions may shake the very frame of society. And wars may thus break out, extending their effects through the globe. The Spanish monarchy, it may be, is incapable of rejuvenation. I do not know how that may be, and I leave it to a wiser or a rasher man than I am to speak confidently. But certainly that kingdom is marked with the signs of some approaching catastrophe. If the new French Empire follows the traditions as it inherits the name and institutions of the old, which rose and fell with its founder—a name greater, in my opinion, than any other in modern, if not ancient European history—it will soon make itself felt in the Hesperian peninsula, and become the arbiter of its fate. To rely, as some profess to do, upon the security which the present state of things in Europe gives to the Spanish dominion in Cuba, is to neglect the most obvious dictates of policy, and to abandon an object of vast importance to the mere chance of events."

But to return to the letter. The author, after some judicious reflections upon the political instability of the Old World, remarks:

"All the Powers of Europe are armed to the teeth; Great Britain is preparing for war." * * * * "Nobody in Europe, of sound reflection, believes that Louis Napoleon could, if he would, maintain peace for any length of time. He is casting about anxiously for occupation for the army and the navy, and as he fears to disturb the Powers of Europe, he is looking over the maps of Asia, Africa, and the two Americas. The French press deny, doubtless by authority, that the Government has any connection with the adventurer Boulbon; nevertheless, I believe if he could make a stand in Sonora, which really promised success, he would be countenanced, if not supported, by the arms of the Empire." * * * * * * *

"As a practical summary of all this, I consider that American statesmen may justly take these views: Europe is now united in the bonds of a stern conservatism, which in its nature must regard with fear, if not aversion, the power and progress of the United States. The great confederation of the Old, now faces the great confederation of the New World; and that too, if not with hostile intentions, at least with hostile wishes. France needs fields of military and naval exercises, and Louis Napoleon may find it convenient—if pushed with difficulty and danger at home—to seek them in the new hemisphere. If he does, he will have the aid of Europe, provided he takes steps which promise to result in curbing the spirit or crippling the resources, and setting bounds to the extension of the United States.

"In this state of things, the announciation of sentiments, like yours, and those of Mr. Mason—speaking, doubtless, the feelings of the majority of the American people—is a solemn and timely warning."

I perfectly agree, sir, with the writer of this letter, in his estimate of the sentiments of the European Governments, the European aristocracy, in fact, which, directly or indirectly, now controls the political systems of that quarter of the world, towards the people and the institutions of the United States. It is so, and must in fact necessarily be so, until one or the other of those antagonistic elements, the good of the few or the good of the many, gain the ascendency, and exerts it, by force or example, to the destruction of the other. For myself, my confidence in the future is unshaken, because my confidence in the people of the United States is unshaken, for upon them much will depend in the great decisive contest, between freedom and oppression, which sooner or later is sure to come. And in the remarks to which I have just referred, and which I made in the Senate a few days since, I alluded to the feelings entertained towards us by the European Powers, as one of the signs of the times worthy of our serious attention, and I am happy to find myself supported by the opinions of this highly intelligent American, now surveying Europe from a European position. I then said:

"We cannot disguise from ourselves, that our progress and prospects, while they are a reproach to many of the Governments of the Old World, have excited their enmity by the contrasts they exhibit, and by the dangerous example they offer to the oppressed masses, inviting them to do as we have done, and to become free as we are free. He who does not know that there is not a Government in Europe which is a friend to our institutions, has much to learn of the impression that our past, our present, and our probable future are producing among them." * *

"But what we have to apprehend is, plans for arresting our extent and prosperity, the seizure of positions by which we might be annoyed and circumscribed, and the creation of an influence of schemes of policy offering powerful obstacles to our future advancement."

There is a spirit of firmness and patiotism in the American people which will carry us safely through this eventful crisis in the history of the world, yielding neither to the counsels of timidity nor of presumption, but keeping on the straight path of duty and of honor, and pronouncing their will in terms and tones neither to be misunderstood nor disobeyed, even by the most reluctant of their public servants, in whatever station these may be placed. And above all, not to be deluded by the cry of "ALL'S WELL," repeated here and there, when the world is armed or arming, and with designs hostile to the principles of free institutions and to the great Republic which has made itself their home.

A few remarks more are rendered necessary by what has been said by the honorable Senator from Alabama. With respect to his eloquent remarks I have not a word to say. I do not intend to enter again into this general subject. My motive in rising at this time was principally to read the extracts from this timely letter. But the honorable Senator from Alabama has alluded to the original introduction of the resolution of the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON.] A good deal has been said on that subject, and it is necessary to explain the matter, and the explanation is a very short one. Neither that honorable Senator nor myself had any idea of putting our heads together to make a great explosion of a volcano; and the attempt to induce that idea is but a tempest in a teapot, and is making a great fire out of nothing at all. The plain English of it is this: I got the letter to which I have alluded in previous remarks, stating the facts connected with this attempt in Sonora, which I thought rendered it necessary to ascertain what were the views of the Government, and I thought it was more proper, from the position which the honorable gentleman from Virginia occupied as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that he should take the letter to the Department and ascertain the facts; and now you have got the whole secret. The honorable Senator went to the Department with the letter, and, I believe, in conversation with Mr. Everett, some facts came out with respect to the correspondence of the Government on the Cuban difficulty which led the honorable Senator to introduce his resolution, and thus bring the whole matter before the Senate. I believe I am correct in this statement.

Mr. MASON. The Senator will indulge me for a moment. The resolution which I offered, and which I understand to be objected to by the Senator from Alabama, was simply a resolution calling upon the President to communicate, if not incompatible with the public interests, the correspondence which his annual message had informed us had taken place between the Ministers of France and England in relation to the invitation, on their part, to this Government to enter into a tripartite convention in respect to the Island of Cuba. Before I offered the resolution, I consulted the honorable Senator from Michigan, because of his very great experience in the foreign relations of this country, to inquire whether he thought it would be proper to premise the offering of the resolution with some remarks upon the question. He said that, in his opinion, it would be proper, and he would do the same thing. That to which he refers was information derived from another quarter, and was at a subsequent day. I did call upon the Department of State, and got some information connected with that subject, but it was subsequent to the former matter.

Mr. CASS. My recollection was that it referred to the tripartite treaty.

Mr. MASON. Not at all.

Mr. CASS. Then I was mistaken on that point. The honorable Senator, however, did call with that letter at the Department, and had an interview with the Secretary of State on the subject; and that is the only communication, as the honorable Senator knows, which took place between us on the subject. I repeat, there was no plan whatever in regard to the matter. A good deal was said about the discussion on that day, as though the Senate and the country had been taken unawares. Why who knows from day to day what is to take place in the Senate, and whence discussion will arise? There was no plan about it; nobody thought of one. The subject of the Senator's resolution came up, and he spoke upon it, and I made some remarks; and then any gentleman was at liberty to make remarks. It was a subject that required no week's preparation; the most extemporaneous preparation was all that was necessary.

A word now with respect to another matter, and I shall have no more to say. The honorable Senator from Alabama thinks this matter should have been delayed. Why it was the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] I believe, or some honorable Senator on that side, who censured me for not bringing the matter forward before. My answer was, I brought it forward as soon as I heard it. And now the honorable Senator from Alabama censures me because I thought proper to bring it forward so soon. I acknowledge no such doctrine. I am an American Senator, and I am an American Democrat, and whenever I think my country requires a resolution to be introduced, I will introduce it, even without the sanction of the President, which the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] seems to think ought to be required. There are some resolutions, according to him, which ought to be tabooed to avoid constitutional difficulties or presidential indignation. How far his category extends, I do not know. I acknowledge no such principle; I believed the rights of the country were trenched upon, and I wanted the country to know it. I did not care, for that purpose, who was President; and sure I am that the incoming President would have no objection, at any time, and at all times, to have questions like these fully investigated in the face of the American people. That was my motive, and I believe it was the motive of other gentlemen.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words upon this question; but I do not wish to go on now, for the reason that I would prefer having an answer to the resolution that I introduced this morning, before I submit the few remarks which I propose to make, and which will be very brief. I ask the Senate to postpone this question for a week.

Mr. MALLORY. I would ask the honorable Senator to withdraw his motion for a moment, in order to permit me to make a few remarks that will not occupy five minutes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. If what has fallen from the honorable Senator from Michigan be, in the parliamentary acceptation of the term, one word, I have but half a word to say. I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the honorable Senator from Alabama. That pleasure was only alloyed by finding that he had totally misapprehended the remarks which I had the honor of delivering here a few days ago; and I will take the liberty of saying, that if he had read them carefully, he would have found but very little difference indeed between the position which he has assumed for himself to-day, and that which I did, on that occasion, endeavor to mark out for myself. I said then, that I deplored the discussion of this question on this floor, because it could not be of any possible benefit, and might be of very great disservice. I took no part in it whatever. I advocated no measure tending to the acquisition of Cuba. I expressed no opinion on that subject, but I simply advocated a certain commercial measure which tended to connect us more closely with that island as a Spanish, and not as an American colony. So much I have thought it necessary to say to correct the misapprehension of the honorable Senator from Alabama.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I now renew the motion to postpone the further consideration of these joint resolutions until Monday next, at one o'clock.

Mr. HALE. I have not a word to say upon the motion of the Senator from Illinois. I am rather in favor of it. But the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] who has addressed the Senate upon this occasion, and myself, have had the misfortune to differ in the relative direction which the annunciation of our sentiments should take, he looking south and I north; and he has undertaken to back up his opinions this morning by reading a letter from Paris, which I think is calculated to give him an undue advantage over me in this controversy, [laughter,] and I know that what he says would have vastly more influence with the Senate and the country than what I say, even without any letter from Paris to back him up. Inasmuch as the Senator has taken occasion to read that letter, I wish to say that I, too, have had some letters. [Laughter.]

Mr. CASS. Read them.

Mr. HALE. They are not from Paris, but from some distance off; and there are a good many of them in which their writers take occasion to speak of the humble efforts that I have made, and which, if placed alongside of that Paris letter, would throw it entirely into the shade as much as Sancho Panza told Don Quixotte that a fight with the lions would throw into the shade any battle he had ever fought before. "Why," said he, "every other battle you ever engaged in, compared to this, is as mere cheese cakes and custards." [Laughter.] I have got a great many of these letters, but I have felt altogether too diffident to bring them before the Senate. But since this example has been set——

Mr. CLARKE. Where are your letters?

Mr. HALE, (holding up a very large bundle.) Here they are. But as I have explained myself, I will sit down. [Laughter.]

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

THE TEHUANTEPEC GRANT.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN P. HALE,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

IN THE SENATE, February 15, 1853,

On the Resolutions reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, in regard to the Tehuantepec Grant.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, in regard to the Tehuantepec grant, the question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. SEWARD:

"To strike out all after the word 'Resolved,' and insert:

"That the United States cannot suspend diplomatic negotiations with Mexico without tendering to that Power, or waiting a reasonable time to receive from it, an offer of arbitration, according to the terms of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo."

Mr. HALE said: Mr. President, I believe that it was about the time of the last war with England, when a gallant and deceased officer of the American Navy, at a public dinner, gave this toast: "Our country, may she always be right; but right or wrong, may she ever be victorious." I have no fault to find with the sentiment, but modern progress has abbreviated it somewhat, and in the common parlance of the day, the moral is expressed briefly, "Our country, right or wrong," contracting a part of the wish and toast, "may she always be right." Sir, I desire always to be on the side of my country. I desire that she may be always right; but whether she is right or wrong, I am always with her and for her. I believe it is the first duty of patriotism, when we find the country wrong, to endeavor to set her right; and when we find that she is going in a direction which is likely to place her in a wrong position, she is entitled to our best efforts to put her in a different direction.

I know further, sir, that there is another axiom in the politics of modern days which is, that when the country is in a war, no matter whether that war is just or unjust, no matter whether we had good and sufficient cause for it or not, it is the duty of patriotism to sustain the war, and sustain the Administration in a vigorous and efficient prosecution of it. I shall not combat that sentiment at present, but I will claim for it this qualification: That it is not the duty of patriotism—when an individual sees the country about to take a position which will lead to a war, when if the war ensue it must inevitably be unjust—to hasten the country into such a position; but, on the other hand, it is the dictate of patriotism and of duty to endeavor to arrest a series of measures which are calculated to place the country in such an unfortunate position.

I believe, sir, that the course adopted, or recommended by the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, to be pursued in relation to Mexico, has just exactly that tendency, and is calculated to produce exactly that result. If these resolutions mean anything—and they certainly do, because they do not come from a source where mere idle gasconade is used—they mean that diplomatic relations with Mexico are to be suspended, that this country is to assume a position of hostility looking to war, unless Mexico reverses its whole policy, unless it decrees and confirms that which the people and the Government of Mexico have pronounced to be null and void—I mean the Garay grant.

That is the position which the committee take, as I understand their resolution. They say that they "are fully prepared to sustain the Executive Department in the position" which it has assumed towards Mexico; and they conclude by recommending to the Senate the adoption of the resolutions which are now before us, and which are familiar to every member of the body, in which they say: "It is not compatible with the dignity of this Government to prosecute the subject further by negotiation." We are to fold our arms in offended dignity, and wait for Mexico to come to us; and if Mexico does not come to us, we stand committed to our citizens "to protect them in their rights abroad as well as at home;" and if Mexico fails within a reasonable time to reconsider her position respecting the Garay grant, "then it will 'have become the duty of this Government to re-'view all existing relations with that Republic, 'and to adopt such measures as will preserve the 'honor of the country and the rights of its citi-'zens."

Sir, I claim to have given some attention to this subject; and I heard the speech that was made by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. MASON,] with a good deal of pain, because I thought it was placing the Senate, and if the country followed the Senate, it was placing the country, in a very false position. The reason for that opinion I now propose to give to the Senate as briefly as I may. The materials upon which this opinion is founded, are spread over a good many pages, and cover a large portion of our diplomatic history, and of the affairs of Mexico for several years past, and of the history of Mexico for several years preceding that.

The position which is assumed by the President, by the Secretary of State, and by all the officers of the Administration, who have had anything to do with this matter—by our foreign ministers, and by our committees, is this: That the citizens of the United States, relying in good faith upon the offers and inducements which have been holden out by Mexico, have invested their funds and incurred large expenses in this undertaking; and that now they are debarred and prevented from going on to perfect what they have undertaken and to realize the benefits of the investments which they have made, by the bad faith of Mexico. You find this idea spread over the whole correspondence. You find it in the letter of Mr. Fillmore to President Arista; for in that letter he says, (I quote the extracts given by the committee in their report:)

"In addition to the motives I have urged for the speedy adjustment of this matter, I beg leave most earnestly to call the attention of your Excellency to the probable difficulties that may grow up between the two nations, should Mexico break her plighted faith in the grant to Garay. Our citizens, relying upon her good faith, have become interested in that grant; they have advanced large sums of money for the purpose of carrying out its objects; they have surveyed a route for a railroad, and demonstrated the practicability of constructing it; and it is not possible that they should now be deprived of the privileges guarantied by that grant, and sustain the heavy losses that must ensue, without appealing to their own Government for the enforcement of their rights. My anxious desire is to avoid the too probable consequences that must result from such an appeal. We cannot, if we would, be indifferent to it. It is a duty which every Government owes to its own citizens, to protect their rights at home and abroad; and the consequences growing out of the disagreement of the proprietors of the Garay grant and the Government of Mexico are such as no true friend of this country or of Mexico can look upon with indifference."

What does that language mean? War. It can mean nothing else. Then the President of the United States, in a formal letter to President Arista, denounces war by this Republic upon the Republic of Mexico, unless the latter confirms the Garay grant; and it is assumed that citizens of the United States, relying upon the plighted faith of Mexico, have invested their means in the enterprise secured by the Garay grant, and that by the bad faith of Mexico they are debarred from enjoying the privileges of that grant. The same thing is said by Mr. Webster in his letter to Mr. Letcher, dated August 24, 1850. Here is his language:

"The present holders are the assignees of those British subjects. Hence the validity of their title is conceived to have derived a peculiar sanction, which the honor of this Government demands should be maintained unimpaired."

* * * * * "If Mexico should reject our overtures for this purpose, we will extend our protection to them alone, according to our own sense of right and duty, and as future events may require."

Mr. Webster there threatens, that if the Government of Mexico does not confirm this grant, the Government of the United States will go upon her territory and enforce its own ideas of the protection which is due to its citizens, without the consent of Mexico, and against its will. But Mr. Webster, in that letter, was not content altogether to act the part of the warrior. He manifested, at the close of it, what I think would be called, in the southern country, a little of the Yankee, for he says to Mr. Letcher:

"Perhaps if, upon a suitable occasion, you were to hint, in connection with this subject, that the money due to Mexico for the extension of the limits of our territory pursuant to the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, has not yet been paid in full, and that contingencies might happen which would warrant this Government in withholding it, an impression might be produced favorable to the result of your negotiation."

That is threatening them with war in the first place, and if that threat is not enough, he tells them we will not pay what we have bound ourselves by solemn treaty to pay.

Again, on the 30th of April, 1851, Mr. Webster, in a letter to the Mexican Minister, Mr. De la Rosa, says:

"The undersigned has the especial instruction of the President of the United States to call the serious attention, both of Mr. De la Rosa and his Government, to the serious embarrassments which may result if this treaty should be rejected, and those citizens of the United States who have with so much laudable zeal, entered upon the enterprise, and incurred such heavy expenses in its prosecution, should now be turned back on an appeal to their own Government, as well for the disappointment of just expectations as for indemnity for actual losses.

"In conclusion, the undersigned has to say to Mr. De la Rosa, that having seen the treaty of the 25th of January negotiated, assented to, and approved by highly respectable and eminent citizens of Mexico, honorably known in other countries as well as in their own, and all this under the sanction of a distinguished citizen just placed by the voice of his countrymen at the head of the Government, the President of the United States cannot persuade himself that such a calamity as its rejection by Mexico now impends over both countries."

The meaning of that language cannot be mistaken, and the idea which Mr. Webster meant to convey cannot be misunderstood.

Again, in writing to Mr. Letcher, under date of December 23, 1851, Mr. Webster says:

"It is well known that, relying upon the grant from the Mexican Government and upon the protection of the American Government, American citizens have proceeded to the expenditure of large sums of money towards the accomplishment of the great purpose which is the object of the treaty."

Mr. Letcher, in writing to Mr. Webster from Mexico, February 14, 1852, says:

"Mexico shall have a full view of the dangerous precipice over which she is standing. She shall know that it is the positive determination of the Government of the United States to protect, at all hazards, her citizens who have made large investments in the enterprise, relying upon the good faith of the public acts of Mexico."

I will not weary the Senate by repeating declarations of this sort which are to be found in the published correspondence between the Government of Mexico and our Government and their various officers on this subject. It has been assumed by Government throughout the whole matter as an incontrovertible fact, that to the citizens of the United States were held out the tempting inducements of Mexico to enter into this matter with their capital, and that now Mexico is breaking faith with them, and that our Government is bound, by every consideration which can address itself to a Government able and willing to maintain its own citizens, to protect the rights thus trampled upon by Mexico.

If that is the true state of the case, if such are the facts, I grant there would be some reason in the language that we have assumed, and there would be some reason for the course indicated by the Committee on Foreign Relations, provided we had not already a subsisting treaty with Mexico by which we have bound ourselves, by the most solemn obligations that can bind nations, that if a difficulty should arise, war shall not be the remedy we will seek, but that we will first seek a peaceable and friendly arbitration. I say if we had not such a treaty as that binding upon us to-day, there might be some propriety in the belligerent attitude which has been assumed by the Administration toward Mexico; that is, if what they assume as correct were really facts.

I deny the proposition entirely. I lay down this position, and I will prove it by the authentic and published documents, that so far was the Government of Mexico from ever inviting the citizens of the United States into this affair, and so far were the citizens of the United States from going into it upon any such invitations, that it was a grant made by Mexico to her own citizens, a grant which had been annulled by the Congress of Mexico, and the Government of Mexico had refused to acknowledge Manning & Mackintosh as the assignees of the grant or as having any right in the contract; and that Government had not only refused to acknowledge the assignment to Manning & Mackintosh, but it had notified those parties that the Government would not consent to the transfer, and it had further notified its Minister residing at the city of Washington to inform Garay, the original holder of the grant, that the Mexican Government would not consent to any assignment, before any American citizen was interested in it to the amount of a single dollar. Here, then, is the plighted faith of Mexico! She had annulled the grant; she had refused to acknowledge the assignment to the English company; she notified the English house that she would not consent to the assignment, and resumed the grant, because it had been forfeited by a neglect to comply with its conditions; that the Minister of Foreign Relations instructed the Mexican Minister near this Government to notify Garay, the original holder of the grant, that the Government refused to consent to the transfer, and further, that it resumed all the rights which he had ever had. This was done on the 14th or 15th of January, 1849; and the very first notice that Mexico had that there was anybody except her own citizens interested in it was not given till the 5th of February, 1849, by Manning & Mackintosh; and that Government was not notified that anybody in the United States had any interest in it until six months after that time.

Now, I ask, with what face the President of the United States, or the Secretary of State, or the Minister of the United States in Mexico, can come before the Senate and before the world, and repeat over and over again, in every form in which they have put it, that American citizens were induced to go into this matter by the plighted faith of Mexico, which faith Mexico has broken? I have made the proposition that such is not the case, and I intend to prove it; and I hope the Senate will attend to it, for I look upon this as a question of great moment. I look upon it as a question which is likely, if it be not arrested by the consideration and action of the Senate, to place the country in a very false position.

Sir, if Mexico were a strong Government, if it were a Government like England, or like Russia, I should not have the least concern on earth about these resolutions, but I should take them as some of those harmless ebullitions, some of those stupendous jokes in the shape of solemn resolutions which Old Fogeyism and Young America throw before the Senate in the race which they have to run to get ahead of each other; but that is not the case here. Mexico is weak, feeble, and distracted. She has no defense to make, except what is to be found in the justice of her cause, and in the magnanimity with which a powerful nation should always treat a weaker one.

I will now proceed to prove what I have said, and I will prove it by reference to the documents. I will endeavor to be brief. I will endeavor not to fatigue the Senate by going over a great body of extracts, but I will state the points as briefly as possible.

The foundation of this grant was a decree made by Santa Anna to Garay on the 1st of March, 1842, and it extended to twenty-eight months. Whether that grant was valid or not—whether Santa Anna had any power to make any such grant—is a matter of some consequence, in some aspects of this case. Gentlemen are in the habit of speaking of these several chiefs of Mexico as dictators. I believe the fact is, that no one of those officers ever claimed to be dictator. In the revolutions to which Mexico has unfortunately been subjected, and the changes which have come sometimes almost as frequently as the varying seasons of the year, they have uniformly, so far as my examination has extended, bound themselves by written plans or constitutions. At the time Santa Anna made this decree, he was acting not under the old constitution of 1824, which had been subverted by the central constitution of 1836, and again subverted in 1841 by what is called the bases of Tacubaya and the convention of Estanzuela. It was under these that Santa Anna was then acting.

Santa Anna, in the decree, states his authority thus:

"It is by virtue of the powers and faculties vested in me by the seventh article of the convention signed at Tacubaya, and sworn to by the representatives and the deputies of the departments, that I have determined to issue the following decree."

Then it was by the bases of Tacubaya that he claimed to have authority to issue that decree. But be it remembered—and I ask the attention of the Senate to the fact—that these same bases of Tacubaya, by which Santa Anna claimed to have the right to confer this grant upon Garay, also contained the provision that all his acts, while acting under these bases, should be submitted to the first constitutional Congress that was assembled. And Garay, when he took this grant from Santa Anna, knew that he took it subject to the contingency that it was liable to be laid before the first constitutional Congress for its approbation or rejection. Santa Anna was acting under the bases of Tacubaya and the convention of Estanzuela. The seventh article of the bases of Tacubaya is in these words:

"The powers of the Provisional Executive Government shall be everything necessary for the organization of every branch of the public administration."

The second article of the convention of Estanzuela is as follows:

"The acts of the Government of his Excellency General Don Anastasio Bustimente, and those of the government that succeed him in the mean time, from the 1st of August of the present year 1841, of whatever class they may be, shall be submitted to the approbation of the first constitutional Congress; and likewise shall be remitted to the same Congress the acts of the Executive Provisional, in conformity with the bases which the army of his Excellency General Santa Anna has adopted."

The time fixed by the decree of Santa Anna for Garay to go on and complete his work, expired on the 1st of July, 1844. At that time the bases of Tacubaya and the convention of Estanzuela had been superseded by what were called, I think, the Bases Organicas, and during that time Carnilizo, President ad interim, extended the grant to Garay for another year, carrying it to July, 1845. The Bases Organicas, under which Carnilizo extended the original grant, was subject to exactly the same conditions as the bases of Tacubaya, which required that all the acts done by the provisional chief then in power, should be subjected to the action of the first constitutional Congress.

Santa Anna,—when the progress of revolution was such that he saw a constitutional Congress was about to be assembled, by which the validity of his grants would be inquired into, and the grants confirmed or rejected,—understanding perfectly the nature of the grant, and the nature of the authority set upon it, took a very sagacious way to get over it, or around it; and he issued his own decree that the responsibility established by the bases of Tacubaya, requiring his acts to be submitted to a constitutional Congress, was a mere expression of opinion, and was not binding; that the framers of the bases of Tacubaya had simply said they thought his acts ought to be submitted, but did not mean to require that they should be.

But a Congress did assemble, and on the 1st of April, 1845, they took up the subject of these decrees, and one of the very first acts which they did was to declare that all the doings of the Provisional Government, except so far as they fell within the very letter of the authority which was conferred upon them for the extraordinary emergency out of which they had been created, were annulled, and under that act these grants were annulled.

But whether that decree of the Congress was sufficient or not, suppose that Santa Anna had the power and authority to make the grant—suppose that Carnilizo had authority to extend it, and suppose the first constitutional Congress of 1845 had not power to annul it, what then is the condition of things? Why the time expired in July, 1845, and not one step had then been made towards doing anything under the grant.

What next do you find? Garay then petitioned, not the President, not the Chief of the nation, but he petitioned the Government for an extension of his grant; and the Council refused to act upon it, and they submitted the question to the Chamber of Deputies. The Chamber of Deputies granted the request, and it was sent to the Senate. In the Senate the subject was referred to a committee, the committee reported favorably, but no action was had upon the matter by the Senate; and thus the grant was not extended by any act of the Government. But at that time General Salas was Provisional Chief in Mexico. It must be borne in mind that General Salas, on the 22d of August, 1846, he then being in supreme power, published a decree restoring the constitution of 1824. That constitution was then restored over the whole of Mexico; the military governors went out, and constitutional governors were elected in their places, and the machinery of the constitution of 1824 was put in full operation all over Mexico. Under that constitution the President of Mexico had no more right to make such a grant, than had the President of the United States. Yet General Salas, on the 5th of November, 1846, nearly three months after the restoration of the federal constitution of 1824, which has been in operation from that day to the present, General Salas took the very law which had passed the Chamber of Deputies, and had been suspended in the Senate, and made a decree extending the grant to Garay for two years. Immediately upon this grant of Garay being extended by the decree of Salas, Garay applied to the Government for a confirmation, or, as it is styled in the papers of that country, credentials. The Government took the matter into consideration and confirmed the grant, with two essential modifications; one was, that all contracts that were to be made relative to the matter should be submitted to the Government for consideration and approval; and the second was, that all the colonists who went on to work upon the proposed railway, or other interoceanic communication, should renounce their nationality, and give up their alien privileges. Upon these terms, and these conditions being incorporated into the decree, or into the credentials, Garay took the grant.

The grant to Garay was of a twofold character—and I beg the Senate to bear this in mind, because if they do, they will avoid some of the very errors into which the Administration has fallen. One of these grants was for colonizing the country, and the other was for making an interoceanic communication; and both were separate and distinct. On the 7th of January, 1847, Garay assigned to Manning & Mackintosh—what? What the Committee on Foreign Relations suppose by their report, what Mr. Webster says in his letter, was a contract for making a way over the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. But it is no such thing. On the 7th of January, 1847, Garay assigned to Manning & Mackintosh that part of the grant which related to colonization, and he expressly said:

"That by this transfer on the part of the covenanter, D. José Garay, it is not to be understood that he confers upon Messrs. Manning & Mackintosh, and Schneider & Company, any right whatever to carry on navigation from one sea to the other; but he declares that he transfers to the gentlemen aforesaid the right of navigating said Coatzacoalcos river for all such purposes as may be suitable and useful to the business connected with the transfer of the lands in question, without any detriment accruing in virtue of such act to the privileges vested in the aforesaid Garay."

That Garay reserved to himself in the most formal manner possible. He retained all the privileges relating to the construction of a railroad, or other transit, across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and he sold to Manning & Mackintosh the simple right of colonizing the country. Manning & Mackintosh, as they were perfectly aware that they were bound to do by the conditions that had been inserted into the contract that was drawn up upon the decree of Salas, submitted this transfer to the Government for approval. Did the Government approve of it? No, sir; but they rejected it until something else was inserted, and I want to read the note which was inserted in the deed:

"The most excellent President has made himself acquainted with the contents of the clause of this document, and in view of the antecedents which have been borne in mind, he has been pleased to approve of said contract, but with the additions which have been deemed wise and just, in order to fill up the vacuums alluded to in the deed itself—vacuums which might become the source of all sorts of discussions, that are to be avoided. It has been noticed that no mention has been made in the contract of the renunciation of nationality, provided for by the thirteenth article of the law of November 5, 1846. According to the spirit of the aforesaid law, this renunciation must take place in the most positive and conclusive manner, on the part of the settlers, so that whatever circumstances may happen, and whatever measures these may require, neither the settlers aforesaid, nor the proprietors may not, in any case not for any cause, plead alien privileges, nor any other privileges except those which have been granted or may be granted to them by the laws of the country, to which both their persons and their property must be subjected, and without this requisite they will not be admitted. Nor is it stated whether the transferees have to give an account to the Supreme Government of the contracts they may enter into for the introduction of families, nor is there any mention made of the record ordered to be kept, in pursuance of the fourteenth article of the aforesaid law of November the 5th. All these obligations are of a relative character, and as they have been contracted by you, they must be binding upon the transferees."

This note, containing this explicit direction to the proprietors that settlers must renounce their nationality, and submit themselves entirely to such justice as Mexico would give them, to be fully and explicitly understood, was inserted in the contract itself, and signed by Manning & Mackintosh. They took the assignment of that part of the Garay grant with the full knowledge that they divested themselves of all protection that the Government would be bound to extend to them under other circumstances if they had not thus divested themselves.

Thus the matter remained until September, 1848. It is said that then—and the deed appears to be so—in September, 1848, there was a transfer made to Manning & Mackintosh of the remaining part of the contract, and that was the part which related to making an interoceanic communication between the two seas. Early in January, 1849, Manning & Mackintosh notified the Mexican Government that this contract had been assigned to them in September, 1848. What did that Government do? The very first moment that the Mexican Government had any notice that anybody else except a Mexican citizen was coming in to take this contract, they notified Manning & Mackintosh that they would not consent to the transfer, and they further notified them that the Government resumed to themselves all the concessions which had been made in the Garay grant, for the reason that the time limited in the grant for the performance of the work had expired. They not only did that, but they instructed the Minister of Mexico resident in the United States to serve upon Garay, who was then residing in New York, a like notice, which I ask the Secretary to do me the favor to read.

The Secretary accordingly read it, as follows:

MEXICAN LEGATION TO THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

His Excellency the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Mexican Republic, in his note of the 8th of the last March, commands me, by order of his Excellency the President, to notify you that the time of the extension of the privilege for opening a way of intercourse, of interoceanic communication through the Isthmus of Tehuantepec having expired, all the concessions made to you by the decree of March, 1842, have ceased, and the Republic has reassumed all her rights upon this matter. God and Liberty!

LUIS DE LA ROSA.

TO SEÑOR DON JOSE GARAY, New York.

BALTIMORE, April 8, 1849.

Mr. HALE. That Garay received that notice in season is substantiated by the fact, that on the 12th of April he answered it. Now, it must be remembered that up to this time there had not been the least intimation to Mexico that anybody except Garay had any interest in the contract for making the interoceanic communication. They had been notified of the transfer of the colonization grant, and probably good reasons were suggested why they should favor that assignment, because they wanted foreigners to come in and settle. But up to this moment they had never received any intimation that anybody but Garay was interested in the other grant; and when they did hear it, they notified Manning & Mackintosh that they did not recognize them as transferees of Garay, inasmuch as the two years granted by the decree of 1846 had expired, and the privilege of the claim had likewise become extinct.

In view of all these facts, I wish the Senate to look at the position of the President of the United States, of the late Secretary of State, and of our Minister to Mexico. The complaint has gone out to the world that, induced by the tempting offers of Mexico, American citizens have gone on and invested their money, their means, in this grant, relying upon the good faith of Mexico; and that Mexico having refused to keep her faith, this Government is called upon to go even to the extreme resort of war, to vindicate the outraged rights of those American citizens who have been thus trampled upon by Mexico. Why, sir, this was a Mexican grant to a Mexican citizen, to be performed on Mexican soil, and the time and time again for which the extension had been sought and granted, had expired, and nothing had been done. Then it was sold to Manning & Mackintosh, to induce the English Government to come in and see if they could not be affected. It was transferred to English subjects in order to try to get England to bully Mexico into what her sense of justice would not dictate to her. I do not know, and I have not the facts that I can state to the Senate sufficient to warrant me in saying, that an application was made to the British authorities to induce them take up this claim of Manning & Mackintosh. I have not such evidence as will authorize me to lay it before the Senate, but I have as much as satisfies my own mind that their interposition was asked, and that the British officials refused to touch it with their fingers.

What then? Six months after this—six months after the contract had expired, and had been annulled, we find—what? After the Government of Mexico had notified Garay, had notified Manning & Mackintosh, and everybody, that the grant had expired by its own limitation and by a neglect to comply with its conditions; after an attempt had been made to enlist the powerful support of the British Government in behalf of the claim assigned to Manning & Mackintosh, British subjects, and it stood in their hands, Mackintosh sending, day after day, notes to the Mexican Government, and his own Government not appearing to back him up; what then do we find? Why, on the 15th of July, 1849, six months after this, Mr. Mackintosh informed the Government of Mexico that he was going to inform his partners, residing out of the Republic, of what had taken place in regard to his enterprise, the headquarters of which, by common consent of all parties interested, had been definitively established in the United States; the company being represented by Señor Don Pedro Amada Hargous, who for the future would deal with the Government of the Republic, since he, Mackintosh, had ceased to represent the interests of said company. That is the first time, the 15th of July, 1849, that Mr. Hargous's name appears in this matter. The grant had before that time expired by its own limitation in 1848. It had been annulled by the Mexican Congress, and resumed by the Mexican Government. Mackintosh, the English assignee, had been notified of this; Garay had been notified of it; the thing was as dead as death could make it. Then, in order to revive it, if possible, it was assigned to citizens of the United States, and the Government of the United States was called upon to go in and vindicate the rights of its citizens, who had been induced, upon the tempting offers of Mexico, to invest their capital in the enterprise.

What were those offers? Why, sir, the Mexican Government said to every citizen of the United States, "Before you can be interested in this contract, or before you can go on to this line as a settler, you must renounce your nationality—you must give up the idea of appealing to your own Government—you must come here upon Mexican soil, and take a Mexican contract, and be content with Mexican laws, and such a judgment and adjudication of your rights as Mexican tribunals can give you." These were the tempting offers that were held out. That was the plighted faith of Mexico upon which the citizens of the United States went there, and invested their means in this contract.

Now, I know very well that there is an attempt made by the Committee on Foreign Relations and by the Secretary of State, to show that, notwithstanding the grant had expired by its own limitation; notwithstanding the objections to the authority of Santa Anna, and of Carnilizo, and of Salas, to make the decrees; notwithstanding that the two years prescribed by Salas in his decree of November 6, 1846, had also expired, there are yet reasons enough by which it can be made to appear that Mexico has acknowledged the grant subsequently. I will first take the reasons given by the Committee on Foreign Relations. The committee say:

"The committee will now proceed to show that the Mexican Government has, subsequently to this decree of November, 1846, recognized, in the most unequivocal manner, the binding validity of this grant, and admitted its obligation to abide by it.

"In 1846–'47 the assignment of the grant to Manning & Mackintosh was duly notified to the Government of Mexico, and, on their complaint, President Herrera issued orders to the Governors of Oaxaca and Vera Cruz to prevent the cutting of mahogany, on the lands granted, by any other than the English company."

That is one reason, and the answer to that must have suggested itself to everybody who has listened to me. The assignment spoken of here, made in 1847 to Manning & Mackintosh, was not an assignment of the right to make a communication between the two oceans, but it was an assignment of the mere right to colonize the country. It related to colonization entirely. That was an object which the Mexican Government was anxious to have effected, to have the country settled, and therefore it confirmed that assignment. It is an abundant answer to that further to say that Manning & Mackintosh so understood it; Garay so understood it; and everybody so understood it; because in September, 1848, Garay executed another conveyance to them, by which he gave them, in addition to the right of colonization, the right of making this way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. The committee go on to give their second reason:

"In 1847, whilst the treaty of peace was under negotiation, Mr. Trist, the Commissioner on the part of the United States, by instruction from his Government, proposed a large money consideration to Mexico for a right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and was answered 'that Mexico could not treat on this subject, because she 'had, several years before, made a grant to one of her own 'citizens, who had transferred his right, by authorization of 'the Mexican Government, to English subjects, of whose 'rights Mexico could not dispose.'"

Whatever these negotiations may have meant—whether they meant to have a little diplomacy there—whether they meant to represent the matter a little stronger than it was—nothing is clearer than that they could not have had in their heads or hearts the idea that Garay had assigned to any English subjects the right of making this inter-oceanic communication, because the contract under which Manning & Mackintosh claimed that right was not executed until some eighteen months afterwards. That contract was executed in September, 1848, and these negotiations were going on in the early part of 1847. It is therefore perfectly plain that the negotiations could not have referred to a grant to make that way across the Isthmus, because it was not assigned to Manning & Mackintosh for more than a year afterwards. What, then, did the Commissioners mean? They meant the right of colonization, because that was the only contract which had been made. But the committee go on and give their third reason to show that Mexico acknowledged this grant, and that reason is in these words:

"After the assignment of the grant to the present American holders, the Minister of the United States in Mexico was instructed by his Government to apprise that of Mexico of the desire of this company to commence their work by a thorough survey of the Isthmus; and the Minister was further instructed to make overtures for a treaty securing to the enterprise the joint protection of the two Governments. The Mexican Government, as we learn from the correspondence of Mr. Letcher with the Mexican Minister of Foreign Relations, 'made not the slightest opposition in 'forwarding passports, and issued orders to the departments 'of Oaxaca and Vera Cruz, not only to avoid interposing 'any obstacles in their way, but, on the contrary, to afford 'them aid and hospitality.'"

As has been remarked, I think by the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] who addressed the Senate upon this subject some days ago, it is a very curious fact, that while there are so many letters and so many short notes given, which passed between Mr. Letcher and the Mexican Government upon this subject, this very important letter, in which he communicates to them the fact, as would seem to be supposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, that this company were desirous of sending on engineers to pursue the work, is not found in the correspondence. There is no account of it. Mr. Letcher made some sort of a communication, soliciting for some engineers, upon some terms, the right to go over there and make a survey. Did Mr. Letcher tell the Mexican Government when he made this application, that the engineers were the servants of this company, that the holders of the Garay grant were about to commence operations, and that he wished passports for them? You cannot tell. So far as Mr. Letcher's application is concerned, there is a perfect vacuum. We do not know what he said, but I think the Senate will be at no loss to gather what it was, from the answer made by the Mexican Minister, Mr. Lacunza, to the Governor of Oaxaca, because in that he recites the application to him. The letter of Mr. Lacunza is in these words:

MEXICO, April 5, 1850.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Several American engineers having been appointed for the purpose of examining the possibility of opening a communication between the two seas, by way of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and desirous as is his Excellency the President, during their travels in your State, that they should meet with no embarrassments, but, on the contrary, be treated with all hospitality, he has been pleased to direct that his wishes should be communicated to you, as I now have the honor to do, officially; repeating, at the same time, the assurances of my esteem. God and liberty! LACUNZA.

HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR OF STATE OF OAXACA.

I think the Senate will be at no loss to understand what sort of an application was made to Mr. Lacunza for these passports. It was a representation that engineers had been appointed by the American Government. What is the language? "Several American engineers have been appointed." For what purpose? For commencing work under the Garay grant? No; nothing of that sort, but "for the purpose of examining 'the possibility of opening a communication be-'tween the two seas by way of the Isthmus of 'Tehuantepec." Such was the representation that was made to Mr. Lacunza, the Mexican Minister, upon which the passports were granted. Mexico was as desirous of ascertaining the possibility of that communication as the Government of the United States; and finding that this Government had appointed its engineers to ascertain the practicability of this great work, which was to do so much for Mexico, for the United States, and for the world, they did what was becoming the offices of a friendly Government. They issued a request to the Governor of the State through which the engineers were to pass, that they might be hospitably received and treated while they were ascertaining the practicability of this communication.

These are all the reasons assigned by the Committee on Foreign Relations to show that Mexico has recognized this grant, except what is to be found in the treaty itself; that is, the treaty which was signed by the Mexican and the American Ministers, and transmitted to this Government, ratified by the American Senate, and rejected by the Mexican Congress. Now, I take it for granted that I need not argue before this enlightened body that nothing in such a treaty as that can by any possibility be binding upon Mexico. Who ever heard that a treaty reduced to writing, and signed and ratified by one Government, imposed any obligations upon a Government which rejected it? It is a new doctrine, and one which cannot be sustained. With all deference to this honorable committee, I think they must have been hard pushed for reasons when they undertook to find, in the fact that the Garay grant was acknowledged in a treaty which Mexico rejected, evidence that Mexico had admitted the grant. But even that bare apology of a reason does not exist, because there is nothing of that sort in the treaty; but there is a simple provision that the actual holder of the right, be he who he may, should be consulted.

Thus I have disposed of the reasons why Mexico has acknowledged this right, so far as the Committee on Foreign Relations are concerned. But Mr. Webster, in one of his letters, has more reasons than the committee, if they are not better. In a letter to Mr. De la Rosa, dated Washington, April 30, 1851, (after Mr. De la Rosa had notified him, and after this Government had been notified times innumerable that Mexico did not and would not recognize this grant,) Mr. Webster wrote back, evidently with a good deal of temper, and told them that Mexico did recognize it. Mr. De la Rosa wrote an earnest and respectful letter to Mr. Webster, telling him that his Government never could recognize the Garay grant, and Mr. Webster wrote back telling him that Mexico did recognize it. Mr. Webster went on and gave eleven reasons to show that Mexico acknowledged the grant.

His first reason is the decree of the Mexican Government of the 1st March, 1842. Well, sir, as that expired in 1844, it seems to me that the first reason of the eleven must fall to the ground. The second is the contract made between the Mexican Minister of Foreign Relations and Don José de Garay. Under that decree the contract was limited to the time specified in the decree, and died with it; that is to say, in July, 1844, but was subsequently extended to 1845. The third reason given by Mr. Webster is the Mexican decree of the 9th of February, 1843. That was a decree giving the lands that were conveyed by the contract of the 7th of January, 1847, into the possession of Garay; and how the sagacious mind of Mr. Webster could have gathered from the fact that Mexico consented that the lands which were afterwards assigned to Manning & Mackintosh for colonization should be given up to Garay, was proof that they had recognized the existence of this grant, which expired in 1845, and afterwards in 1848, passes my comprehension.

The next reason given by Mr. Webster is the decree of the same Government, of the 4th of October, 1843; that is the decree permitting engineers to go on and make a survey. The fifth reason is the decree of the same Government, of the 28th of December, 1843; that is the one which extended the grant to 1845. The sixth reason is the Mexican decree of November 5th, 1846; that is the decree of Salas, which expired in 1848, and how Mr. Webster could find evidence in the fact that a decree which expired in 1848 acknowledged the existence of the grant after 1848, is also a matter that I cannot comprehend. The seventh reason is the note of the Mexican Commissioners to Mr. Trist, of September 6th, 1847. I have already commented upon that, and I have shown that that note had nothing to do with the Garay grant, properly so called, but related to colonization. Mr. Webster's eighth reason is certainly a curious one, and it is "the note of Mr. Clifford to Mr. Lacunza, of the 20th of June, 1849." Mr. Clifford wrote to Mr. Lacunza, inquiring of him if the grant had been annulled. Mr. Lacunza answered that it had not been annulled, but that it was liable to be annulled for the reason that its conditions had not been complied with. How Mr. Webster could find in that inquiry of Mr. Clifford any evidence that the Mexican Government acknowledged the existence of the grant subsequent to 1848, I confess I cannot conceive.

The ninth reason of Mr. Webster is the letter of Messrs. Manning & Mackintosh to Mr. Lacunza, of the 25th of July, 1849. That was the letter in which Manning & Mackintosh inform the Government of Mexico that they had become the assignees of the Garay grant, and that Government refused to recognize them as such, and in that fact Mr. Webster finds evidence that Mexico had assented to it. Manning & Mackintosh told the Government of Mexico that they were the assignees of Garay. Mexico said, We cannot recognize you as such; yet that is cited as a reason to prove that Mexico did recognize them.

The tenth reason is the letter of Mr. Lacunza to Mr. Letcher, of the 5th of April, 1850, communicating a copy of an order of the same date issued by the Mexican Government to the Governor of the State of Oaxaca, directing him to receive with hospitality the American engineers who had been appointed to survey the Tehuantepec route. Mr. Webster here evidently treats it as if American engineers had been appointed by the Government, and in the fact that they were hospitably received by Mexico, he finds evidence that Mexico acknowledged the grant.

The eleventh and last reason of Mr. Webster is the same as that suggested by the Committee on Foreign Relations, the articles of the treaty which had not been accepted, but on the other hand had been rejected by Mexico.

In these eleven reasons, and in the three or four assigned by the Committee on Foreign Relations, are to be found the reasons which render it incompatible with the dignity of this Government any longer to negotiate with Mexico on this subject. Now, what has been the course of Mexico? What has she done? Has Mexico refused to treat with the Government of the United States? Has Mexico, like China, shut herself up within her own borders, and said there shall be no egress or ingress, or passing across her territory? Far from it. Mexico, from first to last, has not only been willing, but has been anxious to open this communication. Read the letters. I shall not weary the Senate by going over them. But any one who will read the letters of Mr. Letcher to the Mexican Government, and the answers, will find that Mexico was earnestly and anxiously desirous to have this communication opened; but this Garay grant she would not confirm. Mexico says she will not give up the sovereignty of her soil to a mere private corporation. Mr. Letcher wrote home and told the Government that he had been informed by the Mexican Minister, "Once remove this Garay grant, and there will be no difficulty at all in making a treaty." This is a very important point, and therefore I will read from Mr. Letcher's letter. In the letter from him to Mr. Webster, dated 14th December, 1851, relating a conversation which he had with General Arista, the President of Mexico, he says that Arista told him—

"That Mexico was poor and oppressed, but so far as he had it in his power to guard and protect her honor, he was determined she should not only be free from just reproach, but should stand upon elevated grounds before the world, in every particular, in reference to a matter of so much importance; that although she had been, and was at this moment, badly treated by many of my countrymen, still, from motives of sound policy, she was disposed, and such was his own sincere wish, to concede to the United States, in preference to any other Power, all the privileges which might be necessary to accomplish the greatest enterprise of the age; but that, in the event of such concession, no allusion must be made to the Garay grant.

"'Leave out that grant—say nothing about it, and I am ready,' said he, 'to enter into a treaty with you which I think will be satisfactory to both countries.'"

How was this Garay grant looked upon in Mexico? Let me show you how it was looked upon there. Mr. Letcher, in his letter to Mr. Webster of the 29th October, 1851, says:

"It appears there is a fixed prejudice from one end of this country to the other against the Garay grant, upon which you know the treaty is predicated."

In the same letter, he says:

"It is opposed by the clergy, by the press, by both Houses of Congress, by every political party, by every faction, and by every fragment of a faction in the whole country."

Here, then, was a grant odious to Mexico; odious to every class in Mexico; annulled by the Congress of Mexico; the holders of which were notified from the first assignment which was made, that Mexico would never recognize them. And yet, the great interest of the age, this communication between the two oceans, is to be suspended; the progress of society, the great interests of commerce and of social intercourse, and all the interests of humanity, which are so intimately connected with the opening of this transit between the two oceans, are suspended and blocked by what the Mexican Minister of Foreign Relations has well termed a mere frigid mercantile speculation.

And, sir, to such a degree had this Garay grant magnified itself in the estimation of the Administration, that when a treaty came to be formed for the opening of this way between the two oceans, it was made by this Government a condition of the treaty, that the actual holder of that grant should give his consent to it before it should be submitted to the Senate. And Mr. Peter A. Hargous comes forward, and notifies Mr. Webster that he, Peter A. Hargous, is the man who stands, like the Angel with the flaming sword at the gate of Paradise, and that no treaty of peace shall come before the American Senate until he gives his consent to it. Yes, sir, it was a tripartite convention. We were not willing to enter into a tripartite convention with France and England in reference to Cuba; but we were willing to enter into a treaty, one party of which was the United States of America, another the Republic of Mexico, and the third, Peter A. Hargous. Mr. Hargous says that Mr. Webster submitted the treaty to him, and he made various suggestions of modification to it. Now, I ask, is not that a most humiliating position for this country to stand in? But there is another fact that I have upon the very best authority, which, in my humble judgment, is disgraceful to the American Government, and I will state it. When your Minister goes to Mexico,—and I will do Mr. Letcher the justice to say that I am told he did not begin the practice,—he is the guest, he is fed at the board and lodged in the bed of this very Mr. Hargous.

Mr. SEWARD. That is not true of the present Minister.

Mr. HALE. I do not say anything of the present Minister; but it is true, as I am informed on authority which I cannot doubt, and abundance of which is now in this city, that when, for years back, a Minister is sent from this country and arrives on the frontiers of Mexico, he is taken possession of by Mr. Hargous, fed at his board, lodged in his bed, and kept there, and considered, instead of being the representative of this Government, as a sort of attaché to Mr. Hargous.

Mr. MASON. I ask the Senator to state the authority on which he makes the declaration that the American Minister in Mexico lodged at the house and lived at the board of this Mr. Hargous, who is now the holder of this grant.

Mr. HALE. I do not say which of the Hargouses it is, for I understand there are two brothers of them in one firm. I do not say which of them it is.

Mr. MASON. I am uninformed about the fact, but it is a very serious charge to be made in reference to a gentleman who represented this country abroad; and I submit to the Senator that he state the name of the person upon whose authority he makes the charge.

Mr. HALE. I will state the authority, and I have more than one authority for it. I will give the Senator the name of Mr. Buckingham Smith, who was Secretary of Legation to Mexico. I will give him the authority of Mr. La Vega, the present Secretary of Legation of Mexico near this Government.

Mr. MASON. Then the Senator will allow us to know what the charge is. Do I understand him to say that the American Minister lived at the house of this Mr. Hargous, who is now the representative of this claim?

Mr. HALE. One of the Hargouses.

Mr. MASON. I want a direct answer—yea or nay.

Mr. HALE. I suppose it is both. The firm is Hargous & Brother, I believe.

Mr. SEWARD. Peter A. Hargous lives in New York, and his brother lives in Mexico.

Mr. HALE. I am told that one of them lives in New York, and the other in Mexico. It is one of the brothers. I understand they are associated.

Mr. MASON. I understand, then, the Senator does not make the charge that the American Minister lived at the house of the representative of this claim?

Mr. HALE. I say that the American Minister lived at the house of one or other of them, Peter A. Hargous or his brother, or both. I said I would do Mr. Letcher the justice to say that I did not believe he began the practice, but that it was a matter which was in existence before his time. Whether it was Peter or his brother I do not know, and that is no matter. It was one of them. I say that for the American Minister to be the guest and to be residing in the house of one of the members, or the brother of a member of this firm, at the time when he was urging the claim of these Hargouses, and when the claim of Hargous prevented the ratification of a treaty between the two Governments, is a fact that ought to be known. Whether it confers honor or disgrace I will not trouble myself to say.

Mexico not only made these professions of the President (Arista) that they were willing to execute a treaty for the opening of this way if the Garay grant was not insisted upon, but the Minister of Mexico, Mr. Ramirez gave evidence of the sincerity with which he entertained these sentiments by the fact that he transmitted to this Government for its acceptance and ratification, a treaty in which this right of way was fully secured, and secured as a neutral pass for all friendly nations. The Government of the United States did not accept, and did not send to the Senate that treaty, for the sole reason, as Mr. Letcher, months afterwards, as the published correspondence shows, informed the Mexican Minister that it did not take care of the Garay grant. That was the whole of it. That was the reason assigned by Mr. Letcher, in the correspondence which has been submitted to the Senate and published, why this treaty was rejected. It was because the Garay grant stood in the way. Here two great nations, Mexico and the Government of the United States—ay, sir, here two hemispheres had to stand apart and refrain from all the conveniences of commercial intercourse, which might be opened to them by this interoceanic communication, because the private interests of a speculating company were thrown in the way. The nations had to stand back, commerce to stand still, progress to cease, and humanity not to go forward, because this mercantile speculation was thrown in the way. And now our Government is called upon to levy war against the Republic of Mexico, because she will not do what she has told you she cannot and will not do; what is repugnant not only to the opinions of her Government and her tribunals, but is hateful and odious to every section of her people.

I will not trouble the Senate with reading the statement which I have before me, giving an analysis of the different changes which have taken place in the affairs of the Government of Mexico, so far as this grant is concerned. My object is simply to state the general views which I take, and which I believe are firm and irrefutable, according to the documents which are submitted to us. But there are one or two other matters to which I wish to address myself for a few moments.

The honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] in the speech which he made upon the subject, said, that however all this may be, though the argument may all be against him, he considers it an irrefutable proposition, that under what is, I suppose, the old common-law right of way, we have a right of way across Tehuantepec, whether Mexico consents or not. Now, according to the common-law, rights of way are of three kinds, or, more accurately speaking, of two kinds. There is a right of way by grant, and by prescription, which presupposes a grant, and there is a right of way of necessity; and a right of way of necessity is measured by the necessity, and when the necessity ceases, the right ceases. That is the law. If you, Mr. President, sell me a piece of land surrounded on all four sides by your land, so that I have no way to get to the highway except over your land, I have a right to go over it. That is a way of necessity." If you sell me a piece of land surrounded on three sides by the land of strangers, and on the fourth side by yours, I have a right of way of necessity over your land, because you sold it to me. But this right of necessity does not extend to rights of convenience; for if I buy a piece of land of you, and I can get to the highway over your land by going half a mile, and I cannot get to it by my own land but by going around ten miles, that does not give me a right of way over your land because it is twenty times more convenient. The right of way must be one of absolute necessity. If I buy a piece of land of you, it may be vastly more convenient to go over your land than over my own, but if I own land by which I can get to the highway, I have no right of way of necessity over your land, and cannot take it, no matter how convenient it may be.

Let us apply that principle in this case. We bought California of Mexico, and it is contended by the Senator from Virginia that we have a right of way through Mexico to get to it. Have we not the highway? What is the ocean? What is the sea? The highway of nations. We have, then, a right of way over the highway, and that supersedes the right of way of necessity, which we might otherwise have. Besides that, we have got a right of way over our own land. We own all the land from here in a straight line to California, and for that reason we have no right of way of necessity. If these two reasons are not sufficient, I can give you a third. We have by contract another right of way over Panama. Here are three separate rights of way that we have; and the idea that we have a right of way of necessity, is, with all deference to the honorable Senator, absurd. I would not say it if I thought he had examined it; but inasmuch as I know that he cannot have examined it, I must say, that the position is absurd. The common-law is, "A right of way may arise from necessity in several respects;"—— but I will not read it. I was about to read from Kent's Commentaries; but the same doctrine which I have stated to you is there laid down, and it is not necessary to read it.

A SENATOR. That is the common-law doctrine, and does not apply as between nations.

Mr. HALE. The same doctrine, however, is laid down by Vattel in "the law of nations." But the right of way is the right to pass over the soil, not to subvert it, not to dig it up, not to make canals, not to make railroads; but it is simply to pass over the soil in the easiest manner possible, doing the least possible injury. I trust the honorable Senator from Virginia, who is an able and astute lawyer, when he comes to examine this matter, will reconsider that opinion of his, and that he will not be prepared to go to war upon the doctrine of a right of way of necessity, on our part, over the Isthmus of Tehuantepec.

The honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. DOWNS,] in his remarks on this subject, made a suggestion, which I was very sorry to hear, and that was, that we should go and take possession of the Isthmus by force. Sir, I think we are going back to the ages of barbarism when the law of force is to be substituted for the tribunal of reason and argument. We are too late in this age of the world to throw away the aids of diplomacy and reason and argument, to resort to the law of force; and I trust we shall not do it. This argument of force has been threatened to Mexico again and again; and what has Mexico said to it? I have not the extract by me, but I have it in my memory. Mexico, when force was threatened her, answered, substantially: "Your Government is strong, ours is weak; you can take what of our soil you please, but we cannot go further than we have gone."

Sir, in that very declaration Mexico is stronger than you are with your armies; in that very declaration she has fortified herself in a position too impregnable to be assaulted by your artillery. Why, sir? Because she has appealed to a feeling in the human heart which we will not disregard and will never forget, and that is to our magnanimity—to our sense of justice—to the regard with which the strong should ever consider the weak. She has placed her argument before us; she has demonstrated, to say the least, to her own satisfaction the integrity of her position and the justice of her cause; and when you reply to this appeal that you are going to take forcible possession of her territory, what is her answer? "You are strong—we are weak; take what you will; we can go no further." Sir, this country will learn in such a contest as that, that there are forces more formidable than armies, and one such force is the enlightened public opinion of the civilized and Christian world. And that same public opinion which threw the ægis of its protection around the wanderer Kossuth in the Turkish realms, and saved him secure from the gigantic power of Russia, will shield and protect Mexico from any assaults which have been threatened upon her by this Administration.

I know, sir, that I have taken what will be called an unpopular side of this question; I have taken the Mexican side. I know that, in the cant and popular phrase of the day, it will be said I am against my country. Sir, I am for my country. I desire that her fame may be preserved untarnished. I desire that justice may mark her progress. I desire no interests, no attainments for her that are inconsistent with the highest regards that are due to the rights of our neighbors, and more particularly and emphatically our weaker neighbors. Such I believe to be the position of Mexico. She is strong in her weakness. She is strong in the appeal which she makes to our magnanimity, to our justice. I stand here, then, to-day, sir, pleading not for Mexico, but for my own country; and I ask that you will not tarnish the fair fame of the Republic. I ask that you will not commit this wrong which you are threatening to perpetrate upon a nation which may be said literally to be helpless at your feet; that you will not in that way tarnish the reputation which yet has continued to be the pride and boast and the inheritance of all our people. No, sir; let the interests of the nation, of the age, of humanity, of commerce, of social intercourse, of Christianity and civilization, be taken out of the broker's board. Sir, we want somebody to come in, as the Saviour of old went into the Temple of Jerusalem, and drove the money-changers out of the Temple. We want to bring to the deliberation of this question those considerations which pertinently and appropriately belong to it. When that is done, when this Government is content to advocate these great interests, and leave those who may have made contracts with the Mexican Government to the appropriate remedy under Mexican laws, then, and not till then, shall we put ourselves right.

I believe that it is our duty, as is suggested in one of the resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, "to review our existing relations with Mexico;" and it is our duty to discard entirely the Garay grant; it is our duty to throw it aside. As was well suggested the other day, we are changing the venue. The issue was properly triable in Mexico. It has been tried there, and the grant has been condemned there. It was tried, abandoned, and condemned, before any citizen of the United States had anything to do with it. I protest, then, that we shall not be brought in, as second-rate lawyers, to take up and advocate a dishonored obligation, and have our negotiations reduced to that low standard. If we are going to be practicing attorneys for Mr. Hargous, to assert his claim, let him bring us a claim that is not dishonored upon its face. Sir, it is an insult to us when he comes and asks the United States to lend their diplomacy to enforce his claim, when he presents us a claim which is dishonored on its face; which has been defeated and has expired. We are not the first attorneys that have been applied to. The claim was first transferred to Great Britain, and she refused to touch it. Six months it remained in that situation, and then, in July, 1849, an appeal was made to the American Government. This Government commenced its negotiations with the Mexican Government, as disclosed in the document which I have before me, continued and ended with the Garay grant.

Sir, I will not intimate, because I do not believe, and I have no opinion on the subject, that there were any undue influences brought to bear upon anybody, at any time, in reference to this grant; but I will say that I think there was force in the suggestion which General Arista made to Mr. Fillmore, in his answer, when he told him that there was something a little mysterious about it. I leave the thing there.

I have thus, sir, in, I know, a very imperfect manner, laid before the Senate the facts which I have collected in relation to this matter. I have spent some time upon it. I have devoted some labor to it, because I have felt, and felt deeply, upon it. I have not laid the facts before you as succinctly and distinctly as I might, but I think I have laid before the Senate enough to satisfy any man who will look at the question with an unbiased judgment, that duty and honor and humanity and self-respect, demand of us that we take this Garay grant and throw it out of this Chamber, so that we shall be left free from any such disturbing influences, and come to the consideration of those great questions which should appropriately engage the deliberations of the American Senate, when we are investigating such weighty matters.

THE TEHUANTEPEC GRANT.

SPEECH OF HON. W. BROOKE,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE SENATE, February 15, 1853,

On the Resolutions reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, in regard to the Tehuantepec Grant.

Mr. BROOKE said: Mr. President, I regret exceedingly to attempt to address the Senate at so late an hour, but there are so many special orders ahead, that I am very much afraid if we let this matter go over now, we shall never get in sight of it again, and therefore, with the permission of the Senate, I will offer a very few observations upon this subject at this time.

I am very glad, sir, that the opposition to these resolutions, so far as it has been developed, has come from the quarter from which it has come. The discussion has developed that the opposition comes from that spirit which looks with feelings of hostility upon every object of interest that is not located north of a certain line. It indicates to my mind that spirit which is willing to strike at the dearest interests of the nation, if the blow is struck through a southern heart.

The Senator from New Hampshire has well said, and with prophetic foresight, that he would be charged with having taken the Mexican side of this question. He has well said it. The Senator from New York in his remarks the other day undertook so to adjust the lens of history, as to concentrate its rays upon this perplexed and difficult subject. The Senator from New Hampshire, I suppose, has attempted to assist him in the operation; but those Senators should know that in all optical instruments, unless the adjustment is made with the most truthful accuracy, confusion instead of illumination is apt to ensue. Unless the adjustment is perfect, it may be that the objects of sight upon which it is turned may be swelled to large and unnatural proportions. It may. But again, it may be that they may be diminished to equally unnatural and ridiculous insignificance. Such, I think, has been the result, with all due deference to those gentlemen, of the experiments of each of them. When they turned their historical telescope upon Mexican rights and Mexican interests, those rights and those interests loomed up in most portentous magnitude; but when it was turned upon American rights and American interests, those rights and interests were converted into seeming non-entity.

Mr. President, in the anxiety which I have felt in reference to this question, the interests of the company and of the private individuals who own this grant, have had no weight whatever with me. I have looked to the question solely in a national point of view. I have regarded the great national interests that are at stake. Why, sir, this crossing, as we all know, was deemed of so much importance by Mr. Polk, before the golden treasures of California had developed themselves, that, through Mr. Buchanan, his Secretary of State, he authorized Mr. Trist, his negotiator of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, to offer Mexico $15,000,000 for it, and for it alone. How was Mr. Trist answered? By the assertion on the part of the Mexican negotiators, I may say on the part of the Mexican Government, that this concession could not be made to the United States because it was already in the hands of English subjects, acquired by virtue of a grant which had been made some years previous. And notwithstanding the assertion of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, I here assert, with the proof in my hand, or before my eyes, that Mexico never did make any objection to the grant, either on account of its invalidity, or on account of its having expired by its own limitation, until it had come into the hands of American citizens. When it was the property of English subjects, she regarded the grant of such validity and of such sanctity, that she was willing to refuse the tempting offer of $15,000,000 for it; but when she found that it had been transferred to American citizens, then it was that she began to complain of its invalidity.

It will be recollected that the honorable Senator from New Hampshire sent to the Secretary's desk to be read, the notice of the Mexican Minister to Don José Garay, that Mexico regarded this grant as no longer binding—as no longer possessing any validity. What was the date of that notice? According to my recollection, it was some time in the month of April, 1849, and it was based upon a notice given to the Mexican Government in January, 1849. If the Senator had examined with a little more care and attention the American side of this document, he would have found that there was in existence a document transferring this grant to Mr. Hargous in October, 1848. I frankly admit that I have no evidence that Mexico had knowledge of this transfer to Hargous, but it was made in the city of Mexico and acknowledged before a notary. Still, although she may have had no notice of that fact, I am authorized to say from the evidence that it was not until that transfer from Manning & Mackintosh to Hargous that Mexico ever made any objection to the validity of the grant.

We are told by the Senator from New Hampshire that Mexico has always been willing, and is still willing, to concede this privilege, provided the Garay grant is thrown aside. I admit it. But she is not willing, and has never been willing, to concede it to American citizens on such terms as would be consistent with the honor and the interests of the American people.

I hold in my hand a decree of the Mexican Government, issued on the 14th of April, 1852, which contains the terms on which she is willing to make this grant, and by those terms she reserves to herself the full control of the work. She reserves to herself full and complete sovereignty over the whole of it, with a right to impose such obstacles and such charges as she may think proper. In order to show further the disposition of the Government of Mexico, I would state that a gentleman of the name of Sloo made a proposition to that Government last spring.

At the request of Senators the honorable Senator here gave way, and the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 16, 1853.

Mr. BROOKE concluded his remarks as follows:

Before coming to the point at which I left this question yesterday, I deem it proper to make some reference to the charges, or rather imputations, which were attempted to be made by the Senator from New Hampshire, not only against Mr. Hargous, but against our Minister to Mexico, and the late distinguished Secretary of State, now no more.

Sir, if an advocacy of this right of way, and of the validity of the Garay grant, on the part of our late Minister to Mexico, and on the part of the late distinguished Secretary of State, implies corruption, that charge lies not only at their door, but at the door of every member of the Senate who concurs with them in opinion, because our opinions are based upon the same facts and reasoning as theirs. All that I have to say in reference to Mr. Hargous, the representative of the holders of this grant, is, that he is not the gentleman at whose house our Minister to Mexico boarded. That gentleman has not now, and never has had any connection whatever with this grant. But, sir, has it come to this, that a member of this body shall go among the officials and the attaches of a foreign embassy to make inquiries as to the place of boarding and the place of sleeping of our foreign Ministers, prying into their privacy, for the purpose of ascertaining their motives of action?

Mr. BORLAND. Will my friend from Mississippi here permit me to say a few words in justice to Mr. Hargous?

Mr. BROOKE. Certainly, sir.

Mr. BORLAND. I heard with great regret yesterday the allusion made to Mr. Hargous, and the imputations which were indirectly, at any rate, cast upon him by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.] I ask permission of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BROOKE] to say a word here for this reason, and this only. I was in Mexico for a large portion of the time when we were engaged in the war with that country, and it so happened that I formed an acquaintance with Mr. Hargous, the one who still resides in Mexico, a somewhat close and altogether favorable acquaintance; and from the opportunities I then had to know him, and learn his character and habits, I well understand, and trust I justly appreciate his course in opening his house to the American Minister, or any other respectable American citizen, who might chance to be in Mexico. Mr. Hargous had resided in Mexico many years, and his position there, and his means, were such as to enable him to do much for the convenience, comfort, and real welfare of any of our citizens, who might need or desire his services and attentions. And, sir, from my personal observation, and from other sources of reliable information, I feel fully authorized to say, and I have much satisfaction in saying it, that those services and those attentions were never withheld; but, on the contrary, that not only his house, but his heart and his purse were always wide open to his countrymen. I am glad of an opportunity to say this. And more, I refer to the reports of our military commanders in Mexico, during the war, in evidence of his patriotic and valuable services in the prosecution of that war. I refer, among others, particularly to those of General Worth, on whose staff he served as a volunteer aid-de-camp, in which service it was my fortune to be associated with him. And in the positions in which we have seen or heard of him, he has been found manifesting the spirit of true Americanism—an open, and warm-hearted, hospitable, patriotic Americanism, which it does an American heart good to contemplate. For such a spirit, no man stands more prominent, or more favorably before the country than Mr. Hargous. From his knowledge of Mexico, from his large means, and his patriotic spirit, few men were able to contribute more, and I doubt whether any one did contribute so much, to the successful operations of our army during the war than this gentleman.

So far, then, from its being matter of complaint or reproach to Mr. Hargous, or assumed as ground of suspicion of impropriety, that he has extended hospitality to the American Minister in Mexico, it is but in accordance with his uniform and praiseworthy course as an American gentleman; and instead of exciting our prejudice against any claim he may prefer, or any one of his name may have, it should the rather serve, certainly, as a favorable introduction of him to our consideration, and dispose us to do, in his behalf, with zeal and alacrity, whatever we may find to do justly. For, so far from finding fault with what he is found to have done, he stands conspicuously before us as a man entitled to the respect of all who respect and appreciate manly hospitality, noble generosity, and true American feeling.

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from New Hampshire ought to have prosecuted his inquiries a little further. He ought to have descended to the culinary department of the embassy, and inquired of these Mexican attachés—

> "Upon what meats hath this, our Letcher fed,
> That he is grown so great?"

That would have been conduct equally pertinent, equally dignified, and equally Senatorial. Sir, I have more than once had occasion to wonder at the very low estimate that that Senator seemed disposed to place on the integrity of the officials of this Government. I have heard him on more than one occasion assail the fugitive slave law because it gave a commissioner ten dollars when he returned a fugitive to his master, and only five dollars when he set the negro free, thus in effect charging that the commissioners of the United States in the part of the country where he resides, are liable to have their judgments influenced by the paltry sum of five dollars. Accordingly, in that spirit he has thrown out an imputation upon our Minister in Mexico, and upon our late distinguished Secretary of State, that they were liable to be influenced by improper motives at the suggestion of the Messrs. Hargous. Sir, I should hate to carry such thoughts in my bosom. I should deem them but the reflex of my own mind. I should fear that instead of holding the mirror up to others I was but delineating the corruptions of my own heart. I commend to the Senator the well-known motto of the Order of the Garter, "Honi soit qui mal y pense," "Evil be to him who evil thinks."

When I ceased to address the Senate yesterday evening, I was attempting to show that now was the favorable moment for us to obtain this grant, and that judging from the past acts of Mexico, we never could, in all future time, expect to obtain a franchise so favorable to American interests, American honor, and American commerce, as the present. I referred to a decree passed by the Mexican Congress last spring, in reference to this right of way, in which Mexico reserved to herself the full and entire control of passengers and freight across the Isthmus in all future grants. And I was about to refer to a contract that had been partially entered into with Mr. Sloo, as illustrative of some of the burdens that she is determined in future to impose upon all undertakings of this sort. It is a long one, and I will only refer to two articles of it. One, the sixteenth, is in these words:

> "The company binds itself under the Mexican flag, and the laws of the country, to establish a line of steamers from Vera Cruz to the head of navigation on the Coatzoalcos river."

So that Mexico contemplates in all future grants, in all future undertakings, to open this right of way that the steamers which connect it with our country, shall sail under the Mexican flag.

Again, she insists that any future company "shall not construct fortifications upon the Isthmus, form any military organization, nor transport any military forces, national or foreign, without the express authorization of the Government. That is, that in the event of a war, we cannot cross this Isthmus, cannot transport our armies and munitions of war, without the consent of Mexico. I ask Senators whether they are willing that this country shall put itself under such humiliating conditions as not to be able to connect that Isthmus with our own shores, unless by vessels sailing under the Mexican flag, and that we shall not have permission to carry our military stores, munitions of war, and soldiers, across this Isthmus, unless we bend the knee and ask permission of the Government of Mexico?

Mr. President, I propose very briefly to refer to some of the advantages that would accrue to this country from the acquisition of this right of way as it now stands and as it now belongs to our citizens. You are aware, sir, that the Isthmus of Tehuantepec is the most northern of those narrow crossings which indent the outline of the strip of land connecting the continents of North and South America; and here is a point of vast importance to us; it is the only one that has its eastern terminus upon the Gulf of Mexico. With reference to both the crossing at Panama and at Nicaragua our commerce and travel have to go outside of the Gulf to connect with vessels on the Pacific shore. It is an old maxim, and a good one, that in time of peace we should prepare for war; and in the event of a war all our commerce to the Pacific, by way of Panama and Nicaragua, would be exposed on its transit by the present route. I have before me a statement, drawn up by Lieutenant Maury, in reference to the course that vessels have to travel during six months of the year from New Orleans to the peninsula of Yucatan or the Island of Jamaica. On looking at the map one would suppose that the route at all times, from the city of New Orleans to the Island of Jamaica or to the peninsula of Yucatan, would be directly in a straight line across the Gulf, a distance of not more than five or six hundred miles; but we are informed by Lieutenant Maury, that in consequence of the Gulf monsoons, which blow some six months in the year, and in consequence of the strength of the Gulf stream, sail vessels from New Orleans, instead of passing along this direct line, have to go through the Straits of Florida, outside of the Gulf of Mexico entirely, and come again into the Gulf with the Gulf stream current; so that, as I have before remarked, in the event of a war, not only our whole commerce from the city of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Richmond, Norfolk, and Charleston, but also from the cities of Mobile and New Orleans, at least six months of the year would have to pass outside of what may be termed our own sea, and down into the Caribbean Gulf and go to its ports of destination. But suppose that this crossing is in our power; by defending the two narrow passes between the Island of Cuba and Florida on the one hand, and Cuba and Yucatan on the other, which can be done with much less outlay than the defense of our whole commerce outside of those Islands would cost, we would have our commerce entirely within a close sea—a mare clausum—the Gulf of Mexico.

There is another matter in the consideration of this question worthy of great attention. San Francisco, by the Tehuantepec route, is seventeen hundred miles nearer to the city of New Orleans than it is by the crossing at Nicaragua; and it is eleven hundred miles nearer to the city of New York; and I am informed by those who are well acquainted with the subject, that the voyage can be made from San Francisco to New York, via Tehuantepec, in seventeen days. There will thus be a saving of seven days over the shortest trip which has ever yet been made by either of the southern crossings.

Nor do I conceive that this project conflicts at all with the great enterprise of a Pacific railway. There are, it is well known, many articles which will ever require water transportation. For instance, the article of coal, which, I am told, loses on an average five per cent. for every one hundred miles it is transported on a railroad. We are now using on the Pacific ocean about two hundred thousand tons per annum, and all this must be transported to California by as short a railroad transit as possible. The conveyance must be nearly all by water, because on a railroad two thousand miles in length, from the Pacific to the Mississippi, according to the rule of computation I have referred to, it would be all wasted away to dust by the time it reached its destination. I merely cite this single instance; but it is manifest that railroads can never supersede water as a means of commercial intercourse; and even were the Pacific railroad built, the present water communications must ever be of indispensable necessity.

But, sir, manifest as are these advantages, I would not insist upon them if we had to seek this crossing without color of authority, without color of title, or without justice; and it is only because I conceive we have a right to insist upon the full and complete title which is now vested in American citizens that I advocate the passage of the resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. I will but briefly review that title, and then address myself to some of the arguments that were used against it by the honorable Senators from New York [Mr. SEWARD] and New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.]

The title arises in this way: In March, 1842, Don José de Garay, a Mexican citizen, applied to Santa Anna, then President of the Republic of Mexico, for a grant of the right of way to construct a railroad or canal across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. That privilege and concession were by Santa Anna freely accorded to Mr. Garay—accorded to him under the most solemn assurances and pledges that he and his assignees, whether natives or foreigners, should be protected in the right. Hear the pledge:

"That in the name of the Supreme Government, under the most solemn protests, he declares and promises that all and every one of the concessions mentioned in the preconcerted decree shall be honorably fulfilled, now and at all times, pledging the honor and public faith of the nation to maintain the projector, Don José de Garay, as well as any private individual or company succeeding or representing him, either natives or foreigners, in the undisturbed enjoyment of all the concessions granted, holding the national administration responsible for any acts of its own or its agents, which, from want of proper fulfillment of the covenant rights, injure the interests of the proprietors; all of course subject to the existence of the inserted decree."

The term of eighteen months was given him, in which to complete the preliminary surveys. Thus, by the original grant, the time for commencing the work was to expire in July, 1844. But Santa Anna, in December, 1843, in consequence of the representations of Garay that it was impossible to complete the surveys in that time, extended the time to the first of July, 1845. Early in January, 1845, Santa Anna was deposed; and in 1845, during the summer, (Herrera then being President of the Republic of Mexico,) Mr. Garay applied to the Mexican Congress for a further extension of the time of two years. His memorial was taken into consideration and referred to a committee. That committee made a favorable report. The report and resolutions recommending the extension of the grant for two years were unanimously adopted by the Chamber of Deputies, and sent to the Senate. In December, 1845, and before it could be acted upon, or rather while it was in the act of being passed, with the same unanimity with which it had passed through the other House, the Congress was broken up and the members dispersed by another of those revolutions which are so frequent in that country. Mr. Garay, on that account, failed in obtaining an extension of the time. Paredes succeeded, and in 1846, he was in his turn deposed, no Congress having met in the mean time. As evidence of the high estimate in which this great work was viewed, not only by Santa Anna, but by all parties in Mexico, I here refer to the report spoken of, and will read an extract:

"The committee would require the most eloquent pen to portray (if it were possible) the utility and the immense advantages which will redound from the realization of this enterprise to all countries, and especially to that upon whose soil it is made.

"Indeed it is true that we are placed between two oceans, and that it would be as easy for the country to establish its commercial depôt for the trade with Europe and Africa upon the eastern coast, and that with Oceanica and Asia upon the western shores of the Republic; but can we, in our infancy, and in a perpetual state of revolution, expect that our country should become the emporium of the commerce of the world? By no means—for we cannot even compete with the meanest monarchies of Europe, nor with the dilapidated empires of the East.

"Being in this situation, nothing suits our condition better than the opening of the contemplated communication. Our country, through it, can then become the center of wealth and prosperity, particularly when we reflect upon the richness of our mines, which are sources of envy even among the remote nations of the East. Perhaps, after all, we are destined to be the first nation of the globe. Flattering vision! God grant that it may prove prophetic!"

By another revolution Salas was made Provisional President, in accordance with what was called "the Plan of the Citadel;" and as soon as he was clothed with power, his attention was called to this application of Garay for an extension of the time. He took it up and examined it, and by a decree made on the 5th of September, 1846, he granted to Garay the extension which had been recommended by the Congressional committee and which had passed unanimously the lower House of the Congress of Mexico. In 1847 Garay assigned this contract to an English house, the firm of Manning & Mackintosh, who subsequently transferred it to citizens of the United States, and is now the property of a company located in New Orleans, who have since attempted to carry out the design of making the road, by sending a company of men there to make further surveys of the route, with a view of commencing the work. This company was driven off by the Mexican authorities, and the grant was declared void by the Mexican Government in 1851. I asserted yesterday, and I assert again, and I can make good the assertion by documents and proofs before me, that no objection was ever made to this grant, either on account of the time having expired within which the work was to be completed, or on account of the want of power in those who made it or extended it, until the grant passed out of the hands of the English company into the hands of American citizens. Nor, sir, was it until the year 1851, as is shown by a note of the Mexican Minister in this city to Mr. Webster, that any objection was ever made to this grant for want of power in those who made it. On the contrary, in 1849, in the note to which I have referred, the whole objection that was made, after she found the grant had passed into the hands of American citizens, was that it had expired by its own limitation. Here is an extract from Mr. De la Rosa's letter to Mr. Webster, of July 3d, 1851:

"Under date of April 8, 1849, Don José Garay was informed by this legation that the Minister of Relations of the Mexican Republic had determined, by order of his Excellency the President, that, inasmuch as the period for which the privilege had been extended for opening an oceanic communication through the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, had expired without any efforts having been made by said Garay to comply with the terms stipulated therein, all grants which had been made by the law of May 1, 1842, had, therefore, ceased to exist, and that the Republic had resumed all its rights in regard to that matter."

Within the time of the first extension, Mr. Garay employed an engineer by the name of Moro, who made a survey of the premises, according to the requirements of the contract. He communicated that fact to the President of the Republic, and by a letter which is here from the Minister of State, by order of the President, to the Governor of Oaxaca, Mr. Garay was directed to be placed in full possession of the land granted by the original contract.

In reference to the two years embraced in the last extension, we place ourselves on this principle, that in consequence of the war with the United States—a war which has been declared by Congress to have been the act of Mexico—Mr. Garay and his assignees were exempted from complying with the contract, so far as the further prosecution of the work was concerned, during that period. But, sir, it is not necessary to refer even to that well-known principle of law, that the act of the grantor will excuse the non-performance by the grantee of the conditions of the grant; because in 1847, we have proof before us that Mr. Garay again went upon the route to survey it. In 1848 he again went on with the survey commenced in 1847. So that from the beginning to the end of the whole transaction, there is nothing that appears on its face, or in any of the papers, which can affect the contract with nullity in the slightest degree. I shall refer more particularly to this proof, when I come to examine the statements made by the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] and to do what he failed to do, "adjust the lens of history so as to concentrate its rays upon this subject."

Now as to the grounds assumed by Mexico upon which this grant is declared to be invalid. The first is, the want of power in Salas to grant the extension of time. It is alleged that Salas had no authority, by virtue of the convention or plan by which he came into power, to grant this extension. To that it is a sufficient reply to say, that Salas, as all the Presidents of Mexico who have preceded him since 1836, were dictators de facto. And indeed it may with truth be asserted, that since 1836 there has been no responsible government in Mexico, unless it was a dictatorship. It is a principle of law too well established, that no individual or nation is required to verify the legitimacy of any Government with which they may have a negotiation or transaction. On that point we have many precedents, but it is unnecessary to refer to them, as the principle is so universally acknowledged as to need no elucidation. In accordance with this principle I assert, that if the proposition of the Senator from New York is true, that the grant made by Santa Anna, and extended by Salas, is not valid for want of power in those functionaries, then our title to California and New Mexico is without any foundation; for by the history of the time, it can be shown that the Government of Mexico, by which the treaty of peace was made with the United States, the Government of Peña y Peña was as much affected with illegitimacy as were those under which these concessions are claimed. It is a historical fact, that when the treaty of peace was about to be acted upon, the President, for the purpose of securing a majority, determined to exclude the delegates from New Mexico, Yucatan, and California, leaving thus an unconstitutional Congress to cede away two of the departments of the Republic. This principle was expressly recognized, and the contingency contemplated by Mr. Buchanan, in his instructions of April 15, 1847, to Mr. Trist, an extract from which I will here read:

"So rapidly does revolution follow revolution in Mexico, that it would be difficult to conjecture what form of government you may find in existence over that ill-fated country on your arrival at the headquarters of the army. The constitution of 1824 may then have been abolished, and a dictatorship be again existing in its stead. You will not hesitate, however, to conclude a treaty with whatever Government you shall find there upon your arrival; provided it presents a reasonable prospect of being able to maintain itself. Should a dictator be established, who has subverted the constitution of 1824, and acquired the supreme power, his ratification of the treaty will be sufficient without the previous approbation of the general Congress. Were this Government to refuse to conclude a treaty of peace until the Mexican Government shall assume any permanent constitutional form, the war might yet continue for many years to come."

Yes, sir, and he might have added, "forever;" and we may say, that if a grant of a right of way, or anything else, is to depend upon a permanent form of Government, or on any Government which had a permanent constitutional form, none such could ever be made. I said, with reference to the powers of Santa Anna when he made this grant originally, and when he extended it in 1843, and in reference to the powers of Salas when he extended it in 1846, that they were absolute, and that those two individuals were exercising de facto dictatorial and absolute power in Mexico, and that there was no constitution to control them. What are the facts? The first republican constitution in Mexico was adopted in 1824, a constitution modeled after our own, and imitating it very closely. This constitution, so far from continuing in being for a period of nineteen years, as asserted by the Senator from New York, continued in existence only about ten years, certainly not more than twelve. In 1834, it was abolished by what was called the Plan of Toluca. And, to use the language of a reliable historian, it was not only abolished, but actually and physically "blotted from the statute-books of Mexico. In consequence of this Plan of Toluca, the constitution of 1836 was adopted, which destroyed the State governments entirely, and made the States military provinces with military governors, responsible to the central Government at the city of Mexico. This form of government lasted only till 1841, or about five years. Then, in consequence of one of those outbreaks which are so common in that unhappy country, a convention of officers assembled at a place called Estanzuela, whose deliberations resulted in what was called the Bases de Tacubaya, the seventh article of which conferred the most dictatorial powers on the President. While Santa Anna was thus possessed of supreme power, he issued this grant to Don José Garay.

It is true that Santa Anna, according to the Bases de Tacubaya, as President, was bound to submit his acts to the next Constitutional Congress after the revolution, and he was bound also to call together a convention for the purpose of forming a constitution. Accordingly, in 1842, he did call together a convention of citizens, but before they had completed their deliberations, while they were in the act of forming a constitution, he drove them out of doors at the point of the bayonet; and the next year he caused to be established, by a junta of his own creation, what was called the Bases Organicas; which, according to another historian, were even more tyrannical and absolute in their form, than were the Bases de Tacubaya.

In January, 1845, as I have before remarked, another revolution took place, and Santa Anna was again deposed. Herrera succeeded him; and during the existence of his administration the Congress was called together, to which I have alluded, the lower House of which passed unanimously the decree which was afterwards ratified and made a law by Salas, and which only failed to pass the Senate in consequence of the revolution which overthrew Herrera and put Paredes in his place. Salas succeeded by another revolution in the summer of 1846, and came into power under what was called the Plan of the Citadel. It is true that Salas, in this Plan of the Citadel which he promulgated, proposed to be governed by the constitution of 1824. It seems that this defunct constitution of 1824, which was most effectually put to death in 1836, was made use of by one usurper for the purpose of displacing another. In reference to it, we might exclaim with Macbeth, in view of Banquo's ghost:

"The times have been,
That, when the brains were out, the man would die,
And there an end; but now they rise again,
With twenty mortal murders on their crowns,
And push us from our stools."

So it seems that this constitution of 1824, dead and buried as it had been, was on all occasions resuscitated from the tomb for the purpose of being used by one usurper to push another from his stool, and it is now sought to be used for another and a different purpose, and that is to invalidate a solemn contract of a Government fully as legitimate as any they have ever had.

But, sir, even during the brief space that this constitution of 1824 purports to have been in operation, the President violated it by acts of the most tyrannical character, which acts were recognized by subsequent Congresses, and by the Government of the State. The first decree that ever was passed abolishing slavery in the Republic, was made by the act of the President alone, during the existence of that constitution, five years after it had gone into operation. Slavery was abolished by a decree of Guerrero in 1829, by the fiat of his own will. Guerrero himself obtained power by the subversion of the constitution, although he professed to acknowledge it. Pedraza, who had been elected in 1829, was deposed by the Congress a short time after he was elected, and the rival candidate, Guerrero, who had been defeated, was placed in his stead. And yet we are told that all the acts of the Mexican Government must conform to the constitution of 1824, or they are invalid. It is a remarkable fact, that Guadalupe Victoria, the first President elected under the constitution of 1824, is the only one that has served out the constitutional term of four years. In less than thirty years there have been over thirty incumbents of the office; and so rapidly do they rise and fall, that should the Government continue much longer, the future historian will scarcely be able to preserve even a catalogue of their names: they will stretch out, like Banquo's line of kings, "to the crack of doom."

The Senator from New York—for the purpose of throwing some discredit upon this grant, in all probability, for I can attribute his assertion to no other motive—set out with the declaration that Garay was the grantee of four other rights by the Mexican Government; thereby intending, no doubt, to make him appear in the character of a grasping and avaricious speculator; and he goes on to enumerate them. It is not a matter of much moment, and I merely refer to it to state that the whole argument of the Senator from New York is based upon assertions equally as groundless as this. I here assert that Garay was the grantee of no other right than the right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and that he never set up any claim to any other right. Now, it is a rule of morals, alens in uno, falsus in omnibus. I claim that this single fact has discredited the whole argument of the Senator, because it shows that the source from which he obtained his information, and upon which his assertions and arguments are founded, is not worthy of credit.

His next assertion is, that there is no proof that this work was commenced during the first extension, and also no proof that it was commenced, and the preliminary surveys completed between 1846 and 1848. Now, sir, if the Senator had examined his own documents, the Mexican documents, to which he seems to have had full access, he would have found a most full and complete acknowledgment by the Mexican Government, not only of the commencement, but of the completion of the preliminary surveys in 1843. I believe I referred to this fact once before, but I will repeat it. Mr. Garay, in the month of February, 1843, communicated to the President of Mexico, the fact that he had completed the preliminary surveys, according to his contract, and asked that he should then be put in possession of the lands which had been ceded to him by the decree; and here is the letter of the President, by his Minister, to Garay, inclosing him a letter to the Governor of Oaxaca, requesting him to put him (Mr. Garay) in possession of the lands, because he (Garay) had complied with his contract in making the surveys; at least to an extent sufficient to enable him to commence the work:

OFFICE OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

SIR: I subjoin a copy of the communications addressed this day to their Excellencies, the Governors of the Departments of Oaxaca and Vera Cruz:

"MOST EXCELLENT SIR: On the first of May of last 'year, the Provisional President published a decree granting to Don José de Garay an exclusive privilege to open a 'communication between the Pacific and Atlantic oceans, 'in the Isthmus of Tehuantepec; ceding to him, by article 'the fifth, the possession of the untenanted lands that lay 'within ten leagues on each side of the projected road, and 'promising, by article seventh, to render him every assistance in carrying on both the survey and the works. The 'survey is so far advanced as to allow the commencement 'of the works and other operations, without which a project 'of such magnitude would be thrown into jeopardy, greatly 'to the detriment of the Republic. His Excellency, the 'Provisional President, having present these considerations, 'and others which spring from the same decree, and wishing to render effectual the solemn promises made, has been 'pleased to direct me to inform your Excellency of the 'above, that your Excellency may give the necessary orders 'for the fulfillment of the fifth article of the decree, by which 'Don José de Garay is to be put in possession of the untenanted lands that lie within ten leagues of both sides of the 'line of road, requesting, at the same time, that your Excellency will do all in your power, not only to render 'effective the grant of lands as far as your Department is 'concerned, but also to give the assistance and protection 'promised by the Supreme Government to Don José de 'Garay, so as to remove every obstacle likely to prevent or 'retard the execution of the plan.

"It is essential that the Commissioners and other agents 'employed in the opening of this road, which must extend 'from the bar of the Coatzacoalcos on the north, to that of 'St. Francisco on the south, should be protected against 'everything that may prevent the performance of their duties, and in case any claims to ownership of lands should 'be put forth by private individuals, your Excellency will 'regulate your proceeding according to the obligation which 'the fourth article of the decree imposes upon Don José de 'Garay. Full liberty must also be allowed him to give a 'different course to the river Coatzacoalcos and its tributaries, or any other rivers, lakes, or creeks, to clear their 'borders, and use the timber when not required to be felled 'on private ground.

"To know how far it will be necessary to make use of 'private property, as well as to mark out the limits of the 'grant of territory awarded to Don José de Garay in the 'above-mentioned decree, that gentleman is authorized to 'appoint land surveyors, who will be subject to no control 'but that of the officer whom your Excellency may be 'pleased to appoint, and intrust with instructions agreeably 'to this order, and the attendance of the adjoining landowners, whose measurement will fix and determine his 'right of claim to possession. In case any proprietor of 'land refuses to give up his property in conformity with 'this decree, a valuation will immediately be set on foot, 'and according to it the land purchased for the undertaking.

"The greatness of this enterprise merits every effort to 'promote its realization; and it is with this object that I 'have the honor to transmit this communication from his 'Excellency, the Provisional President, availing myself of 'the opportunity to assure your Excellency of my deep respect and consideration."

God and liberty! BOCANEGRA.

Señor DON JOSE DE GARAY.

MEXICO, February 9, 1843.

And, sir, if the Senator had paid a little more attention to another document—for the whole of his argument, and the whole of his assumptions seem to have been founded upon documents which were furnished him from Mexico—if he had paid attention to the pamphlet issued by Señor Ramirez, the Minister of Foreign Relations, he would have found that even the prosecution of the work, so far as making a wagon road was concerned, was admitted as late as 1848. It is true, sir, he objects to this kind of work. He says, the grant was not made for the purpose of having a wagon road across the Isthmus. He complains of that, not reflecting that in such a country as that a wagon road is a necessary preliminary or prerequisite to a railroad, and that a railroad cannot be built unless a wagon road is first made for the purpose of carrying the materials. Garay, or his assignees, were not required to finish the road in that time. All they were required to do was to commence its prosecution.

Let us return a moment to the power of Salas, in reference to his connection with the constitution of 1824, as cited by the Senator from New York. He cites the constitution of 1824, by which he shows, or attempts to show, that any action in regard to works of that sort, is confided to Congress; and then he quotes from the Plan of the Citadel, or decree of Salas, in which Salas admits that he intends to carry on the Government, as nearly as possible, according to the constitution of 1824. Article first of this plan or decree of Salas, reads, according to the Senator's translation, in the following manner:

"Ministry of Foreign Relations of Government and Police.

"His Excellency the Señor General-in-Chief in the exercise of the Supreme Executive power, has directed to me the following decree:

"José Mariano de Salas, General of Brigade and Chief of the Liberating Republican Army, in the exercise of the Supreme Executive power, to all whom these presents may come: Know ye, that in consideration of the state in which the Republic is now found, he has been moved to decree the following:

"Art. 1. Until the new constitution is published, that of 1824 shall govern in all that is not in conflict with the execution of the plan proclaimed in the citadel of this capital on the 4th of the present month, and that the present state of affairs of the Republic will permit."

Now, bear in mind that at that time there was no Congress in session, and none in existence. Then, according to this article, Salas could not conform in any respect, where legislative action was required, to the constitution of 1824, for the simple reason that there was no Congress in existence to which he could apply. Therefore, in everything, this article left him to the guidance of his own judgment, of his own will.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York quotes history again, in reference to the power of Salas. The paragraph to which I wish to refer, it is true, in the second edition of his speech, did not appear; but, according to his speech as it was made upon this floor, it is correctly reported in the paper which I have in my hand, and I have a right to refer to it because of the effect it may have produced here. I state it also for the purpose of showing what reliance is to be placed upon the statements of the Senator in this connection; not that I would charge him with intentional error, but as showing that the Mexican sources of his information are not to be relied upon. Hear what he says:

"We have, then, the decree of Salas, Provisional President, extending this contract for two years; we have the Constitution of Mexico in the first place declaring it void, and we have the Bases of Tacubaya declaring that whatever decrees the Supreme Executive might make, should be submitted for approval to the first constitutional Congress of Mexico. Salas, after having obtained power in the manner which I have described, after having extended this contract by a decree in the manner I have related, after having issued a proclamation, as I have shown, reviving and restoring the constitution of 1824, resigned his powers, and Santa Anna came into the Executive chair in his place. Santa Anna found this decree made, and went out of the Executive office before the 1st of April, 1845; but yet, not without having undertaken to overthrow the constitution of 1824; and it is that attempt of his on which I understand the Committee on Foreign Relations rely."

The decree by Salas was on November 6, 1846; and yet the Senator from New York, according to his Mexican authorities, makes it prior, in point of time, to the going out of power of Santa Anna in April, 1845. Nor is his, or rather their, mistake accidental. I thought at first that it might be a misprint; but on reading the next paragraph, I saw the reason for the mistake, because there may be reasons for mistakes as well as for the truth. Here it is:

"It will be seen that even this decree recognizes the Bases of Tacubaya, because it treats of the responsibility of the Executive, which is established by the Bases of Tacubaya. The constitution had already been reëstablished by Salas. Then this decree of Santa Anna was not a subversion of the constitution, but only a palpable perversion of it, for the purpose of increasing his own Executive power. Did that stand? Was that left the law of Mexico? No. On the first day of April, 1845, the first constitutional Congress of Mexico was in session; and this decree of Santa Anna, absolving the Executive from responsibility to Congress, came under review, and they on that day adopted an act revising and abrogating this decree of Santa Anna, and declared that the responsibility was a direct one, that no act of the Executive was valid unless it was submitted to Congress, and that no act was valid that was submitted to them and rejected, or not approved by them. So, then, the constitution was in force on the 1st of April, 1845, and the Executive power was limited to the making of contracts, subject to approval by Congress. Now, without claiming that this act of Congress, which I have just read, vitiated Santa Anna's grant to Garay, or even brought it before Congress, I think I may assume that I have shown that it did operate to limit the power of Salas, who made the decree extending the time. If the decree of Salas extending this contract was subject to the revision of Congress, it is certain that all the constitutional conditions hanging about the Executive power entered into that contract, and followed it in the hands of its assignees."

The object of the mistake, or rather misstatement, was to bring Salas under the operation of the Congress which had been dispersed twelve months before, and make it appear that his decree, extending the grant, is invalid, because it was not submitted to the Congress which went out of existence before the decree was made. I admit, as I before stated, that the Senator has omitted it in the second edition of his speech. But, sir, that does not excuse him for the careless inattention with which he stands charged in reference to this matter. I am free to state, however, that I am disposed to lay the blame at the door of his "exotic" allies, rather than at his own, but I would advise him to be a little more cautious for the future, in giving credence to what proceeds from that source.

The next point made by the Senator from New York, is taken literally and bodily from the Mexican pamphlet to which I have alluded; and it is in reference to the statement made by the commissioner who negotiated the treaty of peace with Mr. Trist, that Mexico had not the power to grant to us this right of way, for the reason that some years prior she had made a grant which had come into the possession of English subjects, of whose rights she could not dispose. How does the Senator from New York attempt to get rid of that difficulty? How does he attempt to avoid that estoppel? He attempts to avoid it as Señor Ramirez attempts to avoid it, by saying that that admission referred not to the grant of the right of way, but to the grant of colonization, of which Mexico had notice. What is the language of the commissioner? Mark. Mr. Trist was authorized by Mr. Polk to offer $15,000,000 for the right of way—not for any colonization rights, but for the grant of the right of way, and the right of way alone. Mr. Trist had furnished a draft of an article to that effect. What did the Mexican commissioner say?

"In the eighth article of your Excellency's draft, the grant of a free passage across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec to the South Sea is sought in favor of the North American citizens. We have orally explained to you, that some years since the Government of the Republic granted to a private contractor a privilege with reference to this object, which was transferred, with the sanction of the Government, to English subjects, of whose rights Mexico cannot dispose."

To what object? Why most assuredly to the grant of the right of way across the Isthmus. Nothing but the grant of the right of way had been mentioned between them. Nothing else had become a subject of negotiation and conversation. It is in this way that the Senator from New York has attempted to avoid the force of an argument, the force of which he would not directly meet. Besides, the Senator says a nation cannot be estopped, that the law of estoppel does not apply to nations. What is the law of estoppel in a moral point of view? It is nothing more than the principle that no individual can be heard to falsify his own act; that when his acts or his admission has been interposed for his own benefit in opposition to another, this act and this admission must stand, should they in the future be drawn in question to affect the right of others. The muniments of title and the faith of treaties rest upon it. It is a principle universal in its application, whether to individuals, corporations, or nations. It is this principle which invests this question with all its national character. Here was an object dear to the American heart, and an object of the utmost importance to the integrity and preservation of the country. A proposition was made to Mexico to obtain the right, when we had power to demand it. Mexico was in the dust; the conqueror's foot was upon her neck. We had a right to demand it; but in that spirit of liberality which has always characterized the American people, we did not demand it as a gratuity, but we offered her the enormous sum of $15,000,000. How was this offer met? How was this generosity appreciated? Why, sir, by the interposition of this very grant as an obstacle in our way. And now, sir, we have a right to hold her to her first position, and take now that which we were prevented by that position from taking then.

Even if the original contract, and its subsequent extension, had been affected with nullity, this admission by Mexico has estopped her from asserting it, and we, as having come in possession of what was once an obstacle to our just demand, have the right, on every principle of equity, to be placed in the situation we would have been in but for this act of Mexico, which she cannot now be permitted to repudiate.

I will now call the attention of the Senate to another of the mistakes or misstatements of the Senator from New York, with which that Senator's speech abounds. In speaking with reference to this proof, which I have brought—the letter of the President of Mexico to the Governors of Oaxaca and Vera Cruz, ordering the lands to be put into the possession of Mr. Garay—how does he attempt to avoid the effect of it? I hesitate not to say, that it is done by a total misrepresentation of that letter. I will read the language of that Senator:

"But what was the effect of these orders of Herrera, the President of Mexico, to the Governors of Oaxaca and Vera Cruz? They were orders to prevent depredations and trespasses on those lands by anybody except those who claimed to have obtained them under the grant ceding the lands to Garay; but it appears that the Government of Mexico at that time understood that those claimants did not claim the right to open the Isthmus, and only asked protection for the enjoyment of their lands. That protection and enjoyment of their lands has never been denied by Mexico. But even if this were not conclusive, there is another point. If the President of Mexico could not make such a grant, he had no power to make an admission, the effect of which would be to establish the grant. If the President of the United States should admit that half the State of Maine, or any part of it belonged to Great Britain, that admission would not affect the boundary line of Maine in the least."

Now, sir, compare this with the contents of the letter as I have already read it, and is not the perversion apparent? Sir, comment is unnecessary. Is this that "adjustment of the lens of history" of which the Senator so vauntingly spoke? If so, I fear his obliquity of mental vision is hopeless of cure, and his progress in the study of optics must be speedily terminated.

There was another point made, both by the Senator from New York and the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] and that was, that according to the decree of Salas, affirming or recognizing the transfer from Garay to Manning & Mackintosh, the holders of the grant or the assignees, necessarily denationalized themselves, and that the parties who should attempt to carry on this work must be deprived of the character of American citizens, and submit body and soul to the Government of Mexico. Now, sir, to prove that, he reads a part of what is sometimes called the approving decree of Salas, but what is nothing more than an indorsement on the part of the Government of the contract. I will read it:

"According to the spirit of the aforesaid law, this renunciation must take place in the most positive and conclusive manner on the part of the settlers, so that, whatever circumstances may happen, and whatever measures these may require, neither the settlers aforesaid nor the proprietors may not, in any case, nor for any cause, plead alien privileges, nor any other privileges except those which have been granted, or may be granted, to them by the laws of the country to which both their persons and their property must be subjected; and without this requisite they will not be admitted."

It must be borne in mind that the original contract to Garay consists of two parts, and is in fact two grants. One is a grant of the right of colonization; the other is a grant of the right to make the road. They are separate and distinct, and throughout the whole of the transaction have been so regarded by Garay, by the Mexican Government, by Manning & Mackintosh, and by Hargous. Now, sir, I admit, and always have admitted, that in reference to this grant of colonization, notice of transfer, notice of assignment to the Government of Mexico was necessary—and why? Because Mexico might not choose to take everybody into the bosom of the country. She might not choose to let the lands, thirty leagues, I believe, on each side of the road, be granted out to colonists about which she knew nothing. Hence, as I have remarked, I have always admitted, in reference to the colonization right, that Mexico had the right to approve of the transfer, and accordingly she did approve of it. But in reference to the grant of the right of way, the right to make the railroad, there is nothing in the contract that requires the approval of Mexico to the transfer; nor is there any necessity for it, because the same danger does not exist in reference to merely making the road, as exists in reference to the colonization right. And, sir, the grant from the very first contemplated an assignment of the right to make the road, because Mexico knew very well that there was not individual capital enough in her country to complete the undertaking. Hence the assignment to foreigners was contemplated from the very first by the terms of the grant. According to the extract which I have before me, Don José Garay, as well as any private individual or company to whom he assigned it, whether natives or foreigners, could make the road.

Mr. BELL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him one moment? I think I understood the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] to take the very distinction which the Senator now takes; but he contended that Garay had never transferred to Manning & Mackintosh any other privilege than that of colonization; that he had not transferred to Manning & Mackintosh, and therefore that Hargous and the other American citizens had no title whatever by assignment, to make the work.

Mr. BROOKE. There is no doubt that there was an assignment of the right of way, and the right of colonization also.

Mr. BELL. To Manning & Mackintosh?

Mr. BROOKE. Yes, sir. There is no doubt about that. The assignment of the right of way was subsequent to the date of the assignment of the right of colonization, as I will show presently. When Salas granted the extension, he wished to guard a little more strenuously the colonization privilege, and accordingly the 13th article of his decree is in the following words:

"ART. 13. It shall be an express condition in all contracts with colonists, that they shall renounce the privileges of their original domicil so long as they reside in the country, subjecting themselves to all the existing colonial regulations which are not in conflict with the present law."

This approving decree, or indorsement, as I have called it, refers to this 13th article, and has no reference whatever to the transfer of the right of way, or the right to make the road; none whatever, because it uses the terms according to the spirit of the "aforesaid law." "This renunciation." What renunciation? Why, sir, the renunciation contemplated in the 13th article. It refers entirely to the colonization right.

But, to satisfy the honorable Senator from Tennessee, I will read a short extract from the assignment of the colonization right, by Garay to Manning & Mackintosh, notice of which was given to the Mexican Government.

Mr. BELL. The right of way is the question.

Mr. BROOKE. Yes, sir. Then I will show the right of way. The extract is:

"ART. 9. As soon as the time shall arrive for treating of the way of communication between the two seas, Don José Garay and Messrs. Manning & Mackintosh, and John Schneider, will enter into stipulations for the formation of a company for the execution of said work of transit on the isthmus."

An assignment of the right of way was not given then, but it was in contemplation, and the Mexican Government had notice of it. That was in 1847. On the 28th September, 1848, Garay transferred to Manning & Mackintosh the whole right—the right of way and all; and in October, 1848, Manning & Mackintosh made a transfer to Hargous. The Senator from Tennessee can find all the letters in the papers accompanying the message of the President of the United States on the subject.

Again, sir: the Senator from New York, as well as the Senator from New Hampshire, after admitting that there were two distinct rights, one for colonization, and another for a right of way, as I have just shown, confound them together again when they speak of the approving decree of Salas. In other words, they admit a distinction for certain purposes, and deny it for others. But that decree or that indorsement is very plain when we keep up the distinction throughout. It cannot be misunderstood. The Senator from New York contends that this route is not assignable at all; and he compares it to a contract made by the President of the United States with an architect, and says that an architect cannot assign his work or his contract. This is true, unless there is something in the law that authorized the appointments allowing it to be done. And that happens to be exactly the case in regard to this question. In the original grant from Santa Anna to Garay, the assignability of the grant is expressly recognized; and, as I before remarked, the contract would have been useless without it, because Mexico knew, as I have before stated, that no individual or company in that country would ever execute the work; no men or company could be found there with capital sufficient to carry on so gigantic an enterprise. She expected that other capitalists would embark in the undertaking; and, accordingly, the grant was so drafted as to provide for an assignment in the clearest manner.

I have thus hurriedly, and in somewhat of a confused manner, gone over the facts in this case. For myself, I will say that I have no doubt whatever of our right, not only to pass the resolution which has been introduced by the Committee on Foreign Affairs; but if I were allowed to follow my own judgment, I would go further; I would take possession of the thing in dispute, as we may under the law of nations, with justice, and without cause of war. But yielding to suggestions of others, I have withdrawn a proposition which I had the honor to offer at the last session, authorizing the President to put these men in the possession of their rights, trusting that a returning sense of justice, together with the persuasive effect of the action of this body, may yet induce that unhappy country to pursue a course that will redound to her own interests and honor as well as to the benefit of mankind.

COLONIZATION IN NORTH AMERICA.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, February 14, 1853.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the joint resolution declaratory of the views of the United States respecting colonization on the North American continent by European Powers, and respecting the Island of Cuba; the pending question being on the motion of Mr. DIXON to refer the resolution and the amendment of Mr. HALE to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with certain instructions.

Mr. DOUGLAS said: Mr. President, I regret the necessity which I conceive to exist for trespassing on the attention of the Senate to-day, especially the postponement of the deficiency bill, to discuss the principles, the objects, and the effects of the resolution of the Senator from Michigan in regard to European colonization.

Thirty years ago Mr. Monroe, in his message to Congress, made a memorable declaration with respect to European colonization upon this continent. That declaration has ever since been a favorite subject of eulogium with orators, politicians, and statesmen. Recently it has assumed the dignified appellation of the "Monroe doctrine." It seems to be the part of patriotism for all to profess the doctrine, while our Government has scarcely ever failed to repudiate it, practically, whenever an opportunity for its observance has been presented. The Oregon treaty is a noted case in point. Prior to that convention there was no British colony on this continent west of the Rocky Mountains. The Hudson's Bay Company was confined, by its charter, to the shores of the bay, and to the streams flowing into it, and to the country drained by them. The western boundary of Canada was hundreds of miles distant; and there was no European colony to be found in all that region on the Pacific coast stretching from California to the Russian possessions. We had a treaty of non-occupancy with Great Britain, by the provisions of which neither party was to be permitted to colonize or assume dominion over any portion of that territory. We abrogated that treaty of non-occupancy, and then entered into a convention, by the terms of which the country in question was divided into two nearly equal parts, by the parallel of the forty-ninth degree of latitude, and all on the north confirmed to Great Britain, and that on the south to the United States. By that treaty Great Britain consented that we might establish Territories and States south of the forty-ninth parallel, and the United States consented that Great Britain might, to the north of that parallel, establish new European colonies, in open and flagrant violation of the Monroe doctrine! It is unnecessary for me to remind the country, and especially my own constituents, with what energy and emphasis I protested against that convention, upon the ground that it carried with it the undisguised repudiation of the Monroe declaration, and the consent of this Republic that new British colonies might be established on that portion of the North American continent where none existed before.

Again: as late as 1850, a convention was entered into between the Government of the United States and Great Britain—called the Clayton and Bulwer treaty—every article and provision of which is predicated upon a practical negation and repudiation of what is known as the Monroe doctrine, as I shall conclusively establish before I close these remarks. Since the ratification of that treaty and in defiance of its express stipulations, as well as of the Monroe declaration, Great Britain has planted a new colony in Central America, known as the colony of the Bay Islands. In view of this fact, and with the colony of the Bay Islands in his mind's eye, the venerable Senator from Michigan lays upon the table of the Senate, and asks us to affirm, by our votes, a resolution in which it is declared that "WHILE EXISTING RIGHTS SHOULD BE RESPECTED, AND WILL BE BY THE UNITED STATES," the American continents "ARE HENCEFORTH not 'to be considered as subjects for FUTURE colonization 'by any European Power," and "that no FUTURE 'European colony or dominion shall, with their con- 'sent, be planted or established on any part of the North 'American continent."

Now, sir, before I vote for this resolution, I desire to understand, with clearness and precision, its purport and meaning. Existing rights are to be respected! What is to be the construction of this clause? Is it that all colonies established in America, by European Powers, prior to the passage of this resolution, are to be respected by the United States as "existing rights?" Is this resolution to be understood as a formal and official declaration, by the Congress of the United States, of our acquiescence in the seizure of the islands in the Bay of Honduras, and the erection of them into a new British colony? When, in connection with this clause respecting "existing rights," we take into consideration the one preceding it, in which it is declared that "HENCEFORTH" the American continents are not open to European colonization; and the clause immediately succeeding it, which says that "no future European colony or dominion" shall, with our consent, be planted on the North American continent; who can doubt that Great Britain will feel herself authorized to construe the resolution into a declaration on our part of unconditional acquiescence in her right to hold all the colonies and dependencies she at this time may possess in America? Is the Senate of the United States prepared to make such a declaration? Is this Republic, in view of our professions for the last thirty years, and of our present and prospective position, prepared to submit to such a result? If we are, let us seal our lips, and talk no more about European colonization upon the American continents. What is to redeem our declarations upon this subject in the future from utter contempt, if we fail to vindicate the past, and meekly submit to the humiliation of the present? With an avowed policy of thirty years' standing that no future European colonization is to be permitted in America—affirmed when there was no opportunity for enforcing it, and abandoned whenever a case was presented for carrying it into practical effect—is it now proposed to beat another retreat under cover of terrible threats of awful consequences when the offense shall be repeated? "Henceforth" no "future" European colony is to be planted in America "with our consent!" It is gratifying to learn that the United States are never going to "consent" to the repudiation of the Monroe doctrine again. No more Clayton and Bulwer treaties; no more British "alliances" in Central America, New Granada, or Mexico; no more resolutions of oblivion to protect "existing rights!" Let England tremble, and Europe take warning, if the offense is repeated. "Should the attempt be made," (says the resolution,) "it will leave the United States free to adopt such measures as an independent nation may justly adopt in defense of its rights and honor." Are not the United States now free to adopt such measures as an independent nation may justly adopt in defense of its rights and honor? Have we not given the notice? Is not thirty years sufficient notice—and has it not been repeated within the last eight years? And yet the deed is done, in contempt of not only the Monroe doctrine, but of solemn treaty stipulations. Will you ever have a better opportunity to establish the doctrine—a clearer right to vindicate, or a more flagrant wrong to redress? If you do not do it now, your "henceforth" resolutions, in respect to "future" attempts, may as well be dispensed with. I have no resolutions to bring forward in relation to our foreign policy. Circumstances have deprived me of the opportunity or disposition to participate actively in the proceedings of the Senate this session. I know not what the present Administration has done, or is doing in reference to this question; and I am willing to leave the incoming Administration free to assume its own position, and to take the initiation, unembarrassed by the action of the Senate.

My principal object in addressing the Senate to-day is to avail myself of the opportunity, now for the first time presented by the removal of the injunction of secrecy, of explaining my reasons for opposing the ratification of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty. In order clearly to understand the question in all its bearings, it is necessary to advert to the circumstances under which it was presented. The Oregon boundary had been established, and important interests had grown up in that Territory; California had been acquired, and an immense commerce had sprung into existence; lines of steamers had been established from New York and New Orleans to Chagres, and from Panama to California and Oregon; American citizens had acquired the right of way, and were engaged in the construction of a railroad across the Isthmus of Panama, under the protection of treaty stipulations with New Granada; other American citizens had secured the right of way, and were preparing to construct a canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific, through Lake Nicaragua; and still other American citizens had procured the right of way, and were preparing to commence the construction of a railroad, under a grant from Mexico, across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. Thus, the right of transit, on all the routes across the the Isthmus, had passed into American hands, and were within the protection and control of the American Government.

In view of this state of things, Mr. Hise, who had been appointed Chargé d'Affaires, under the administration of Mr. Polk, to the Central American States, negotiated a treaty with the State of Nicaragua which secured to the United States forever the exclusive privilege of opening and using all canals, railroads, and other means of communication, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, through the territory of that Republic. The rights, privileges, and immunities conceded by that treaty were all that any American could have desired. Its provisions are presumed to be within the knowledge of every Senator, and ought to be familiar to the people of this country. The grant was to the United States, or to such companies as should be organized under its authority, or received under its protection. The privileges were exclusive in their terms and perpetual in their tenure. They were to continue forever as inalienable American rights. In addition to the privilege of constructing and using all roads and canals through the territory of Nicaragua, Mr. Hise's treaty also secured to the United States the right to erect and garrison such fortifications as we should deem necessary at the termini of such communication on each ocean, and at intermediate points along the lines of the works, together with a grant of lands three miles square at the termini for the establishment of towns with free ports and free institutions. I do not deem it necessary to detain the Senate by reading the provisions of this treaty. It is published in the document I hold in my hand; and is open to every one who chooses to examine it. It was submitted to the Department of State in Washington on the 15th of September, 1849, but never sent to the Senate for ratification. In the mean time the administration of General Taylor had superseded Mr. Hise by the appointment of another representative to the Central American States, and instructed him in procuring a grant for a canal, to "CLAIM NO PECULIAR PRIVILEGE—NO EXCLUSIVE RIGHT—NO MONOPOLY OF COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE."

After having thus instructed Mr. Squier as to the basis of the treaty which he was to conclude, Mr. Clayton seems to have been apprehensive that Mr. Hise might already have entered into a convention by which the United States had secured the exclusive and perpetual privilege, and in order to guard against such a contingency, he adds, at the conclusion of the same letter of instructions, the following:

"If a charter or grant of the right of way shall have been incautiously or inconsiderately made before your arrival in that country, SEEK to have it properly MODIFIED TO ANSWER THE ENDS WE HAVE IN VIEW."

In other words, if Mr. Hise shall have made a treaty by which he may have secured all the desired privileges to the United States exclusively, "seek to have it properly modified," so as to form a partnership with England and the other monarchical Powers of Europe, and thus lay the foundation for an alliance between the New and the Old World, by which the right of European Powers to intermeddle with the affairs of American States will be established and recognized. With these instructions in his pocket, Mr. Squier arrived in Nicaragua, and before he reached the seat of government, learned, by a "publication in the Gazette of the Isthmus," that Mr. Hise was already negotiating a treaty in respect to the contemplated canal. Without knowing the provisions of the treaty, but taking it for granted that it was in violation of the principles of General Taylor's administration, as set forth in his instructions, Mr. Squier immediately dispatched a notice to the government of Nicaragua that "Mr. 'Hise was superseded on the 2d April last, upon 'which date I (Mr. Squier) received my commis-'sion as his successor;" "that Mr. Hise was not 'empowered to enter upon any negotiations of the 'character referred to;" and concluding with the following request:

"I have, therefore, to request that NO ACTION will be taken by the Government of Nicaragua upon the inchoate treaty which may have been negotiated at Guatemala, but that the SAME MAY BE ALLOWED TO PASS AS AN UNOFFICIAL ACT."

On the some day, Mr. Squier, with commendable promptness, sends a letter to Mr. Clayton, informing our Government of what he had learned in respect to the probable conclusion of the Hise treaty, and expressing his apprehension that the information may be true, and adds:

"If so, I shall be placed in a situation of some embarrassment, as I conceive that Mr. Hise has no authority for the step he has taken, and is certainly not informed of the PRESENT VIEWS AND DESIRES OF OUR GOVERNMENT."

He also adds:

"Under these circumstances, I have addressed a note (B) to the Government of this Republic, [Nicaragua,] requesting that the treaty made at Guatemala (if any such exists) may be allowed to pass as an unofficial act, and that new negotiations may be entered upon at the seat of Government."

Having communicated this important intelligence to his own Government, Mr. Squier proceeded on his journey with a patriotic zeal equal to the importance of his mission, and on his arrival upon the theater of his labors, opened negotiations for a new treaty in accordance with the "present views and desires of our Government," as contained in his instructions. The new treaty was concluded on the 3d of September, 1849, and transmitted to this Government, with a letter explanatory of the negotiation, bearing date the 10th of the same month. Mr. Squier's treaty, so far as I can judge from the published correspondence—for the injunction of secrecy forbids a reference to more authentic sources of information—is in strict accordance with his instructions, and entirely free from any odious provisions which might secure "peculiar privileges or exclusive rights" to the United States!

These two treaties—the one negotiated by Mr. Hise, and the other by Mr. Squier—were in the State Department in this city when Congress met in December, 1849. The administration of General Taylor was at liberty to choose between them, and submit the one or the other to the Senate for ratification. The Hise treaty was suppressed, without giving the Senate an opportunity of ratifying it or advising its rejection. I am aware that a single letter published in this document of correspondence, (Ho. of Rep., Ex. Doc. No. 75,) gives an apparent excuse—a mere pretext—for withholding it from the Senate. I allude to the letter of Mr. Carcache, Chargé d'Affaires from Nicaragua, to Mr. Clayton, dated Washington, December 31, 1849, that the Hise treaty "has been, as publicly 'and universally known, disapproved by my Gov-'ernment, and that my Government desires the rat-'ification of the treaty signed by Mr. Squier on the '3d of September last." And I am also aware that Mr. Clayton, in reply to this letter, stated to Mr. Carcache that "if, however, as you state, that con-'vention has not been approved by your Govern-'ment, there is no necessity for its further consider-'ation by the Government of the United States." From this it would seem that Mr. Clayton desires to have it understood that the failure of the Government of Nicaragua to approve the Hise treaty, was the reason why he suppressed it, and refused to allow the Senate the opportunity of ratifying it. Is that the true reason? Why did the Government of Nicaragua fail to approve the Hise treaty? I have already shown conclusively, that the failure to approve on the part of the Government of Nicaragua, was produced by the representative of General Taylor's administration in Central America, acting in obedience to the imperative instructions of the State Department in this city, over the signature of Mr. Clayton himself. Mr. Clayton had instructed Mr. Squier in advance, that in the event Mr. Hise should have made a treaty before his arrival in the country, he (Mr. Squier) must "seek to have it properly modified to ANSWER THE ENDS WE HAVE IN VIEW." Mr. Squier did "seek" to have it so "modified," and with great difficulty, as the correspondence proves, succeeded in the effort. The Government and people of Nicaragua were anxious to grant the exclusive and perpetual privilege to the United States, and to prevent the consummation of the grand European alliance and partnership. Mr. Squier, in his letter of September 10, 1849, communicating to Mr. Clayton the joyous news that his efforts had been crowned with complete success, says:

"SIR: I have the satisfaction of informing the Department that I have succeeded in accomplishing THE OBJECTS OF MY MISSION TO THIS REPUBLIC."

Then, after giving an exposition of the main provisions of his treaty, he details the embarrassments he was compelled to encounter before he could bring the Government of Nicaragua to terms. Hear him, and then judge whether the failure of the Government of Nicaragua to approve the Hise treaty was the reason why Mr. Clayton refused to submit it to the Senate for ratification!

"THE PRINCIPAL SOURCE OF EMBARRASSMENT WAS MR. HISE'S SPECIAL CONVENTION, which had raised extravagant hopes of a relation between the United States, amounting to something closer than exists between the States of our Confederacy. However, as matters have been finally arranged, they are all the better for this Republic, and quite as favorable to the United States."

So it seems that the Hise treaty was "the principal source of embarrassment" to the consummation of the European partnership. It "had raised extravagant hopes" on the part of the Government and people of Nicaragua of a "closer" relation to the United States, which it was difficult to induce them to relinquish. It required all the zeal, skill, and tact of Mr. Squier, to accomplish so great a feat. "Finally" the matter was "arranged," and the result communicated to the Department with "satisfaction," in these memorable words, which must have carried great joy to Mr. Clayton's heart: "I have succeeded in accomplishing the objects of my mission to this Republic." Rejoice, all ye advocates of European intervention in the affairs of the American continent! The Hise treaty is dead! The principal source of embarrassment is removed! Nicaragua has failed to approve the special convention, granting peculiar privileges and exclusive rights to the United States! This failure has enabled us "properly to modify the grant, so as to answer the ends we have in view," and at the same time relieves Mr. Clayton from the imminent risk of submitting these peculiar privileges to the Senate, where there was great danger of their being accepted! Nicaragua has at last consented! Her appeals to the United States for mediation or protection against British aggression being unheeded—her letters to our Government remaining unanswered, their receipt not even acknowledged—her hopes of a closer relation to this Union blasted—the Monroe doctrine abandoned—the Mosquito kingdom, under the British protectorate, rapidly absorbing her territory, she sinks in despair, and yields herself to the European partnership which was about to be established over all Central America by the Clayton and Bulwer treaty!

Now, sir, I repeat that these two treaties—the one negotiated by Mr. Hise and the other by Mr. Squier—the first conceding peculiar privileges and exclusive and perpetual rights to the United States, the second admitting of a partnership in these privileges with European Powers, Mr. Clayton suppressed the first and sent the second to the Senate for ratification, and immediately opened negotiations with the British Minister, which resulted in what is known as the Clayton and Bulwer treaty. In stating my objections to this treaty, I shall not become a party to the protracted controversy respecting its true meaning and construction which has engaged so much of the attention of this session. I leave that in the hands of those who conducted the negotiation and procured its ratification. That is their own quarrel, with which I have no disposition to interfere. Establish which construction you please—that contended for by the Secretary of State who signed it, or the one insisted upon by the venerable Senator from Michigan and those who acted in concert with him in ratifying it—neither obviates any one of my objections.

In the first place, I was unwilling to enter into treaty stipulations with Great Britain or any other European Power in respect to the American continent, by the terms of which, we should pledge the faith of this Republic not to do in all coming time that which in the progress of events our interests, duty, and even safety may compel us to do. I have already said, and now repeat, that every article, clause, and provision of that treaty is predicated upon a virtual negation and repudiation of the Monroe declaration in relation to European colonization on this continent. The article inviting any Power on earth, with which England or the United States are on terms of friendly intercourse, to enter into similar stipulations, and which pledges the good offices of each, when requested by the other, to aid in the new negotiations with the other Central American States, and which pledges the good offices of all the nations entering into the "alliance" to settle disputes between the States and Governments of Central America, not only recognizes the right of European Powers to interfere with the affairs of the American continent, but invites the exercise of such right, and makes it obligatory to do so in certain cases. It establishes, in terms, an alliance between the contracting parties, and invites all other nations to become parties to it. I was opposed also to the clause which stipulates that neither Great Britain nor the United States will ever occupy, colonize, or exercise dominion over any portion of Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America. I did not desire then, nor do I now, to annex any portion of that country to this Union. I do not know that the time will ever come in my day when I would be willing to do so. Yet I was unwilling to give the pledge that neither we nor our successors ever would. This is an age of rapid movements and great changes. How long is it since those who made this treaty would have told us that the time would never come when we would want California or any portion of the Pacific coast? California being a State of the Union, who is authorized to say that the time will not arrive when our interests and safety may require us to possess some portion of Central America, which lies half way between our Atlantic and Pacific possessions and embraces the great water lines of commerce between the two oceans? I I think it the wiser and safer policy to hold the control of our own action, and leave those who are to come after us untrammeled and free to do whatever they may deem their duty, when the time shall arrive. They will have a better right to determine for themselves, when the necessity for action may arise, than we have now to prescribe the line of duty for them. I was equally opposed to that other clause in the same article, which stipulates that neither party will ever fortify any portion of Central America, or any place commanding the entrance to the canal, or in the vicinity thereof. It is not reciprocal, for the reason that it leaves the Island of Jamaica, a British colony, strongly fortified, the nearest military and naval station to the line of the canal. It is, therefore, equivalent to a stipulation that the United States shall never have or maintain any fortification in the vicinity of, or commanding the line of navigation and commerce through said canal, while England may keep and maintain those she now has.

I was not satisfied with the clause in relation to the British protectorate over the Mosquito coast. It is equivocal in terms, and no man can say with certainty whether the true construction excludes the protectorate from the continent or recognizes its rightful existence and imposes restraints upon its use and exercise. Equivocal terms in treaties are easily understood where the stipulations are between a strong Power on the one hand, and a feeble one upon the other. The stronger enforces its own construction, and the weaker has no alternative but reluctant acquiescence. In this case neither party may be willing to recognize the potential right of the other to prescribe and enforce a construction of the equivocal terms which shall enable it to appropriate to itself all the advantages in question. It would seem that our own Government have not ventured to insist upon a rigid enforcement of the provisions of the treaty in relation to the British protectorate over the Mosquito coast, in the sense in which it was explained and understood when submitted to the Senate for ratification. Has the British protectorate disappeared from Central America? I am not referring to the matters in controversy between certain Senators who supported the treaty and Mr. Clayton, in respect to the Balize settlement. I allude to the Mosquito coast, which, by name and in terms, is expressly made subject to the provisions of the treaty. Has the British protectorate disappeared from that part of Central America? Have the British authorities retired from the port of San Juan, and thereby recognized the right of American citizens and vessels to arrive and depart free of hindrance and molestation? Is it not well known that the protectorate is continued and maintained with increased vigor and boldness? Is not the British consul at San Juan now actively engaged in disposing of the soil, conveying town lots and lands, and exercising the highest functions of sovereignty under, the pretext of protecting the rights of the Mosquito King? These things are being done openly and without disguise, and are well known to the world. Can any Senator inform me whether this Government has taken the slightest notice of these transactions? Has our Government entered its protest against these infractions of the treaty, or demanded a specific compliance with our understanding of its terms? How long are we to wait for Great Britain to abandon her occupancy and withdraw her machinery of Government? Nearly three years have elapsed since we were boastingly told that by the provisions of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, Great Britain was expelled from Central America. Shall we wait patiently until our silence shall be construed into acquiescence in her right to remain and maintain her possession?

But there was another insuperable objection to the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, which increases, enlarges, and extends the force of all the obnoxious provisions I have pointed out. I allude to the article in which it is provided that—

"The Governments of the United States and Great Britain, having not only desired to accomplish a particular object, BUT ALSO TO ESTABLISH A GENERAL PRINCIPLE, THEY HEREBY AGREE TO EXTEND THEIR PROTECTION, BY TREATY STIPULATIONS, TO ANY OTHER PRACTICABLE COMMUNICATIONS, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of TEHUANTEPEC OR PANAMA."

The "particular object" which the parties had in view, being thus accomplished—the Hise treaty defeated, the exclusive privilege to the United States surrendered and abandoned, and the European partnership established—yet they were not satisfied. They were not content to "accomplish a particular object," but desired to "ESTABLISH A GENERAL PRINCIPLE!" That which, by the terms of the treaty, was particular and local to the five States of Central America, is, in this article, extended to Mexico on the north, and to New Granada on the south, and declared to be a general principle, by which any and all other practicable routes of communication across the Isthmus between North and South America, are to be governed and protected by the allied Powers. New and additional treaty stipulations are to be entered into for this purpose, and the network which had been prepared and spread over all Central America, is to be extended far enough into Mexico and New Granada to cover all the lines of communication, whether by railway or canal, and especially to include Tehuantepec and Panama. When it is remembered that the treaty in terms establishes an alliance between the United States and Great Britain, and engages to invite all other Powers, with which either is on terms of friendly intercourse, to become parties to its provisions, it will be seen that this article seeks to make the principles of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty the law of nations in respect to American affairs. The general principle is established; the right of European Powers to intervene in the affairs of American States is recognized; the propriety of the exercise of that right is acknowledged; and the extent to which the allied Powers shall carry their protection, and the limits within which they shall confine their operations, are subject to treaty stipulations in the future.

When the American continent shall have passed under the protectorate of the allied Powers, and her future made dependent upon treaty stipulations for carrying into effect the objects of the alliance, Europe will no longer have cause for serious apprehensions at the rapid growth, expansion, and development of our Federal Union. She will then console herself, that limits have been set and barriers erected beyond which the territories of this Republic can never extend, nor its principles prevail. In confirmation of this view, she will find additional cause for congratulation when she looks into the treaty of peace with Mexico, and there sees the sacred honor of this Republic irrevocably pledged that we will never, in all coming time, annex any more Mexican territory in the mode in which Texas was acquired. The fifth article contains the following extraordinary provision:

"The boundary line established by this article shall be religiously respected by each of the two Republics, and no change shall ever be made therein, except by the express and free consent of both nations lawfully given by the General Government of each, in conformity with its own Constitution."

One would naturally suppose, that for all the ordinary purposes of a treaty of peace, the first clause of the paragraph would have been entirely sufficient. It declares that "the boundary line established by this article shall be religiously respected by each of the two Republics." Why depart from the usual course of proceeding in such cases, and add, that "no change shall ever be made therein, except by the express and free consent of both nations, LAWFULLY given by the GENERAL Government of each, in conformity with its own CONSTITUTION?" What is the meaning of this peculiar phraseology? The history of Texas furnishes the key by which the hidden meaning can be unlocked. The Sabine was once the boundary between the Republics of the United States and Mexico. By the revolt of Texas, and the establishment of her independence, and the acknowledgment thereof by the great Powers of the world, and her annexation to the United States, the boundary between the two Republics was "changed" from the Sabine to the Rio Grande, without "the express and free consent of both nations, lawfully given by the General Government of each, in conformity with its own Constitution." Mexico regarded that change a just cause of war, and accordingly invaded Texas with a view to the recovery of the lost territory. A protracted war ensued, in which thousands of lives were lost, and millions of money expended, when peace is concluded upon the express conditions that the treaty should contain an open and frank avowal that the United States has been wrong in the causes of the war, by the pledge of her honor never to repeat the act which led to hostilities.

Wherever you turn your eye, whether to your own record, to the statute-books, to the history of this country or of Mexico, or to the diplomatic history of the world, this humiliating and degrading acknowledgment stares you in the face, as a monument of your own creation, to the dishonor of our common country. Well do I remember the determined and protracted efforts of the minority to expunge this odious clause from the treaty before its ratification, and how, on the 4th of March, 1848, we were voted down by forty-two to eleven. The stain which that clause fastened upon the history of our country was not the only objection which I urged to its retention in the treaty. It violated a great principle of public policy in relation to this continent. It pledges the faith of this Republic, that our successors shall not do that which duty to the interests and honor of the country, in the progress of events, may compel them to do. I do not meditate, or look with favor upon any aggression upon Mexico. I do not desire, at this time, to annex any portion of her territory to this Union; nor am I prepared to say that the time will ever come, in my day, when I would be willing to sanction such a proposition. But who can say, that, amid the general wreck and demoralization in Mexico, a state of things may not arise in which a just regard for our own rights and safety, and for the sake of humanity and civilization, may render it imperative for us to do that which was done in the case of Texas, and thereby change the boundary between the two Republics without the free consent of the General Government of Mexico, lawfully given in conformity with her Constitution? Recent events in Sonora, Chihuahua, and Tamaulipas do not establish the wisdom and propriety of that line of policy which ties our hands in advance, and deprives the Government of the right, in the future, of doing whatever duty and honor may require, when the necessity for action may arrive.

Mr. President, one of the resolutions under consideration makes a declaration in relation to the Island of Cuba which requires a passing notice. It is in the following words:

"That while the United States disclaim any designs upon the Island of Cuba, inconsistent with the laws of nations and with their duties to Spain, they consider it due to the vast importance of the subject, to make known, in this solemn manner, that they should view all efforts on the part of any other Power to procure possession, whether peaceably or forcibly, of that Island, which as a naval or military position, must, under circumstances easy to be foreseen, become dangerous to their southern coast, to the Gulf of Mexico, and to the mouth of the Mississippi, as unfriendly acts, directed against them, to be resisted by all the means in their power."

That we would resist any attempt to transfer the Island of Cuba to any European Power, either with or without the consent of Spain, there is, I trust, no question in the mind of any American, and the fact is as well known to Europe as it is to our own country. That the United States do not meditate any designs upon the island inconsistent with the laws of nations, and with their duties to Spain, has been demonstrated to the world in a manner that forbids the necessity for a disclaimer of unworthy and perfidious purposes on our part. The resolutions convey, beneath this disclaimer, the implication that our character is subject to suspicion upon that point. Shall we let the presumption go abroad that a disclaimer of an act of dishonesty and perfidy and infamy has become necessary upon our part? Sir, is there anything in the history of our relations with foreign nations, or in respect to Cuba, that should subject our country to such injurious imputations? When has our Government failed to perform its whole duty as a neutral Power in respect to Cuba? The only complaint has been, that in its great anxiety to preserve in good faith its neutral relations, it has permitted treaty stipulations with Spain providing for the protection of our citizens to be wantonly and flagrantly violated. No suspicion that this Government has been wanting in energy and fidelity in the enforcement of our laws has been entertained in any quarter. It was the excessive energy and severity with which the duty was performed that has provoked the disapprobation of some portion of the American people.

Sir, what right has Great Britain to call upon the United States, as she did in a late application, to enter into a negotiation to guaranty Cuba to Spain? Such a step might have been necessary on the part of England in order to satisfy Spain that she has abandoned the policy which for centuries has marked her colonial history with plunder and rapine. Why does not England first restore to Spain the Island of Jamaica, by the seizure and possession of which she is enabled to overlook Cuba, while it gives her the command of the entrance of the proposed Nicaragua canal? Why does she not restore to old Spain Gibraltar, which from proximity and geographical position naturally belongs to her, and is essential to her safety? Why does she not restore the colonial possessions which she has stretched all over the world, commanding every important military and naval station, both upon land and water? Why does she not restore them to their original owners, from whom she obtained them by fraud and violence? Why does she not do these things before she calls upon us to enter into stipulations that we will not rob Spain of the Island of Cuba?

The whole system of European colonization rests upon seizure, violence, and fraud. European Powers hold nearly all their colonies by the one or the other of these tenures. They can show no other evidence, no other muniment of title. What is there in the history of the United States that requires us to make any such disclaimer? We have never acquired one inch of territory, except by honest purchase, and full payment of the consideration. We have never seized any Spanish or other European colony. We have never invaded the rights of other nations. We do not hold in our hand the results of rapine, violence, war, and fraud, for centuries, and then prate about honesty, and propose to honest people to enter into guarantees that they will not rob their neighbors.

Fortunately the history of our country subjects her to no such imputation, and relieves us from the necessity of making disclaimers which carry with them the implication of an equivocal reputation. England, France, and the other European Powers are at liberty to judge for themselves whether any such necessity exists in their case. I have not much faith in these gratuitous protestations of honesty and disinterestedness. They are generally made for the purpose of concealing a dark design while preparations are maturing for its execution! I recollect that pending the Clayton and Bulwer treaty before the Senate, a rumor was set afloat that England meditated the extension of her dominion or protection over Costa Rica, or some other portion of Central America. Sir Henry Bulwer deemed the time opportune and the rumor a sufficient excuse for addressing to our Department of State an official letter, disclaiming, in the name and by the authority of the British Government, any such design, and saying:

"I am also desired to add, that it would be contrary to the fixed and settled policy of Great Britain to entangle herself by any engagement to protect distant States over whose policy and conduct it would be impossible for the British Government to exercise any effective control. Such a protectorate would confer no possible advantage on Great Britain, and might become the source of many embarrassments to her."

Mr. Clayton was so much delighted with this frank disclaimer, that he promptly replied:

"I take pleasure in expressing the satisfaction with which this Government has received this friendly assurance from that of her Britannic Majesty, and more especially as it cannot fail to strengthen the bonds of amity now existing between our respective countries."

General Taylor deemed the matter of sufficient importance to communicate the evidence of this "friendly assurance" to the Senate in a special message. Well, the treaty was ratified, and in less than three years Great Britain seizes the Bay Islands and erects them into a colony, in the face of this "friendly assurance," and in direct violation of the provisions of the treaty!

I confess I have not formed a very high appreciation of the value of these disclaimers of all intention of committing crimes against our neighbors. I do not think I should deem my house any more secure in the night in consequence of the thief having pledged his honor not to steal my property! If I am surrounded by honest men there is no necessity for the "friendly assurance," and if by rogues, it would not relieve my apprehensions or afford much security to my rights. I am unwilling, therefore, to make any disclaimer as to our purposes upon Cuba, or to give any pledge in respect to existing rights upon this continent. The nations of Europe have no right to call upon us for a disclaimer of the one, or for a pledge to protect the other. It is true, British newspapers are in the habit of calumniating the people of the United States, as a set of marauders upon the territorial rights of our neighbors. It is also true, that for party purposes, some portion of the press of this country is in the habit of attributing such sentiments to some of our public men; but it is not true, so far as I know, that any one man in either House of Congress does entertain, or has ever entertained or avowed a sentiment that justifies such an imputation. I am unwilling, therefore, to countenance the vile slander, by voting for a resolution which by implication contains so base an insinuation. Perhaps I may as well speak plainly. I feel that there may be a lurking insinuation in these two clauses, having a little bearing towards an individual of about my proportions. It is the vocation of some partisan presses and personal organs, to denounce and stigmatize a certain class of politicians, by attributing to them unworthy and disreputable purposes, under the cognomen of "Young America." It is their amiable custom, I believe, when they come to individualize, to point to me as the one most worthy to bear the appellation. I have never either assumed or disclaimed it. I have never before alluded to it, and should not on the present occasion, had it not been introduced into the discussions of the Senate in such a manner as to leave the impression that I evaded it if I failed to notice it. I am aware that the Senator, who the other day directed so large a portion of his speech against the supposed doctrines of "YOUNG AMERICA," had no reference to myself in that part of his speech, and that the only allusion he made to me was kind and complimentary. So far as I am concerned, and those who harmonize with me in sentiment and action, the votes to which I have referred, and the reasons I have given in support of them, constitute the only profession of faith I deem it necessary to make on this subject. I am willing to compare votes and acts, principles and professions, with any Senator who chooses to assail me. I yield to none in strict observance of the laws of nations and treaty stipulations. I may not have been willing blindly or recklessly to pledge the faith of the Republic for all time, on points where, in the nature of things, it was not reasonable to suppose that the pledge could be preserved. I may have deemed it wise and prudent to hold the control of our own action, and leave our successors free, according to their own sense of duty under the circumstances which may then exist.

Now, sir, a few words with regard to the Island of Cuba. If any man desires my opinions upon that question, he can learn them very easily. They have been proclaimed frequently for the last nine years, and still remain unchanged. I have often said, and now repeat, that so long as the Island of Cuba is content to remain loyal to the Crown of Spain, be it so. I have no desire, no wish to disturb that relation. I have always said, and now repeat, that whenever the people of the Island of Cuba shall show themselves worthy of freedom by asserting and maintaining their independence, and establishing republican institutions, my heart, my sympathies, my prayers are with them for the accomplishment of the object. I have often said, and now repeat, that when that independence shall have been established, if it shall be necessary to their interest or safety to apply as Texas did for annexation, I shall be ready to do by them as we did by Texas, and receive them into the Union. I have said, and now repeat, that whenever Spain shall come to the conclusion that she cannot much longer maintain her dominion over the island, and that it is better for her to transfer it to us upon fair and reasonable terms, I am one of those who would be ready to accept the transfer. I have said, and now repeat, that whenever Spain shall refuse to make such transfer to us, and shall make it to England, or any other European Power, I would be among those who would be in favor of taking possession of the Island, and resisting such transfer at all hazards.

Thus far I have often gone; thus far I now go. These are my individual opinions, not of much consequence, I admit, but any one who desires to know them, is welcome to them. But it is one thing for me to entertain these individual sentiments, and it is another and very different thing to pledge forever and unalterably the policy of this Government in a particular channel, in defiance of any change in the circumstances that may hereafter take place. I do not deem it necessary to affirm by a resolution, in the name of the Republic, every opinion that I may entertain, and be willing to act upon as the representative of a local constituency. I am not, therefore, prepared to say that it is wise policy to make any declaration upon the subject of the Island of Cuba. Circumstances not within our control, and originating in causes beyond our reach, may precipitate a state of things that would change our action, and reverse our whole line of policy. Cuba, in the existing position of affairs, does not present a practical issue. All that we may say or do is merely speculative, and dependent upon contingencies that may never happen. So it is, in a great measure, with the discussion that has occupied so much of the time of the Senate in relation to the British settlement at the Balize. Although Great Britain has no other title than a mere permit to cut logwood, it is undeniable that she was in possession of the country before the United States became an independent Power, and has maintained the undisturbed possession ever since. Our Government has recognized it as a British colony in various ways, and it is so designated in our public documents. If the object be to provoke a difficulty with England, regardless of the merits of the quarrel, I am inclined to think that it can be accomplished as easily and readily by a notice to quit the Balize as to abandon Canada. But if the object be to establish and maintain a cherished principle of public policy in opposition to European colonization in America, the new British colony recently established at the islands in the bay of Honduras presents that distinct, naked issue, in a form which places us clearly in the right. Now is the time for action. Here is a practical issue presented which should not be evaded by vague generalities and equivocal resolves, which will be understood to mean one thing on this side of the Atlantic, and quite a different thing in Europe. Whatever action we take should be direct, unequivocal, and against the Bay Island colony by name. I am not certain as to the best mode of proceeding; but I am inclined to the opinion that the Executive should take the initiative, and make a courteous, but firm and manly protest against the infraction of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, as well as the violation of our known policy in relation to European colonization, by the creation of this new British colony, together with the distinct and unequivocal declaration, that in no event or contingency can the United States acquiesce in the continuance of the Bay Island colony. If Great Britain yields to the protest, and discontinues the colony, our rights and honor will be vindicated, and a sufficient notice will be given to the world of our determination to enforce the principle hereafter. If, on the contrary, Great Britain should insist in maintaining the colony in contempt of our protest, it would become the duty of the President to communicate the result to Congress, with the recommendation for the adoption of such measures as should be necessary to enable him to vindicate our violated rights. I am not particular, however, as to the form of the proceeding. My great desire is to meet the question fairly, and assume whatever responsibility the consequences may involve, and not beat a disgraceful retreat under shelter of terrible threats in the event the offense is repeated. If we act with becoming discretion and firmness, I have no apprehension that the enforcement of our rights will lead to hostilities; Great Britain will not be willing to engage in a contest of arms with us when she is so clearly in the wrong. She has given bond and security to keep the peace towards the United States, and she well knows that the condition of a forfeiture is the loss of her colonies, and her expulsion forever from the American continent. Firmness, and prompt unequivocal action on our part, is the only sure mode of preserving peace. Let the Bay Island colony be discontinued, and let us free ourselves from entangling alliances by the annulment of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, and the United States will assume the position we are entitled to among the nations of the earth.

Mr. President, I will trespass on the kindness of the Senate no longer. I have deemed it due to myself and the occasion to make this exposition of my views. I have availed myself of the earliest opportunity afforded by the removal of the injunction of secrecy, to explain my reasons for opposing the ratification of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty. I have contented myself with vindicating my own course without assailing any one, or calling in question the conduct of others. I return my thanks to the Senate for the kindness and courtesy extended to me on this occasion.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] has indulged in some pretty hard criticisms upon the terms of my resolution, and I desire to show him and the Senate, as I trust I can in a few moments, that they are rather hypercriticisms, not at all warranted by the tenor of the resolution. The honorable Senator commences by saying that the terms of this resolution relinquish the past and the present, and refer only to the future, because they save "existing rights." Does the honorable Senator mean to violate existing rights?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have answered emphatically, no.

Mr. CASS. Then why not say it in the resolution? It saves "existing rights," not existing wrongs. It is in the very words of Mr. Polk, used more than twenty years after Mr. Monroe proclaimed the doctrine. Yet, Mr. Polk very properly in his message, saved existing rights, not existing wrongs. But he did not thereby mean to sanction any violation of this principle, which had previously occurred.

If, therefore, the British Government has established a colony in any part of the continent in direct contravention of this resolution and of the Monroe doctrine, it is an existing wrong and not an existing right, and it cannot shelter itself under any construction of this resolution. It secures to the British nothing more than their rights; and that is just what it purports to do.

And what such rights are, the American people must judge, upon that responsibility which they owe to the world and to history, when they come to make a practical application of the principle, and are required to decide whether a colonial establishment is a right to be tolerated, or a wrong to be redressed. And this duty is one which always devolves upon nations in their intercourse with other Powers of the earth.

Now, then, if Great Britain has taken possession of the Bay Islands, and established a colony there, which she had no right to establish, her existing rights there are not affected, for she has none. Her wrongs make no rights. The whole subject is fully open for redress. Mr. Monroe very properly, Mr. Polk very properly, and this resolution, with equal propriety, in order to prevent any charge of an unjust spirit of aggrandizement on our part, by the nations of Europe, have said, "We do not interfere with your existing rights, whatever they may be; of the extent of these we must judge when the occasion arises; but we disclaim any intention to interfere with your own colonies—to hold them, to settle them, to maintain them, just as you please—these are existing rights which we do not touch; but if you have done us wrong by establishing and holding colonies where you have no rights, then we intend to apply our American principle and dislodge you from positions unjustly taken."

I repeat Mr. Polk's language, that the existing rights of every European nation should be respected. Twenty-five years before his declaration the doctrine had been proclaimed by Mr. Monroe; but no man then contended, and Mr. Polk never dreamed, that this provision had a retrospective effect, and protected wrong running back through a period of a quarter of a century. The idea never entered his mind.

The Senator supposes, if I understand his construction, that such a resolution as this would wipe out all preceding acts. Why, sir, until you can convert a wrong into a right, it wipes out nothing at all. It leaves us just as free to pursue the course towards them which our honor and our interests demand, as though we passed no resolutions at all.

The principle is right, and I do not understand, though I must confess I do not clearly comprehend him, that the Senator from Illinois contests it. I mean the principle of maintaining that we, as a principal Power upon this continent, have a right to say that European influence shall not be extended here. I do not understand him to deny it at all. You lay down a principle, and when you come to apply it, you judge of existing rights; you judge of the condition of the colonies of the European Powers upon this continent; and, acting as becomes an upright nation, if they have colonies they have a fair right to hold, you ought not to interfere with them.

But if one of them has established the colony of Bay of Islands in the very face of our rights, and in the very face of existing treaties, that is not a claim which is saved by this resolution, but is an unjust pretension, which we are authorized to remove and correct. To be sure, as I have already said, in judging such cases we act upon our responsibility, and we ought so to act as to be absolved from the charge of aggression and injustice.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois says there is no use in laying down the principle, for it will be violated. Mr. Monroe thought it of some use, and actually laid it down. Mr. Polk thought it of use, and also laid it down. Mr. Jefferson, in a letter which I have already read to the Senate, announced his adhesion to the doctrine, and thought it very important it should be solemnly proclaimed by a public national act. Where has been our error in our course upon this grave subject? Precisely the one now sought to be remedied by this resolution. In 1823, when the doctrine was first promulged here, resolutions were introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. Clay and Mr. Poinsett, affirming the doctrine, in order to give it an authoritative influence through the world. But it was not done. The matter slept. Mr. Polk sought the same object. An honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. ALLEN] also felt the necessity of Congressional action, and introduced a resolution similar to the present one. But all these efforts were in vain. The efficient prop to support the building was wanting. Mr. Jefferson says expressly, in a letter which I have before me, that inasmuch as the declaration might lead to war, it was proper that it should be laid before Congress for its sanction; but it was not done. The doctrine, as sound a one as any nation ever proclaimed, almost passed into oblivion. And now, in this new condition of the world, when God alone knows from day to day what convulsion is about to break out in Europe, and the effect it will have upon us, and upon the other American States, it is proposed to put the doctrine in an authoritative form; and what right has the honorable Senator to say that if this be done we shall suffer it to be violated?

The honorable Senator says the doctrine was violated in the case of Oregon. I say it was not, and I say that the honorable Senator is under a total misconception of the effect of the treaty relating to Oregon. By that treaty England extended her boundaries beyond what he and I thought she had a just claim to do. We believed she had no just title by four and a half degrees to the boundary she obtained; but the American Government said, your colony does come down to the forty-ninth degree of north latitude. That being the case, there was no Monroe doctrine in the question. The fault was not in the application of the doctrine, but it was in allowing Great Britain to have a larger colony than she had a right to. But the moment we conceded that the line of the British possessions came down to the forty-ninth degree of north latitude, that moment we conceded that the Monroe doctrine had no application to it; for we thereby conceded that the country was a British colony, and of course her existing rights secured to Great Britain the just power to deal with such colony as she pleased. It was a question of colonial government, and not of Monroe doctrine. The Senator is therefore under a total misapprehension with regard to the matter; and if we had said that the British line came down to San Francisco, there would have been no question for the application of the Monroe doctrine, as that would have been estopped by the establishing of a boundary between us and her colony on the Pacific coast.

With respect to the Bay Islands, the other question to which the honorable Senator has referred, what have we given up there? Nothing. We never heard even a rumor of it till within a few weeks; and the moment I heard of it, I introduced a resolution into the Senate, with a view to ascertain from the Executive what were the true facts of the case. And the resolution now before us, instead of conceding anything in favor of this colony of the Bay Islands, was introduced before we had any answer from the Executive, or any knowledge but a vague report of the British Government. Subsequent events have come to enlighten us. Who, then, has a right to say that there has been any delay or neglect in this matter, or that these resolutions concede anything to England? Have we said that the Monroe doctrine shall not apply, but that Great Britain has a right to hold this colony, in the very face of her own stipulation? No American citizen or legislator ought to say we have done anything by which we acquiesce in the conduct of Great Britain in reference to the colonization of the Bay Islands. I trust the Executive Government—but upon this without book, as I know nothing—have taken a proper course, and made the necessary investigations and remonstrance. At any rate, this branch of the Legislature, as a depository of much of the powers of the American people, has but recently been made acquainted with the facts, and a resolution on the subject has been reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations within the last week. Therefore, I say that no man has a right to assert that we have conceded any principle of the Monroe doctrine in relation to the Bay Islands.

Then how is it with respect to the other two cases mentioned by the Senator—the treaty with Mexico, and the Clayton-Bulwer treaty? The Mexican treaty terminated a glorious war with a great many advantages to our country. It is not necessary to go over the circumstances of the formation and ratification of the treaty. We gained much and conceded but little. The Clayton and Bulwer treaty was concluded twenty-five years after the Monroe doctrine had been promulgated, but not enforced. Attempts had more than once been made to procure the sanction of Congress to this doctrine, in order to give it its proper effect. But they had failed, and it is possible that the same fate may for a while await the present effort. That doctrine had remained a dead letter upon your national archives. Then there came a proposition from England to agree that we should not interfere in that part of the continent, if they would not. It was the best thing we could do. We could not get a Congressional sanction of the Monroe doctrine; and the honorable Senator at this day is not willing to join in giving it. I repeat, what had we to do under those circumstances? Why, it was manifestly our policy to agree with England to keep hands off. Therefore it was that I voted for the ratification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I agree that the subsequent conduct of England has been perfectly unjustifiable, and those who voted against the treaty had good ground for their position, if they suspected her of bad faith, as the subsequent facts have shown. But instead of that treaty being an abandonment of the Monroe doctrine, its very object was to carry that doctrine into effect, by preventing the future interference of an European power in the affairs of this continent. That this object has failed of attainment by the bad faith of England, and by her pretension to circumscribe Central America, not by its true boundaries, but by those assumed by yourself, is no charge against those who voted for the treaty.

The honorable Senator objects that this resolution declares that in any ultimate contingency that may arise, we will do what our interests and honor require. Now allow me to say to the honorable gentleman, that in the intercourse between nations, where solemn declarations like these arise, there are two modes of proceeding; one is an absolute declaration to the nations of the world, or to such of them as are interested in the matter, if such a certain act is done injurious to the Power protesting, it shall be followed by war. Another is by a declaration that such Power reserves to itself the right to act under the circumstances as the occasion may require. The latter is the declaration of this resolution in regard to colonization; the former is the declaration of the one in regard to Cuba. By it we pledge ourselves to intervene by war if any other Power should attempt to gain possession of Cuba.

But with regard to colonization, we leave it to our successors to act as circumstances may require. There is nothing more common in the history of national intercourse, nothing more common when grave exigencies arise, when events seem to announce political convulsions, in consequence of unreasonable and unjust pretensions, seriously effecting the honor or interest of a nation, than for such nation publicly to proclaim its policy, and the course of action it intends to pursue if the pretension is pushed to action. And I would say to the honorable gentleman, as I said before, that there is no Power in the world which will entirely disregard the declaration of the people of the United States upon a point respecting their interests and honor. Nor is it merely throwing away words to declare what that course will be. Such a declaration made in the name of the American people by their authorized servants is not a vain display, but it is a solemn annunciation of their purpose, and as such will be believed and heard by the Powers of the world, and it does not become an American Senator to diminish the influence of such a proceeding by any doubts as to the course of other countries, or as to his own.

The Senator recommends a course that contradicts his own doctrine. He is for a protest—by whom? By the President. Thirty years have gone by since Mr. Monroe proclaimed his doctrine. He protested, Mr. Polk protested, and it is to avoid the failure which attends an Executive protest that I introduced this resolution. I wish to put upon record the solemn protest of the American people by a public act of their Government. I want this to go before the world authoritatively, as the declaration of the sentiments and purposes of the American people. Suppose the honorable gentleman's recommendation should be adopted, and the President should protest; it is well known to Europe that our Executive has no power to declare war; no power, in truth, to enforce his own act. That power is lodged exclusively in the two Houses of Congress, and unless they assert the principle, the nations of Europe may continue to disregard our presidential declarations; for they well know that he who makes them cannot give them effect. Are you going to protest without reference to what is to follow? Your protest, in such a conjuncture, to be effectual, must be followed by some indication of the course you intend to pursue in the event of its being disregarded; at any rate, some declaration of your determination to meet the contingency with firmness and decision.

The Senator says he is for giving no pledges; yet he is for protesting on the part of the Executive in relation to the colonization of the Bay Islands, and he intimates rather than states his willingness to support it by Congressional action. Such a protest, if it carries with it no pledge of action or resistance, is a mere waste of words unworthy of the American people. The only value of such a national declaration consists in the determination of the people making it to enforce it, and in the conviction of other nations that it is a pledge that will be redeemed, whatever may be the consequences. The honorable Senator says this is an awful threat. Well, sir, his protest, if it is anything but waste paper, is another awful threat. There is no view which you can take of a general protest, which is not equally applicable to a special one. The history of the world is filled with such examples and declarations. If the honorable Senator is in favor of the principle, what objection can he have to proclaiming it, and making it efficient at once by Congressional declaration? What objection can there be to its receiving our sanction without first passing through the Executive Department? Congress, if I understand the gentleman, and I am not sure I do, is to act after the President has acted, and acted in vain. The difference between us is, that I choose to go at once to the great depository of the power of the American people for that indication of national action which may be necessary.

A few words now with respect to Cuba. I repeat, and the Senate all know as well as I do, that the condition of Europe and the world is most extraordinary, and from day to day, from hour to hour indeed, no man can tell what is to happen. It is therefore necessary for all nations to be prepared. It is the very time when nations should make known to foreign Powers the policy they mean to pursue in certain probable contingencies; and why? That other nations, knowing the determination, may be induced to refrain from designs they might otherwise pursue. It is one chance the more of averting serious consequences. The honorable Senator maintains that the terms of this resolution, disclaiming any designs against Cuba, convey an impression that there are such designs. That is certainly a far-fetched conclusion. Why not make such a disclaimer, if we mean it? The Senator says it is disclaiming what there is no just cause for imputing. We say, or rather we intimate in the resolution, that Cuba would be acceptable to us, but we disclaim before the world, what we have repeatedly been charged with, the design of taking forcible and unjust possession of it. We do it in the existing state of the world to put an end to those reproaches which are eternally made against us; and I suppose that a vast majority of the American people heartily join in this declaration that we do not intend unjustly to seize the Island of Cuba.

I did not exactly understand an allusion of the Senator, but I thought he intimated that this resolution was aimed at him. I can assure the honorable gentleman that I never thought of him while preparing the resolution. My mind was turned to a very different quarter, to the honor and interest of my country. I had not the remotest allusion to him in drawing up the resolution; and I repeat, that my mind was upon a vastly more important subject, and I say that without meaning any disrespect to him. I assure him I had no reference to "Young America," or Old America. Such a thought never entered my head. As to the attacks, of which he spoke, against himself, as the impersonation of "Young America," I have nothing to say, as I have had nothing to do with them. I take it that "Young America" and Old America have been pretty well abused; and I have had a pretty good share of one, as the Senator thinks he has had of the other. I do not believe it has done either of us much harm, nor do I think it is worthy of the slightest notice. I have no doubt but that Old America, or, in other words, Old Fogyism, will continue to be abused, and Young America, as it passes on in the journey of life, must expect to become Old America itself, and share in the abuse which that respectable condition is sure to bring with it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In reference to the last remarks of the Senator from Michigan, I will do him the justice to say, that I do not suppose he intended the peculiar phraseology of that resolution to convey any injurious insinuation against myself or any other Senator; but he must be aware that efforts have been made to give it such a construction here and elsewhere.

Mr. CASS. Does the honorable Senator allude to me?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly not. The Senator from Michigan has informed us that allusions to Old America and Young America are not fit to be made in the Senate. Perhaps he is right in this respect, but he will bear in mind that I have never alluded to Old America, or uttered the word in the Senate. He has been in the almost daily habit for the last year of assuming to himself the cognomen of Old Fogy, and seems to rejoice in the appellation. He has not unfrequently made pointed remarks about Young Fogies and Young America; but has failed, up to this day, to provoke a response from me, or to induce me to permit the word to pass my lips. The Senator also had an opportunity the other day to rebuke his friend from Alabama, [Mr. CLEMENS,] when he devoted a great portion of his speech to denunciations of what he was was pleased to call Young America and its principles. The venerable Senator from Michigan will therefore pardon me for having been guilty of the indiscretion, in a single instance, of having followed his almost daily example.

Mr. CASS. The honorable Senator will allow me to say one word. If from this time the honorable gentleman will call himself Young America, I will allow myself to be called the Old Fogy, and I shall have no objection to his using the term as much as he pleases.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The penalty is too great for the privilege conferred. Although he has shown every disposition to call himself an Old Fogy, it is not agreeable to my tastes to call him by the one name or to assume the other to myself.

But enough of this. The Senator says I have put a wrong construction upon his resolution, that it only respects existing rights, and therefore by implication condemns all existing wrongs. Under this interpretation it is difficult to perceive of a European colony in America which would be protected by it. What one of them is rightfully held, according to our ideas of political justice? Does the Senator propose to dispossess Great Britain of Jamaica because she holds it by the title of Cromwell's seizure, who, according to English doctrine, had no rightful authority to wield the power of that kingdom? Does he propose to give England notice to abandon the Balize settlement, because she holds it by no other authority than a mere permit to cut logwood, of an older date than our Declaration of Independence, and an undisturbed possession from that day to this? Does he propose an inquiry into the rightful authority by which Great Britain and all other European nations hold their colonies in America? If so, he is several steps in advance of Young America, and his resolution carves out more work than the public generally suppose from reading the Senator's speeches in its support. Under this interpretation who will be authorized to say what existing rights are protected and what colony is condemned by the resolution? Its vague uncertainty will assuredly deprive it of all efficacy. No matter what construction the Senator may put upon it, I am sure England and all Europe will understand it as recognizing their right to hold all existing colonies, and a proclamation of our purpose never to allow any new European colony to be planted in America; that it is a full act of forgiveness and oblivion as to the past, and a solemn warning as to the future.

But the Senator insists that his resolution will have, and ought to have, a retrospective effect. If so, let him so amend his resolution as to make it declare distinctly that all European colonies established in America since Mr. Monroe's memorable declaration, and in violation of it, together with all which shall hereafter be established, are to be resisted by this Government at all hazards. Is he prepared to do that?

Mr. CASS. Perfectly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then I understand that the honorable Senator is willing to say in his resolution: "Resolved, That all colonies which have been established upon the American continent by Great Britain, or any other European Power, since 1823, in violation of the Monroe declaration, and all that may be hereafter established, are to be deemed hostile to our interests and safety, and to be resisted by the full power, if necessary, of this Government."

Mr. CASS. I will vote for it to-day.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Why did he not make his purpose apparent on the face of his resolution?

Mr. CASS. Certainly; that is my idea; that is my construction. It is plain talk, and I like it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is plain talk. Then, let us see where we are according to the explanations that have been made. Does the Balize come within this restriction, and is Great Britain to be required to draw in her boundaries to what they were in 1823?

Mr. CASS. She must draw it in just so far as she has extended it illegally, or in contravention of our rights.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The seizure of the Bay Islands is to be disavowed, and those islands are to be restored?

Mr. CASS. Precisely.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The seizure of the town of San Juan, at the mouth of the San Juan river, on the 8th of February, 1848, is at once to be disavowed, and it is to be restored to Nicaragua?

Mr. CASS. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The British protectorate over the Mosquito coast is to be abandoned, and treated as if it had not existed?

Mr. CASS. It is abandoned by the treaty.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not think it has yet been abandoned. I shall wait patiently for the Senator to bring forward his modified resolution in such terms as to embrace all the objects to which I have referred, for I looked in vain through his speeches for something to show that he ever dreamed of carrying his resolution back to the past.

Mr. CASS. I never thought of anything to the contrary.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not longer doubt it. I think the Senator and myself will soon get on ground where we will understand each other's meaning better. I see clearly that the debate will do good, for the explanations which have been so frankly made will enlighten Senators as to the real objects and purposes the Senator from Michigan has in view. Instead of taking it unkindly, he ought to feel grateful to me for calling out this explanation.

Mr. CASS. I am much obliged to you.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Passing from this point, the Senator from Michigan has stated that I am opposed to declaring the Monroe doctrine, and then proceeded to show my inconsistency by proving that I was in favor of it.

Mr. CASS. I beg pardon. The honorable Senator will allow me to say, that I stated his objection was to Congress declaring it, but still he wished the President to carry it out.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I did not object to Congress declaring it.

Mr. CASS. Then I misunderstood the honorable Senator.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I stated that the seizure of the Bay Islands, and their erection into a colony, was in direct violation of the Monroe doctrine, as well as an infraction of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty; that these islands presented the distinct issue under circumstances which place our country clearly in the right; that I desired to make the issue on that point, and have all our proceedings meet that issue fairly and directly. I objected to the Senator's resolution, because, according to my construction of its terms, it would be understood as acquiescing in the existing state of things; or, in other words, that it was an abandonment of the doctrine as to all practical questions to which it may now be applied. I expressed the opinion that it was the duty of the President to make a courteous but firm and manly protest against the establishment of that colony, together with the statement that the United States could never submit to such a violation of the treaty in contempt of our cherished policy, and that in the event that England should persist, the President should communicate the facts to Congress, and that we should clothe him with the power, and furnish him with the means for vindicating our rights and redressing our wrongs. I intimated the opinion that perhaps it was better for the Executive to take the initiative, as that is the only branch of the Government through which we can communicate with foreign nations, but in respect to the mode of proceeding, I expressed my willingness to conform my action to the views of the Senate. The main point I made was, that having a distinct issue before us, on which we were clearly right, we should meet it fairly, and assume whatever responsibilities the vindication of our rights might involve, and not evade it under cover of vague generalities and equivocal resolutions about "henceforth" and "future" colonies.

Passing from this point, I must remind the Senate that the Senator from Michigan did not undertake to show that I was not right in saying that every article, provision, and line of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty was predicated on a virtual and practical negation and repudiation of the Monroe doctrine. He prudently passes over in silence the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, which is of recent origin, and the terms of which are being daily and flagrantly violated, and attempts to show that I was mistaken in relation to the Oregon treaty, about which no practical question can at present possibly arise. I admire the prudence which dictated this course, and will proceed to show that I was not mistaken in respect to the Oregon treaty. Prior to its date there was no British colony in America, west of the Rocky Mountains. The Hudson's Bay Company's charter confined them to the country drained by the waters flowing into the bay. Neither Canada nor any other colony extended west of the Rocky Mountains. The title to that country was held in abeyance by the treaty of non-occupancy, which prohibited both parties from colonizing it. We terminated that treaty and formed a new one, which established the parallel of 49° as the boundary. By this treaty Great Britain consented that we might erect Territories and States south of that boundary, and the United States consented that Great Britain might establish new colonies north of that line, and in a portion of the continent where they did not exist before.

But I will not weary the Senate by discussing points of no practical value. I have great respect for the opinions of the honorable Senator from Michigan. I know his familiarity with our foreign relations, and shall be glad to follow his lead in wiping out all treaty stipulations which have been erected as barriers to the prevalence of the doctrine we both desire to see carried into effect. Let him so modify his resolution as to provide for the discontinuance of the Bay Island colony and the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, as the first and essential step towards the establishment of the Monroe doctrine, and we will stand upon a common platform, struggling side by side in a common cause.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of doing a simple act of justice to this resolution. I rise for the purpose of saying a word in its defense, from what I think was an extremely undeserved and illiberal criticism which the Senator from Illinois has bestowed upon it. Sir, I have taken no part, and I design to take no part, in the discussion which is going on in the Chamber between our very harmonious friends on the other side of it; but I am a friend of justice; I am an advocate for protecting the old from the assaults of the young. I dislike especially to see injustice measured out by "Young America" to an "Old Fogy," professing myself to belong in some respects to that category.

The Senator from Illinois has said, with an ingenuity which belongs to him, but with a disregard to justice and fairness which I have seldom seen him exhibit, that this resolution is liable to exception, because it is altogether future in its operation—because it leaves all past transactions undisposed of, and dates itself from the present time by the emphatic word "henceforth." Why, sir, the honorable Senator ought to have known, and from the expression upon his countenance, I believe he did know, but concealed his knowledge, that that word "henceforth" comprises the very virtue, and excellence, and particular spirit and matter of the resolution. Do you not see how the thing operates? The Monroe doctrine is to be reaffirmed. How, sir? From "henceforth." [Laughter.] Let by-gones be by-gones; we do not touch anything that is past; but, sir, "henceforth" we put forth the Monroe doctrine as the law which we dictate to the Powers of the world.

Mr. Monroe put it forth some years ago with exactly the same qualification upon it of "henceforth." Now, sir, if the honorable Senator is the advocate of the Monroe doctrine, permit me to inquire of him how he can strike out the word or the sense "henceforth?" [Laughter.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. I give it up.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. Monroe did not undertake to interfere with any past transactions in his day. He only said "henceforth" we lay down the line beyond which you shall not go. Now, the Senator from Michigan, instead of being liable to reproach, has shown himself to be a true and loyal subject of Mr. Monroe's doctrine, for he takes it up from "henceforth." All that has happened in the intervening time between Mr. Monroe's promulgation of this doctrine and the present hour is, as to our proceedings, what had happened up to the time when Mr. Monroe promulgated his doctrine in the times then past—it all belongs to by-gones, which a generous and liberal-minded nation never seeks to disturb.

Now do you not see, Mr. President, how admirably we are following out the course laid down and the policy of the Monroe doctrine from "henceforth?" Very well, sir; suppose we pass the resolution. We do not interfere with any settlements that the British have made in the Bay Islands, or the Bay of Islands, or whatever name this strange and out-of-the-way place may bear; we do not interfere with the Balize; we do not interfere with Jamaica; we interfere with nothing that is past, but we say, beware "henceforth." [Laughter.] Well, sir, nineteen or twenty years hence, if this Government holds together so long, as I trust it will for many a successive period of twenty years, a presidential election will be coming on, or just be over, and we can then reproduce the Monroe doctrine with the same identical word "henceforth," touching nothing that has taken place in the twenty years which will have elapsed between now and that time. Thus we see how admirably it works.

All of us understand that these resolutions are not intended to operate exteriorly to the Government of the United States; they are not intended to affect foreign Powers, but they are for home operation and home consumption. [Laughter.] Then do you not see how admirably we work the problem out? Let Great Britain come on; let her make colonies; let her extend her dominions on this continent, and from time to time we will notify her—not that she shall discontinue what she has done; not that she shall forego or give up anything that she has acquired—but ever and anon we will signify to her from "henceforth" you must direct and manage your conduct with a proper respect to the restrictions we have laid upon you.

Do you not see, sir, that if the Senator from Illinois could strike out the word "henceforth"—and I will vote against any such striking out; I do protest against it—it would deprive the resolution of all practical bearing and useful operation? I should be obliged to go against the resolution if you strike out "henceforth." It is possible I may go for it with the word "henceforth" in; and then, you see, we will have this beautiful spectacle presented to the world.

We lawyers used to hear, in old times, about what was called "continual claim." When a fellow was in possession of a tract of land to which another man set up a title which he was not exactly disposed to give up, and when, perhaps, the claimant distrusted his power to enforce upon him that he should give it up, he went over—I believe that is the way of it, for I do not pretend to be very well learned in my recollection of these old things; I have not heard anything about them for thirty years—and going upon the land, or as close to it as his adversary would allow, he put in the claim to that land, and did nothing further. But when another year had rolled round, he went and put in another claim, and that they called making a continual claim. This was for the purpose of keeping alive his rights in the premises. Now, do you not see, sir, that this admirable process is accomplished by the reproduction of the Monroe doctrine once in every ten, fifteen, or twenty years, with the word "henceforth," which the Senator from Illinois is so invidious and unjust as to desire to strike out, and that by this we keep ourselves exactly in that position? We let European innovations, if you please to call them so, or colonizations, or something or other, go on quietly upon this continent, while we accompany them not with a "continual claim," but a continual notification, protest, and expression of deep concern. That is what we do.

A few words as to the Monroe doctrine, which the Senator from Illinois says he is prepared to go for and support at all hazards. I am not exactly inclined to say that I agree with him. I have yet to learn that Mr. Monroe was anything more than a President of the United States. Mr. Monroe was not what Louis XIV. or Napoleon claimed for themselves with regard to France—the State. He was not the embodiment or representative of the whole powers of the American people; he was not the nation. I know of no authority that he had, by any declaration of his, to bind us and our posterity to maintain a particular course of policy forever, or for any length of time. I will go for the Monroe doctrine just so far as I think it is right. I do not say that I will not go for it altogether; but if I do, it will not be because it is the Monroe doctrine, but because, upon an examination of it, I believe it right, proper, expedient, and beneficial to the nation to go for it. Why, is not this monstrous? We have had lately superinduced upon the Constitution of the United States the Virginia resolutions of 1798. I thought that was going far enough; but those were resolutions adopted by the Virginia Legislature—by the Ancient Dominion—patronized and promoted by Mr. Jefferson, the father of Democracy. But shall we say now that we are to have another appendage put to the Constitution, in the shape of a fundamental amendment, upon the authority of Mr. Monroe, a President of the United States, and that we are not at liberty to debate, to consider, to examine, to decide for ourselves, how far it is right to follow out that resolution? I shall take the liberty, whenever the question comes up, of deciding for myself upon that point, not considering myself as bound by any bonds or links, either of iron or of brass.

But I am sorry to have been diverted to this matter of the Monroe doctrine. I rose merely for the purpose of interposing against what I thought was a very unfair proceeding on the part of the Senator from Illinois, and of insisting that the only word in the resolution which should make it especially palatable and practically useful and valuable now and for all time to come, was that very word in two syllables which he wishes to strike out, to wit, the word "henceforth." [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until Saturday next, as that will be a leisure day, and I do not wish to take up much of the precious time of the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would ask the indulgence of my friend from Texas to allow me to make a very brief statement.

Mr. HOUSTON. Very well, sir.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I rise, Mr. President, "to vindicate the truth of history." I wish to correct my friend from Illinois in one respect. He has charged the Administration of General Taylor with making war upon the Monroe doctrine, by entering into the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. He is utterly mistaken in regard to the origin of this war upon the Monroe doctrine, if he supposes it originated with that treaty. When the saddle is put upon the right horse, it will be found upon the back of his own party.

No reason for such mistakes can be assigned in behalf of the gentleman from Illinois, no excuse can be made for him, except that he belongs to "Young America," and his recollection does not go back far enough to enable him to know the facts. Here they are: In 1835, Mr. Clayton, the Secretary of State during the Taylor Administration—then a member of the Senate—offered the following resolution. Let me read from the Journal:

"The following motion, submitted by Mr. Clayton, was considered and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of other nations, and particularly with the Governments of Central America and New Granada, for the purpose of effectually protecting, by suitable treaty stipulations with them, such individuals or companies as may undertake to open a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever, by such stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all other nations, on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established to compensate the capitalists who may engage in such undertaking, and proceed to work."

"Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States."

Andrew Jackson was President of the United States when this resolution was adopted; and my information is, that when it was laid before him, he approved it; but I have not the official evidence of the fact before me. If I had, I would read it to the Senate. This resolution was adopted by the Senate, and there was not even objection enough to call for the yeas and nays. It was adopted in 1835, requiring negotiations to be opened with all nations in favor of this interoceanic communication, giving to all equal privileges, and asking the President to enter into stipulations to that effect. It is true it was offered by Mr. Clayton, but it was subsequently carried out and approved, as I am informed, by the then President of the United States, and it was adopted not by a Whig Senate, but by a Senate with a majority composed of members of the Democratic party; so that what I stated at the commencement is literally true, that the foundation of the policy belongs to the Democracy, was sanctioned by them, and put afloat by them.

Now, what subsequent facts transpired? Mr. Bidlack, appointed by Mr. Polk, Chargé d'Affaires in Bogota, actually made a treaty with New Granada, which I have before me, and a part of which I will read. He was sent out in 1846, I think, and he made this treaty with New Granada, by which he secured to the United States at all times during the existence of that treaty, the right of a free passage across the Isthmus of Darien; and in consideration of the cessions made by the Government of New Granada in that treaty, the Government of the United States stipulated and agreed as follows, (I read from the treaty:)

"And in order to secure to themselves the tranquil and constant enjoyment of these advantages, and as an especial compensation for the said advantages, and for the favors they have acquired by the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of this treaty, the United States guaranty, positively and efficaciously, to New Granada, by the present stipulations, the perfect neutrality of the beforementioned isthmus, with the view that the free transit from the one to the other sea may not be interrupted or embarrassed in any future time while this treaty exists."

If, therefore, Great Britain or France, or any other powerful nation on the earth, should desire to secure by hostile measures a transit across that isthmus, our Government is bound by this treaty to take up arms and defend New Granada against that nation; and all that is done in Democratic days, and under Democratic rule.

When the Taylor Administration came into power, with Mr. Clayton as Secretary of State; when they saw by the resolution of 1835 that this plan of treating with all nations, and getting the whole of them to come into treaty stipulations guaranteeing the opening of an interoceanic communication across the Isthmus, and making it a neutral thoroughfare for the world; and then, when they saw that by the Bidlack treaty of December, 1846, with New Granada, we were bound to guarantee the neutrality of the Isthmus of Darien against all nations who might undertake to force a passage through it, was it not very natural that they should ask Great Britain and France, and other Powers, to unite in these same guarantees, and thereby make the obligation less burdensome upon us in case war became necessary, in order to fulfill our guarantee of the neutrality of that Isthmus?

Sir, the thing is too plain. It cannot be gainsayed. But these facts seem to have been overlooked entirely by the gentleman from Illinois in his attack upon the Taylor Administration. Thus a Democratic Senate adopts a resolution inviting all nations to enter into treaty stipulations for the protection of individuals and companies who may engage to construct a ship canal across the Isthmus, with an assurance that every nation which enters into the measure shall have equal privileges upon the payment of the same rates of toll; the father of modern Democracy, Jackson, not Jefferson, approves it; Polk, "Young Hickory," binds us by treaty to fight all nations which may disturb the neutrality of the Isthmus; and then, when the Taylor Administration does no more than act in conformity to this Democratic policy, the Senator from Illinois denounces and charges that Administration with surrendering the Monroe doctrine! Why, sir, it proves that the Whigs cannot possibly escape Democratic censure. If they do precisely what the Democrats recommend, they are blamed for obedience! The Democrats make a feast, invite all nations, ask the Whigs to wait on their guests, and then turn around and denounce them for doing it! Such is modern Democracy! Besides, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, consisting of a large Democratic majority, and if the Monroe doctrine, which is now so precious, has been overturned by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, who is it that has overturned it? It has been done by Democrats themselves.

Thus I have shown you that this policy originated with Democrats, was sanctioned by the head of the Democratic church, General Jackson himself, and has been continued by them in the formation of a treaty with New Granada in 1846, and by the ratification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Having stated these facts, allow me to say that I am like the Senator from North Carolina. I think the best part of the resolution of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CASS] consists in the word "henceforth;" and I agree with the Senator from Illinois in one particular, and that is: I am not willing to act upon abstractions until the facts of the case are presented.

Mr. BADGER. Then they cease to be abstractions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, sir; they cease then to be abstractions; but I will not upon any occasion now or "henceforth"—using that term, which the speech of the Senator from North Carolina has dignified with undying celebrity—begin to endorse abstractions of any kind. It is time enough for us to act when called upon to act upon facts. When facts are presented, it is then time enough for us to do what the dignity and the honor and the interests of our country require. It is useless to say beforehand what we will do. When individuals bluster and make threats, I have no faith that they will ever execute them; nor have I any more faith in blustering nations than I have in blustering individuals. My doctrine is to wait until the time for action comes. If any of our treaties have been violated, let us make a serious inquiry into the facts of the case, and then act with promptness and decision. Long talks under injuries are ridiculous, if not contemptible.

A word more with regard to taking Cuba, or seizing Cuba, or buying Cuba, and that for purposes of defense. It presents the strangest question, sir, for the consideration of an "Old Fogy" like myself that ever was presented to a deliberative body. My recollection goes back to the war of 1812; it even goes a little beyond that period. And when we were weak, when we were really imbecile compared with what we are at present, nobody ever thought of acquiring Cuba for defense. When we wanted defense, no one thought of seizing or purchasing Cuba for defensive purposes. But now, when we have grown strong, when we can defend ourselves against all the world without Cuba, everybody wants Cuba as a necessary element of defense! It is so inconsistent, it is so preposterous, when we compare it with the history of the past, with the times which I myself have seen, that it is the most wonderful thing I have ever known to be deliberated upon us gravely as this has been. The only argument that anybody has attempted to advance here is, that its acquisition is necessary for national defense. Just as we have grown in strength and in power, and can do without any acquisition of that sort, just in proportion to the enlargement of our means and power, is the clamor increased that it is necessary to get Cuba for purposes of defense!

Mr. President, I fear that under the plausible pretence of self-defense, a right which equally pertains to nations as individuals, we are fomenting a spirit of aggression.

Sir, I have not a particle of credence in the position that the possession of Cuba is essential to our national defense. We can defend ourselves without it, and if we had it it would only give us more to defend, in case we were attacked. If the nations attacking us were more powerful, on land and on sea, than we are, they could land an army on any part of the coast of Cuba, if it was ours, blockade Havana and the other ports, and unless we had them very strongly fortified and garrisoned, they might capture the strong places and conquer the whole island. Instead of being an assisting element in the defense of the country, the acquisition of Cuba would only weaken us by increasing the territory we should be called on to defend. To do it, we should have to enlarge our armaments and take troops from healthy temperate climates, to die of disease within the tropics. If, after all our exertions, our enemy was stronger than we, the probability is we should lose in the contest what we now seem so desirous to acquire, upon the delusive calculation that it would strengthen our hands. If we are strong enough to keep Cuba, were it now ours, against any enemy capable of giving us serious annoyance, we are able to defend ourselves against that enemy without it.

Mr. DOWNS. I have heretofore taken no part in the discussion of this resolution, and I did not design to do so, but the discussion has taken a range so wide to-day, that I think some reply is required to some of the positions which have been advanced. It is now too late to go on with the debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would suggest to the gentleman that I forgot to renew the motion of the Senator from Texas, which I promised to renew. It is, that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until Saturday next.

Mr. DOWNS. I am indifferent as to the time.

The motion to postpone was agreed to, and, on motion,

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

SPEECH OF HON. A. P. BUTLER,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE SENATE, February 5, 1853,

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill for the protection of the emigrant route and a telegraphic line, and for an overland mail between the Missouri river and the settlements in California and Oregon.

Mr. BUTLER said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: We are engaged in the consideration of a bill of unusual importance, and it seems to be assumed, as I understand, that it is to be carried through this body and through the other House by the momentum of its own magnitude.

I listened, as I usually do, with profound attention, to the able and interesting remarks of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS;] but I must confess that when he announced that this was an enterprise without a parallel in the history of the world, and that therefore we were to disregard all the lights of example, experience, usage, and precedent, I felt somewhat astonished at the attitude in which the American Senate was likely to be placed, by being forced to adopt a foregone conclusion without the advantage of examination or the security of deliberation; in other words, to run all the hazards of a legislative experiment in reference to the greatest measure of the kind the world has ever known. To borrow the language of the Senator from Illinois, "a measure without a parallel."

The reason given by the friends of this bill, why we should not have such lights before us as are usually consulted in such cases is, because this is a measure whose magnificence puts at defiance everything that has preceded it, either in the Congress of the United States, or in any other deliberative body of the world. A measure, the success of which must therefore depend, more upon the chances of blind fortune, than upon the counsels of wisdom, or lights of experience.

Mr. President, I have been referred to more than once, and I appreciate the compliment, as one of the gentlemen who might have some constitutional difficulties in relation to this measure. I shall not indulge in a homily upon the Constitution. No, sir. I shall go directly to the merits of this bill; for, independent of all my constitutional objections, I shall be bound to oppose it on other grounds, such as have no doubt been well indicated by several other gentlemen. Then, sir, I come directly to the question, What is the bill? It is the boldest proposition that has ever been brought before this Legislature for a system of internal improvements. I give my friend from Texas [Mr. RUSK] credit for his intrepidity. I say it is the most undisguised proposition which has ever been brought before the Congress of the United States, looking to a system of internal improvements. What, then, are the provisions of the bill upon which this proposition is founded? Let me analyze them.

The bill proposes to construct a road from the Mississippi valley to some point on the Pacific ocean; and how? The President, as I understand it, is to indicate the termini at the Mississippi and the Pacific, and also the mountain passes through which the road is to go; and then he is to employ engineers to fill up the intermediate space by reconnoissances, or to make such examinations as may be satisfactory to him. What next? After the President shall have performed this function of saying where this great channel of commerce shall run—of having imposed upon him powers so extraordinary, and such as, in my opinion, do not belong to the Executive branch of the Government, or ever was before conferred upon any American President—we are required to divest ourselves of all legislative jurisdiction and control over a measure involving the abiding destinies of this Confederacy, and perhaps of the world. It is to be taken from the sphere of our legislative judgment, and to be transferred to the exclusive will and discretion of the Executive—a proposition heretofore entirely unknown in the history of federal legislation. It is, Mr. President, in my opinion, a precedent of fearful import.

So much as to the mode of locating the road. Now as to the means and agencies to be employed for its accomplishment. They, in my opinion, as I shall show, are equally unprecedented, dangerous, and unwise. What are they? Why, sir, $20,000,000 are to be supplied directly from the Treasury, to be paid out under the terms and conditions of the bill, which in practice would be mere parchment provisions, to be dispensed with, if need be, by an appeal to legislative liberality. Besides this amount, small as it is in comparison with what it will be in the progress of the work, we are to give alternate sections of public land, equal in amount to about twenty millions of acres, and much more as many believe. Thus we shall have contributed, at the very COMMENCEMENT of the enterprise, means equivalent to $50,000,000 or $60,000,000, and this is but a small index of what may be the future demands upon the Treasury, under the auspices and favorable indulgence of an interested majority.

The next question is, what agencies are to be employed in the enjoyment, direction, and appropriation of these funds?

Why, it is to be a CORPORATION, to be invested with a franchise that may be of immense value, and certainly, in its exercise will it be one of great power. It is to be a body-corporate that may wield the influence of enormous wealth and acquire a title to a tract of country that may be regarded as an isthmus through the great West to the Pacific ocean, and thus unite under the influence of capital, two of the greatest sections of this vast continent, having the elements to increase and perpetuate its own power. It will wield the lever of modern times—money, money—and like the East India Company in the exercise of its immense monopoly of pecuniary power, may usurp the attributes of sovereignty. What security have we in the future against such a result? This corporation will have every temptation and inducement to comply with all the conditions of its charter, to enable it to assume the imposing condition which its wealth and political influence may give it, to become an "imperium in imperio." But it is contended by the friends of the bill, that by its provisions, it is subject to forfeiture for a noncompliance with the terms and conditions of the grant. Depend upon it, Mr. President, there will be no forfeiture if the franchise should prove successful and profitable, and it is evident that $50,000,000 will be first expended, before any contingency for a forfeiture can arise. After that, the corporation will still be under legislative favor, if they have acted in good faith. Recent precedents go strongly to show the facility with which Congress will bestow bounties to indemnify capitalists for any losses they have sustained, or may sustain. Yes, Mr. President, I have long seen that the Federal Treasury has become an insurance office, "to afford indemnity for the past and security for the future." In the event of the enterprise becoming wholly worthless, there will be no occasion for any forfeiture, for the corporators would then be willing to throw the enterprise upon the Government, to be carried on to completion by the contribution of unforeseen sums from the Federal Treasury, for which they, or new swarms of speculators, would be applicants. So that with a bonus of $50,000,000 or $60,000,000, or perhaps more, this chartered company, may embark in this undertaking, with more confidence of advantage, than of hazard, to themselves. They will begin with the contributions of the Government, and may well rely upon its guarantees in their future operations.

Since I have been referred to, as one that may have constitutional objections to this measure, I will present, by way of illustration, a proposition involving principles the same as those of this bill which many of the gentlemen, now advocating it, have condemned as opposed to party creed, upon the ground that it was subject to the same objections which I might well urge to it now. Suppose the proposition, once made, to construct a Federal road from Buffalo to this city, and hence on to New Orleans, were now to be revived, what would gentlemen say? Why, that it was opposed to the constitutional doctrines laid down in the Baltimore platform. Or, to make the proposition more germane to the subject, suppose the scheme was to be to extend the construction of this road from the valley of the Mississippi to the Atlantic. Gentlemen would then take party alarm, and cry out, that this savors of a general system of INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT, and violates the cardinal doctrines of the Democratic creed. In principle, the cases supposed cannot be distinguished from the measure under consideration, for this bill proposes, to make a railroad to run through two or more of the States, west of the Mississippi, by the direct appropriation of money from the Federal Treasury. The other cases referred to would propose to run a road of a similar kind through two or more States, lying east of the same river, having an Atlantic, instead of a Pacific termination. The difference, then, between these systems of internal improvement, is simply the difference between the words Atlantic and Pacific, unless the difference can be qualified, by the fact, that part of the Pacific road runs over territory, and that a desert, belonging to all the United States—a distinction that cannot avail gentlemen, unless they are prepared to give up conviction, or party professions, to the force of interest, and the temptations of sectional aggrandizement; to this complexion it must come at last. They cannot even lay the flattering unction to their souls, which seems to have sustained Mr. Jefferson, in his disregard of the Constitution, by the purchase of Louisiana, upon the broad doctrine of State necessity. Such a doctrine might afford a place of refuge for a virtuous and wise magistrate, acting under the duress of necessity, whilst it might become a dangerous hiding-place for selfish expediency or criminal ambition. Gentlemen do not pretend to plead this necessity: indeed, they cannot, for a communication with California can be now had, within thirty days, by the ocean and Panama route. And when a railroad shall be completed, at some one of the many points in contemplation across the Isthmus, it is very doubtful whether this one will have any advantages over it. In a commercial point of view, it is a common opinion that there will be none. These natural facilities of communication seem to have been pointed out by the finger of God, whilst this road to be indicated, without reconnoissance or survey, will be the work of guessing man.

Now, Mr. President, let gentlemen look at it. Is not this a measure of internal improvements, to be constructed by the direction and the means of the Federal Government?—not by the direction of the Federal Government, in its full meaning, but by one of its Departments—the Executive. It is but an illustration of many of the lessons of history, that doctrine, and principle, melt and crumble under the temptations of interest. Creeds and party platforms, are but as barriers of sand against the tide of power, and the force of local combinations.

Allow me to say, sir, that if we are to have a system of internal improvements to be commenced now, in disregard of all our party professions, I greatly prefer that it shall be devised by the Congress of the United States, looking to the general welfare and commercial regulation of all the States of the Confederacy, rather than to such a partial system of improvements, and commercial regulation, as have in many instances been committed to several of the States. Here, sir, I allude to the donation of public lands to several of the western and northwestern States, for the construction of railroads, and cutting of canals. The mere donation of such lands as gratuities, would be objectionable, as a partial mode of disposing of the public domain. But that is not my main objection to this policy. My objection is, it allows the States receiving such donations to make selfish regulations of commerce, not only for their own benefit, but for such as may operate to the prejudice of other States. To illustrate: I might consent to place a staff in the hands of another, under certain circumstances; but not when I know it is his design use it against myself. Self-protection is the first law of nature.

A single State, or one or two States acting in combination, under the influence of local and sectional interest, might yield to the temptation of making adversary diversions of commerce. For instance, the lake States, to make communication through the lakes, to the great sea-ports on the north Atlantic, whilst Congress, representing all the States, would have every inducement to make commercial regulation to subserve the interests and preserve the equality of all the parts. I do not admit, however, that in such regulations of commerce by Congress, that I could expect equality in the appropriations of money for such purposes. All that I mean to say is, that a general system of internal improvements, emanating from the common council of the Confederacy, would be preferable to partial and disjointed regulations of a few of the States, frequently having inducements to make their channels of commerce adversary to others.

Mr. President, we are standing on the threshold of an eventful future. We are about to embark upon a system that will swallow up all others, and will increase the tendency of this Government, once a free confederacy of Republican States, to become a consolidated empire. We are departing from old landmarks, and entering upon a boundless wilderness of unknown powers, without chart and without compass. We are committing our destinies to the discretion of irresponsible legislation, instead of allowing it to be controlled and protected by the obligations and the guarantees of a written and once-respected Constitution.

I fear, Mr. President, we are approaching a period in the history of this Government, when we shall have to escape from abuses and dangers by revolution, instead of resorting to reform, under the dictates of justice and the prescription of acknowledged forms of Government. But in all this, I know, sir, I have not the sympathy, much less the support, of the majority of this body. I shall therefore spare it the ungrateful task of listening to any discussion of my constitutional opinions on this great and often-considered subject. I acquit myself to the country by referring it to the opinions of the greatest statesmen who have adorned the Republican school of politics in this country. If the opinions of Jefferson, Madison, Tazewell, Crawford, Randolph, Hayne, Rowan, and other distinguished Democratic Republicans, are to be disregarded, mine may not be expected to have any weight upon your deliberations. No, Mr. President, I have lived too long, and seen too much of the predeterminations upon subjects of this kind, to enter upon discussions that are regarded as the stale notions of our ancestors, under the tide of what is called PROGRESSIVE DEMOCRACY. Yes, sir, I have seen enough to convince me that the machinery of this Government, in its actual operation is stronger than the Constitution. The law of progress has superseded the law of the Constitution. I was reminded by a friend, no longer than last night, of the futility of resisting what is called the progressive tendency of the age. I was asked the question, Will you continue to think with your ancestors? I will give the same reply to you, that I gave to him: I am willing to obey the law of progress, for we would not fulfill the great designs of Providence, if we were to oppose it. But to conform to that law, as I would have it observed, it must be regulated by wisdom, freedom, and justice; otherwise it becomes rash, slavish, and aggressive—running into the doctrine, that "might makes right." Under the influence of this law, as I have heard it so often interpreted upon this floor, conservative restraint and guidance, are looked upon as stupid impediments, restraining the wisdom and suppressing the genius of YOUNG AMERICA.

In looking at all nature, I find there are salutary vetoes upon the unrestrained energies and impulses of progress. No nation, or great people, ever attained security, and greatness, by a disregard of these wise lessons, and a disregard of them, even in our own history, characterized as it is by such wonderful developments, would be like Apollo giving up to Phaeton the reins of the horses of the Sun. It is a law to be conducted very much as the concerns of society are, under the impulsive energy of youth and the restraining, wisdom of age.

I once heard my venerable preceptor, Dr. Maxcy, when I was a young man, preach a sermon that struck me with great force. The occasion was upon the death of a young man, remarkable for his energy, gallantry, and every quality calculated to address itself to the favorable consideration of the youthful. In that sermon he said it was well for young men to die, for if the great machinery of this life were committed to old age alone, with all its timid wisdom, society would become stagnant. The impulsive motive power of youth, combined with the subdued wisdom of old age, was necessary to carry on the great concerns of society. Yes, sir, one is just as necessary as the other; and he remarked that if you were to commit the whole concerns of the world to youthful energy, without the restraints and the controlling wisdom of age, you would make a great mistake. It would be a profane opposition to the laws of the universe, as regulated by the wisdom of Deity.

Shall we trust this law of progress to the judgment, I would rather say the decision, of an unrestrained majority, having no other control than the wisdom of its discretion, and the policy of progression? Those who are for trusting alone to the impulsive energy of progress, may sow the seeds of the storm and reap the whirlwind. I have not more caution than other men, but surely I may be permitted, at least, to appeal to conservative principles and the spirit of the CONSTITUTION to save us from the dangers of acceleration, and the consequences of transgression.

And now, so far from my suffering the Constitution of the United States to restrain this great law of progress, I say that it ought to have been consulted, and its expansibility ought to have been developed, in order to embrace everything that would accommodate it to this law of progress. Sir, the Constitution within itself contains the very element of self-existence—the provision of amendment. Have you amended it? Have you not practically disregarded that provision which allowed the Constitution to expand with the progress of events? Let this be answered; there stands the Constitution a dead letter, in many respects, I will not say in all. You have not expanded it by the wise interposition of the Legislature, allowed by the instrument itself, to amend it according to the exigencies of the change of human affairs. But what have you done? I intend to speak boldly, and freely, and fearlessly, before the Senate upon that subject. If I had the eloquence of Cicero, I might pay a decent tribute to the memory of the Constitution; but I could not restore it, no more than he could restore the life and virtue of the Roman Senate, over which he wept in such strains of eloquence as have survived Rome itself, and given immortality to the memory of the violated institutions of the Commonwealth, as it existed in the days of its primitive purity and simplicity, and before they were tarnished by Augustan casuistry, or imperial pollution. The Constitution has not been amended and expanded to accommodate itself to the progress of events. But what has been resorted to to supply that wise provision? CONSTRUCTION—a construction like India-rubber, that accommodates itself to the interests of those who choose to avail themselves of the Constitution, whenever an advantage is to be gained by any measure. And COMPROMISES where there is no provision of the Constitution. I say, deceptive and dangerous compromises, to be violated whenever there is a temptation to do so; and platforms, deceptive, fallacious platforms, to whip parties into harness, and to keep them there, and scarcely for any other purpose. These are the miserable expedients that have been resorted to to supply the place of amendments to the Constitution. If I am to be reproached because I appeal to the spirit of that sacred instrument, allow me to say that I have been doing more to preserve this Union, and the integrity of the institutions of this Confederacy, than those who blindly obey the aggressive spirit of progress. Progress, left entirely to legislative discretion, is a law without limit or certain direction, and must vary according to the fluctuation of the times and the temptations of men. It is as easy to obey it, as to float with the current, but would be as unwise as to follow that current without knowing over what cataracts it may fall. It would be like committing the vessel to the wind, without rudder or compass. To make it safe in a political point of view, it "must have a right direction, and be kept within constitutional limits."

So much upon that general subject; and I say now, without going into the constitutional discussion, that this bill, in principle, if it be correct, allows you to appropriate money to any extent for a system of internal improvements anywhere and everywhere. Gentlemen cannot get over that proposition. I repeat it, that they may understand it. It is to appropriate money from the Federal Treasury for a system of internal improvements. To be sure, this is an internal improvement through Texas, or Iowa, or Arkansas, and California. But if you can go through one State, you can go through ten; and if you can appropriate $20,000,000, you can appropriate $500,000,000. If the principles of this bill be admitted, there is no limit at all to the system of measures, that can be accomplished by the appropriation of money by this Government. In doctrine, it is but a prelude to other measures of the same kind, such as the establishment of an Agricultural Bureau and a National University, both of which have been made the subject of public meetings and popular declamation.

Having made these general observations, I come now to the specific provisions of this bill, and I intend to deal with it with gloves off. I say it is premature, undigested, and experimental; and I think neither of these three propositions can be very well denied. It is premature, because we do not know where the road is to run. It is undigested, because we have had no survey, no reconnoissance, no means of intelligence to enlighten our legislative judgment, and it is experimental, for the want of these data. I know it is very convenient to transfer a legislative judgment to executive conscience; but I say we have nothing to guide our legislative judgment. Have we any reconnoissance, any survey to enable us to say where the road shall run; how high this or that mountain is which has to be passed? I heard an able engineer, no longer ago than last week, say that the great difficulty in this enterprise was the want of water along the route from which to make steam; and he said that unless Ericsson's discovery of caloric, as a motive power, could be brought into requisition, it would be a doubtful proposition to undertake to carry a steam car from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean, and surely no one will dispute the wisdom of this remark. That is one of the difficulties that may exist. I do not say that it will exist, because I have heard it said that if you will give an engineer money enough he will go anywhere. Only give him money enough, and he will make all obstacles vanish. But when we, within our sphere of legislative judgment, have the option to say which of four or five routes is the best, are we to be deprived of that privilege? Now, suppose three corps of engineers should be required to survey this route, and come in, and not leave it to conjecture, but demonstrate that there would be water upon one route, and that upon it the road could be built for half the money that it would cost by the other routes, should I not have a right to make a choice? Am I to transfer my legislative judgment upon this subject to the Executive? Am I to avoid the responsibility, and throw upon him a duty with which, in my opinion, the Constitution of the United States never intended to invest him? It is, therefore, I say again, premature, because we have not this survey and the knowledge to guide us.

It is undigested, I undertake to say, to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] because its provisions are conflicting in many respects, and because it resorts to agencies heretofore unknown to Federal Legislation. I know it has been said there was no more objection to employing a corporation to carry out the plans and policy of the Federal Government than there was to carry out the policy of the State governments. If gentlemen of the Republican school have a mind to break down all the old defenses, and say that the Federal Government has the plenitude of sovereignty that the States have, then he is entirely right. But if we act under delegated powers, they are inalienable, according to any doctrine of trust, and we have not the right to transfer them to anybody, but must discharge them ourselves.

Again: I have said that this is an experiment. How do I know that this road can be built? Perhaps it can be: But have I such satisfactory information as would authorize me to go on, and lay out a road in the way prescribed by this bill, when I have an option to choose what may prove a better? If it is demonstrated that I can have a better route, will you deprive me of the opportunity of selecting it? What has taken place here? There have been three bills presented—one by the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] who has delivered a speech upon it, which I do not intend again to compliment. Another bill was proposed by the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] and the one now pending has been reported by the honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. RUSK.] The second bill is said to be better than the first, and the third better than the second; perhaps a fourth may be introduced to-morrow better than all. But it is said that we are not to wait to have one better than this—that we must avail ourselves of the temptations of opportunity; and if we do not come and make the experiment by a trial of this bill, we can have no measure; that is, in other words, we cannot wait ten months for a great enterprise of this kind. I say ten months, because I suppose until the next meeting of Congress there will be no great difficulty in getting to California overland through the different routes at present in use; and I doubt very much whether the route by water is not better than any one by land can be. There is no great necessity why this measure should be pressed just at this time. Because it is of such immense magnitude, are we to forego the opportunity of making the ordinary investigations which regulate prudent men in the management of their own concerns? I know, sir, that zeal sometimes has delusions as well as its salutary consequences; but in the zeal which some of these gentlemen have manifested, I am very much disposed to think that they overlook the graver counsels, the surer and wiser dictates of prudence and wisdom. I have a great deal of confidence in the suggestions of time and experience, and I have some tolerable reliance upon the lights of science. But all those are to be disregarded, and an experiment is to be made. I say, therefore, that this measure is premature, undigested, and experimental, and should not be carried out.

Again: What right have we to transfer to the President the power of deciding between the different routes? I live in the State of South Carolina, upon the southern Atlantic sea-board; and though this road may not confer any immediate advantage upon that section of country, I must be permitted to say that I have a great interest in the location of it. The southern Atlantic States have a deep interest to know where its termini shall be, and I want to have a voice upon it when the different plans shall be brought here for decision. I have no idea of parting with that power. I have no idea of giving the President authority to regulate commerce by making a road wherever he may think proper. I am not willing to give to the President the irrevocable power of fixing the route for a great channel of commerce, and a highway for the transportation of passengers, or a military road, as you may think proper to regard it, anywhere upon the Mississippi, from its source to its mouth, to anywhere on the Pacific. This is the greatest margin of Executive power that has ever been allowed upon any paper projet. It may be said that he will exercise it well, because he will be President of the United States. I do not say it invidiously; but I must say that the Senate has not been free from the operation of capitalists—not that gentlemen have suffered their ears to be polluted by anything like a direct proposition to sway their judgments; but capitalists have influenced public opinion, and capitalists have made their way to the Legislature of the country, and capitalists have influenced the judgment of the Legislature. The President of the United States, virtuous as I know him to be, cannot see, cannot guard the avenues of capital. Sir, the invasions of capital are irresistible. Capitalists are not going to advertise you that they want you to vote for this or that project in which their interests are involved, for this reason: They are men of talent, and they employ men of talent, and the avenues to the President's judgment on this subject will be thronged by legion. I have seen Executive officers attempt to guard themselves against undue influences in the application of the power of pardon, but they could not do it. And if this measure is carried into effect, you will subject the President to influences to which no one human being ought to be subjected. You subject him to all the fair and to all the sinister influences of talent and of capital; and what is more, you require the President, blindfolded, to take the statement of engineers and scientific men who may be under the influence of capital. Could we guard against it? I do not know that we could; but there is something very wise in the instincts of interest; and perhaps after different propositions shall have been brought before this body, each one of us may elicit something, or make satisfactory explanations, so as to bring the truth to bear. Furthermore, if I were to consult the dictates of prudence on this subject, I would have three separate independent corps of engineers, who should be bound, if possible, by an oath not to confer with each other, but to have separate surveys. And if they should concur, there would be some assurance that the route they recommended would be practicable, and such as would commend itself for adoption; and if they differed, they might give us the reasons for their difference, and we could investigate and decide for ourselves. Therefore, I oppose this measure on the broad ground that I have assumed, and I oppose it upon the still higher ground that it is enlarging Executive power far beyond what I think a vigilant legislature should allow.

I come now to the next objection. What is the agency to be employed to accomplish this great enterprise? Why, we are creating an immense corporation; to which we are to give, at the beginning, forty, or fifty, or sixty millions of dollars. And what then? If the enterprise be prosperous, they enjoy all the profits, restrainable only by this consideration: That Congress retains, by one of provisions of this bill, a potential supervision to this extent, that "Congress may, at all times, 'regulate the tolls to be charged upon passengers 'and freights, so as, with an economical man-'agement of said road, not to reduce the profits of 'said company below eight per cent." According to this provision, Congress cannot reduce the tolls beyond a certain minimum, but may allow them to run up to any amount; and who supposes for a moment that Congress will ever interpose to reduce the profits of this corporation? With a profit of thirty or sixty per cent., and wielding an influence perhaps of hundreds of millions, the company can always fortify itself against Congressional interference. So far from Congress ever interfering, either to forfeit this charter or to curtail the profits under it, if the company goes into successful operation, I make the prediction it will not even refuse to renew the charter when it expires. The company will have all the elements of perpetuity. Its own success will increase the duration of its existence.

I know it is said that we can protect ourselves and produce a forfeiture. As I have already stated, I have not the least idea that we shall resort to forfeiture. The corporation will go on with our money as long as it lasts. The first fifty miles will be finished from Memphis, or somewhere in that neighborhood. The company will get the rich land which lies there. The company is entitled to take land six miles on each side of the road through the States, and twelve miles on each side where it runs through the Territories, making a strip of twenty-four miles through the Territories.

Mr. RUSK. They only get the alternate sections for twelve miles on each side.

Mr. BUTLER. I know that, but as soon as the company get the first section, they will quickly take the other.

Mr. RUSK. That is not the bill, though.

Mr. BUTLER. I was not going to allude to that; but one thing that I wish to allude to is the beautiful phraseology of this bill. It is the most accommodating phraseology that ever I saw used. It allows the company to select land in alternate sections for certain distances on each side, and if that land should be occupied, or should not be fit for the purpose, where do you suppose they are to take it? Adjacent lands? No, sir, not adjacent, nor lands within fifteen or twenty miles, as other companies have been restricted to; not in this State or that State, this Territory or that Territory; but at any point, or at any distance too that may be deemed by the company the nearest, leaving to them to decide the question of distance. In this selection they have a wide margin of choice. They may even go to one hundred, two hundred, or for aught I know, one thousand miles to take up their lands; and I very greatly fear their determination of this matter of distance will depend in no small degree upon the quality and value of the land.

Mr. RUSK. They are to select those lands at the nearest point.

Mr. BUTLER. But five hundred miles may be the nearest point where they can get good land; and you may be sure they will select the best land they can find, and instead of selecting lands that are worth $1 25, they will take lands worth $10 n acre; and if they cannot get land along the line of the road, they may go off into Oregon or California; and I will answer for it, when they come to the nearest point to get it, they will find the nearest point to be just where they can find the richest oases.

The Senator from Illinois, the other day, said this extensive, wild desert was interspersed and enlivened and refreshed by many oases. Perhaps when this route should go into operation, we may have something like another Palmyra—a city of merchants and factors to distribute from these oases the goods which have been carried from different points. But unless we have something of that kind, I say it is impracticable. Still, I may be mistaken—it may be practicable. But is there nothing in a great enterprise of this kind which should induce us to wait until at least we give posterity a chance to exercise some of the rights which we are about to usurp? It is said that we owe it to California. Why, sir, if California continues for ten years to increase as rapidly as she has done within the last two, instead of helping California, we shall have to call upon California to help us. If California goes on multiplying in strength and resources, as I hope she will, she will carry on her commerce as she has done heretofore—by ships—by going across the Isthmus of Panama, or going through this contemplated canal across Tehuantepec, when it is completed.

No, sir. The communications with California are increasing in their facilities. These facilities will be improved, as we have every assurance, by more than one route across the Isthmus of Central America. The competition for these routes is a guarantee that they will be opened, and that, too, in a very short period, making the time of the passage between New York and San Francisco not greater than fifteen or twenty days. And besides, there is another view of this subject. These routes will be open to the enjoyment, and will invite the commerce, of all the world, and thus add to the revenues of this Government; and will possess none of the attributes of a monopoly which belong to a company.

I am not a merchant, and therefore I make the assertion with caution; if I were an underwriter to-morrow, and this road were made now, as by volition, from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific, I would much sooner insure goods to go round by water than to cross upon this land route, unless it should be built up with cities, and these rich lands, so much spoken of, should be found for the promising settlements that seem to have excited the imagination of some of the gentlemen who have spoken upon the subject, and whose imagination have imparted an interest to those lands far beyond their real value. All accounts of the engineers who have passed over them, concur in one common statement—that a large proportion of the lands over which this road must pass is a desert, and unfit for the habitation of man. Some portion is said to be an arid, sterile, mountainous range, without water and without grass, resembling more the description of the Dead Sea, than that given to it by the eloquent Senator from Illinois. All the richness they have, I fear, is what they have received from effusions of rhetoric—their poverty is the gift of nature.

This road itself is, thus far, very much indebted for the favor it has received, to zeal and eloquence. They have poured out upon it the first steam it has ever received, and I trust the last, until we have received better information as to the choice of routes and general practicability of the whole scheme. Yes, Mr. President, I will repeat, that thus far parliamentary eloquence and conjectural estimates have superseded all other agencies heretofore resorted to, for the laying out and construction of railroads. They have superseded the surveys and maps of engineers. They have made conjecture better than facts; for it has been gravely said, if we wait for a survey the road will never be built, and thus we are required to commit ourselves by way of experiment, as the surest way of involving us in this great enterprise. Are not such questions as these, Mr. President, pertinent? Is there a sufficiency of water, on any of the routes thus far brought to notice, to supply the steam for the propelling power of this road? Some gentlemen have said, that if water would not be found on the surface, it would be found by digging into the earth. Another question: Have we any survey of the height of the mountains? No, sir, we have not. But the broad ground is taken, that with money enough all these difficulties can be overcome. Yes, sir, the Federal Treasury is to supply water, level down mountains, and provide all the other agencies that may be necessary for the construction of this great road. I wish to be understood, that I do not take the ground, that some road may not be practicable, for it has been said, if you will give an engineer money he will go anywhere; and under the light of science, which is now blazing out from so many sources, I do not know that there are any physical impossibilities in the way of the genius of man. Developments are making that will even supersede water or steam as motive agents. The facilities of communication, from one part of the earth to the other, seem to keep pace with the demands of man.

Here allow me to say one thing in reference to what fell from my honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] yesterday, and he said it with a philosophical turn of thought, that I admired at the time. He said that it seems, in the great providence of God, that the facility of communication from one country to another has kept up with the progress of discovery. The ancients thought the Pillars of Hercules the ultima thule of the earth; but no sooner was the compass discovered than Columbus found America; and scarcely had America been discovered, when the means of establishing a communication between it and Europe were found. Scarcely had that been effected, when this great power of steam, to which the honorable Senator alluded, came forth, and it may be reserved for another power to carry us over dry lands. It may be that the discovery of caloric, as a motive power, is one which will enable us to fulfill that beautiful providence of God, that man shall not be a stranger to man, if he consults the great principles of science and truth. It may be that this motive power will supply the place of steam, and that we can go to the great Pacific ocean by the aid of fuel alone, only requiring water to supply the wants of man. I say it may be so; but when we urge these things with too much rapidity under this doctrine of progress, let me tell gentlemen that there is danger in the temerity of acceleration. You have no right to anticipate for posterity what perhaps posterity may accomplish with the lights before it, when it shall be properly called upon to act, and undertake to say, with an arrogance that may be regarded as somewhat presumptive, that you can do it better than it can do for itself. For myself, I prefer trusting the ordinary method of getting round to California in thirty days by steamship navigation for some time yet to come, than to rush headlong into the field of wild experiment.

And in any point of view, if my vote is to have any influence over the measure, and I am forced to vote for one route or the other, I wish to have some latitude in my choice. I do not wish to be compelled to give a decision upon one route alone. I want light. I want the information of scientific and practical men. With the light at present before me, I am not sure that I would not select several routes in preference to this one. But upon that subject I do not commit myself, and for a very obvious reason, that I may not have the boldness other gentlemen have exhibited of their readiness to leap in the dark. My notions are illustrated by the familiar remark made concerning children: "they should crawl before they walk." This bill reverses that, and assumes that the child can run before it can crawl. It is Young America, out and out.

I have seen in a book of heraldry, ambition, represented by a serpent crawling up a smooth column of dangerous and difficult ascent, the dangers increasing with the progress of the ascent, and with these significant words issuing from its mouth: "Sat cito si sat tuto." This is applicable to more passions than ambition, and inculcates a lesson of wisdom and caution.

There is another provision of this bill to which I wish to draw the attention of the Senate and the country, and that is the eleventh section. It assumes that Congress not only has jurisdiction over the subject of internal improvements, by the specific provisions of any particular law, but an authority to restrict States, and Companies from the right of making railroads, except in subordination to its authority. For fear I may do injustice, I will here insert the section itself:

"SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That Congress may, at any time hereafter, authorize individuals, companies, or States, to form a connection between said railroad and any railroad or railroads under their control, respectively," &c.

This making a State tributary to, or dependant upon a corporation, of Federal creation, is a blow upon the rights of the sovereign States of this Union, to which I shall never give my assent, and in my opinion, that alone is cause enough to seal the fate of this bill.

I have thus intimated some of my objections to the amendment introduced by the honorable Senator from Texas. I may be asked what course I would recommend in relation to this great policy. I am under no responsibility to give any opinion beyond the subject before us, and the specific one on which I might be required to cast my vote. The first question, then, occurs on the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, looking to the information to be acquired from a survey and a reconnoissance, before any route shall be selected. I think it competent for Congress to seek this information, and as it seems to be assumed that sooner or later a road must be constructed, I think it, therefore, wise and proper that we should have all the information on the subject. Besides, in another point of view, it may be necessary as one of the means of fulfilling our obligations under the treaty with Mexico, that we should have a military road through the territory lying between Texas and California. Whether that will be necessary or not will depend very much upon the information to be gathered by the survey contemplated in the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. And what may be the kind of such a road must depend upon the same information.

If, in good faith, a road for military purposes, looking to an actual state of war for its employment, I could well justify myself in that view of the subject, to vote for any road to subserve the ends contemplated; and whether a railroad or any other kind of road, would depend more upon the purposes in view than upon anything else. I now speak of a road running through the Territories of the United States; and if such an one should be a highway for passengers or a channel for commerce, there would be no objection to it, because it may be used for more purposes than one. According to the views of the honorable Senator from Illinois, no military road, such as the one proposed in this bill, will ever be necessary in times of peace; and whether I can regard it as a military road, for war, must depend upon information and a conjuncture of affairs which has not yet been presented to my mind.

But the fact cannot be disguised, and ought not to be, that this road is intended to open a commercial communication between California and the Mississippi river. It is a road for the benefit of some of the States of this Confederacy, and by money to be contributed, and by a charter to be conferred, under the Federal Government. It may be that if we have full information, such as might be procured under the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, no such road as the one proposed here would ever be built, or one of a very different character, and liable to fewer objections. This survey might be regarded as no more than an exploration, which is fully warranted by precedents.

Mr. President, I have thus in a cursory manner thrown out my views, both upon the measure itself and many of the topics that have been brought under discussion in connection with it. I have appealed to the spirit of the Constitution of our forefathers. I have referred to the authority of great names. I have intimated the dangers of disregarding the provisions of the written Constitution. I have intimated the necessity of some amendment of it, with a view to accommodate it to the progress of events and the developments of the age. The worst of despotisms would be an irresponsible Democracy, left without restraint to consult the temptations of interest, or to be influenced by the excitement of passion. Some one has quaintly said "that constitutions and laws are deliberately made by the few when sober, to restrain the madness of the many when intoxicated." Republics may become as tyrannical, under an unrestrained majority, as any other form of government can be. Of all despotisms, there is nothing so dangerous as the dominion of an interested majority. It is said of the Roman people, that they felt themselves more disposed to indulge their freedom, because they knew they would be restrained by the veto of their tribunes.

Now, sir, what do I behold? This Government, once simple in its administration, and comparatively confined in its operation, throwing away all the restraints and disregarding all the limitations which gave it a proper direction and confined it within its proper sphere. It is about becoming, in my opinion, a Government of legislative discretion; to become an agency to collect the people's money to be distributed for any purpose that may be effected by the mere appropriation of money; and I fear, in addition, I may say that the President's veto can afford no security, and that his election is to be looked to as a mere prize combat for office. With these convictions on my mind, I want some greater security for the regulation of commerce, under a system of internal improvements, than the fiat of a majority—I fear a tempted majority.

If it were a new question, I would say as much. The great and paramount inducement for the formation of the Federal Constitution was to regulate commerce, by reconciling the hostile and conflicting legislation of the States upon the same subject. The great object was to have uniform rules and regulations applicable to all the States. And even this power thus to be conferred was jealously regarded in the Convention by the representatives of the rural and agricultural interest of the country, and until very nearly the close of the Convention there was a clause in the Constitution requiring a vote of two thirds to pass any measure regulating commerce, and that, too, by declaratory laws merely, and not looking, as the history of the country and the debates of the Convention show, to an appropriation of money for that purpose. The proposition to regulate commerce by digging canals or building roads was made and expressly rejected in the Convention. If the vote of two thirds, looking to the kind of regulation I have referred to, was required at that time, with fewer adversary interests involved, how much more necessary is it now, when preponderating interests have actually taken possession of the Government? They may be subserved, but it will be at a dreadful cost, if the Constitution has to be broken. I tell gentlemen, with deep sincerity, that I am, in reality, a better friend to the Constitution of this country, by opposing enlargements of power, than those who resort to them for temporary purposes. There is no danger so great as that which blinds us to the consequences of the future, and no right has any security unless it has the guarantee of protection.

The last resort which an intelligent people should make is to revolution for the vindication of their rights, and the greatest danger of such a resort will be a disregard of the organic law of existence. When it shall be ascertained that this Confederacy, in the name of its Union, shall have survived the Constitution of its existence, it deserves to perish.

THE HOMESTEAD.

SPEECH OF HON. EBEN NEWTON,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 15, 1853.

Mr. NEWTON said:

Granting portions of the public lands to those who will settle upon and improve it, has been for a considerable time an important question before the public mind, in all the various modes of thought, and discussed under all the various forms that public measures are investigated and public opinion formed, from the expression of individual opinion, the public press, and public bodies, up to the popular vote of the nation, in the character of its Representatives; and through all these various channels a very decided opinion has been formed and expressed in favor of the grant upon some terms and to some extent. No man who is an observer of the past, and thoughtful for the future, can fail to see and feel this fact, and appreciate its force and realize its universality. Individuals are sending up their petitions, the public press is raising its voice, and State Legislatures passing their resolves and instructions, now before our committee; and the public discussions in this body have gone forth over the nation, followed by a strong and decided vote, and that vote very generally approved. Yet the measure sleeps, and gives place to schemes and theories about Cuba, and others equally wild, that never can produce any practical result.

Is it wise to omit and disregard this measure and this popular feeling and public sentiment, visible wherever we cast our eye, turn our thoughts, or try our strength? Is it not wise to provide for and improve our own before we thirst for another's?—strengthen our own stakes upon our own soil before we plant them upon another's?—number and improve our own ranks before we attempt to supervise and invade others?—till and improve our own soil before we trample upon our neighbor's?

The vote given by us upon the bill we passed, is not sufficiently appreciated, or, in the multiplicity of subjects, passed over for an opportune future, that never comes without being crowded with its own cares. Each member in this body is supposed to reflect the views of the district he represents. There is no way the feeling of a nation can be so well known as by a vote we give, and its very decided character justifies me in the decided influence I give it. A proposition upon this subject, coming from the ever-vigilant sentinel who guards his favorite measure, is now before the committee of this House of which I am a member, and it appears to me to be difficult or impossible to give it any other notice than in the manner I now adopt.

The particular manner in which this grant shall be made, to whom, and in what quantity, so as I can secure an actual residence and improvement for five years at least, to me is comparatively unimportant. I would go far in securing and extending the right of preëmption and occupation, by which it might ripen into a perfect title, if improvements can be kept up; for the public lands are fast falling into hands where they will remain unimproved for half a century. But it is difficult to fix the mind of a great nation upon any particular plan in any general practical measure; and as one was, with much labor and very general investigation, agreed upon by us, and no time or opportunity now to present another, I shall apply myself to its provisions; and if it is deficient and inadequate, improvements cannot be made if action cannot be had.

In my estimation, this is the most important measure there is any hope of adopting this session. I wish to express my views while here, though they may do no good, for it may be some satisfaction to the people of the State I in part represent; they will be brief and confined to the subject. If I can be heard, I shall at least be better understood. These remarks will be applicable to various bills to be brought before us for action, in attempting to show the advantage this measure has over others now pending.

I am in favor of granting lands to actual settlers as a public financial measure, and as a private and individual improvement of the condition of the masses.

I propose nor advocate no change in the great laws by which property is acquired and regulated. We are yet a new country, possessing all the main elements of prosperity and perpetuity; a wise and liberal Government, founded upon the great principles of equality and justice; no privileged orders and classes, in which property can be entailed and enjoyed to the exclusion of the masses. Freedom to possess and enjoy is the great principle that animates and stimulates all to acquire and improve. The more general the acquisition of property among the masses, the greater will be the wealth, prosperity, and happiness of a nation. As facilities multiply and accumulate to acquire, acquisitions will increase, and improvements open new avenues of commerce and business, and greatly augment the general wealth of the nation and improvement of the people.

Our lands were acquired by the common struggles and effort of all, and of course are the common property of all. No one section or district can say to another, "We contributed most and have received least, and therefore claim a greater share;" for the laws that regulate it and us are so general and broad, that what one does or receives is the act of all, and for the benefit of all, and goes to augment the general fund—the property of all.

Our Government is one of the masses—made by them and for them. Property and honors are alike open and free for all to acquire and enjoy. It was not the design or object that it should amass and perpetuate wealth.

Wealth in the hands of the Government, as such, is corrupting in its influences and tendencies.

Our public land, through its whole history, has been a source of speculation and peculation. It has been a standing political hobby to ride into and out of power. Theories and schemes for its disposal and distribution have been leading articles in the creeds of political parties for the last twenty years. It has been the most fruitful source of political bargaining of any in the Government.

These influences and results having reached the ear and understanding of the great body of the people, they have cast about for some scheme by which to use the fund for the greatest advantage for the greatest number, and remove the temptation to evil. Our constant legislation upon this subject has kept the public mind awake and thoughtful, and in a condition to form correct conclusions as to the best mode of disposition.

Another great fact that has had its influence in this process of maturation is, that property has a natural tendency to fall into the hands of the wealthy, influential, and sagacious, and to leave the other extreme destitute and dependent. Any one who will look to the history of older nations, and observe the great extremes of wealth and poverty, can but see this truth.

The improvement of the condition of the masses in any country is the strongest tower of strength any people can possess, and it is that which there is the strongest tendency to neglect. The creation of wise laws that hold out strong inducements and facilities to the people to acquire a permanent home, should be the study of every American lawmaker.

To improve and elevate the condition of the unfortunate, the ignorant, improvident, and vicious, without uprooting any general laws, is a most worthy, politic, and laudable object with any legislator.

By our unprecedented growth and advance, our lands have been increasing over and above all our various modes of conveyance, and objects of bounty to the amount of nearly fifteen hundred millions of acres, extending to new, uncultivated, and uninhabited regions, to which our inhabitants are turning their attention. Here oceans, rivers, and lakes are to be improved and made subservient to the wants and interests of man. Civilization is to be extended by preparing the earth to yield her treasures in the great work. Any law that will incite and induce the settler to these lands, and to occupy and cultivate them permanently, or for a given number of years, will add greatly to the wealth and improvement of any country. All the statistics connected with their acquisition and transfer have been given by others upon this floor who have preceded me, and need not be repeated.

Two great facts will be admitted by all, for they cannot be denied. The one is, that it is desirable and advantageous to the country and the Government that our wild lands be more rapidly and extensively settled than they have heretofore been. The other is, that there is a surplus population in all our large cities that are not profitably employed for themselves and the country. Any great national measure that is calculated to produce the first, and at the same time remove the existence of a vast amount of wretchedness and misery attendant upon the existence of the other, has for its support policy and wisdom.

In all our new States and Territories, much remains to be done, and in many all is yet to be accomplished. The hand of the painter is but just thrown over them, and their undeveloped resources and future greatness but barely sketched. All the great bodies of water that surround and connect them together, now inaccessible or highly dangerous even to the most skillful navigator, much more so to the pioneer enterprise of a new country, must be improved.

The heads of your principal rivers are now the sepulchres of your dead, whose enterprise drove them upon their wild and unimproved elements, whose banks are strewed with the wrecks of their bold and daring adventures.

Roads are to be made, that link and bind together a great and enterprising nation. Churches, schools, court-houses, and all the details of civil life, are to be supplied. And how is this to be done? Is it to be by the nation in its aggregate capacity, by the slow and tardy process of holding up your public lands at a high price, and consequently holding on to them; or by means of citizens scattered over our territories, invited from the cities and scenes of vice and degradation, by wise and liberal laws to engage in this great and common enterprise?

If our lands thirty years ago were worth $1 25 per acre, every seventeen years this sum is doubled.

Every settler over the nation that takes possession of wild and uncultivated land, and subdues and brings it into cultivation, adds to the aggregate amount of the wealth of the nation; and as the number increases, in that proportion is the wealth augmented, and the means furnished to produce the results to which I have referred.

Our large bodies of lands that have been in market from ten to sixty years are not one third sold, and will not be, even by this bill, for the next thirty years; for there are but few among the many who will comply with its provisions and occupy until a title can be given. It is no ordinary undertaking to go and settle in a new country, with or without a family, and be compelled to remain and improve it for five years before a title can be given, and particularly for an American. No one will do it that is not composed of good materials to make a good citizen. Look at our scheme of giving a large quantity of land to those who would go and settle in Oregon, and see how few have gone. Scrutinize the policy of giving land to soldiers without requiring a settlement, and unqualified freedom to sell, and see where the land will be in ten years. I predict, and it requires no prophet to foretell, that it will be piled up in the hands of wealthy men and families and companies, and unimproved for a quarter of a century.

Land warrants, under the present laws, are articles of merchandise that are sold and hawked in the market as common chattels, at less than a dollar an acre; and what farmer will go in the old-fashioned way, with his money in hand, and enter Government land at $1 25, and settle on it, unless there is some way devised to counteract the prevailing policy? The truth is, the Government, by its laws and habits, has made it necessary to pass this law to counteract the influence and effects of laws already passed, in order to settle and improve the lands.

Review the policy of donating the lands to public institutions and incorporated companies, and reflect upon the effect it will have upon the settlement where the land is selected. From the course of business the owners necessarily lie by, while the settler improves and increases the value of their location. The actual settler will shun these localities because large bodies of the land are not in market.

The nation under the bill introduces an agricultural apprenticeship, and holds out strong inducements to the apprentice for stability, industry, and enterprise, that in five years may change the whole character and habits from a state of dependence and want, to one of independence and comfort.

Every settler has his influence to a greater or less extent, by his relationships and acquaintances, and he cannot fail to bring more or less with him or to him. Settlers invite wealth and capital, and from it improvements, public and private, spring up. Capital follows the settler with as much certainty as day succeeds night, and with the same certainty it is invested, when the occupant opens the light that discovers his pathway. Nature has covered our forests with the richest fertility now occupied with her productions, but she yields it all with gratitude to the call of man. She has filled the bowels of earth with the richest minerals, and all that is required to bring all to light and use, is to be preceded by the hardy axman and the skillful miner. You look over our new country from your halls of legislation, and behold the extensive forests and innumerable wants and privations, and barter and chaffer with each other as to priority of claims for bounty and protection; and we step in and offer you five hundred thousand hardy young men, inured to labor and fond of it, with ax and spade and pick, to mark and open the way for your railroads and other great thoroughfares, and will soon furnish means to build them. Which will the Government choose as the most efficient agent?

We have a more extensive and unprotected and unimproved border coast than any other nation, accessible to any and all enemies and rivals, however weak they may be. And it is against the prevailing policy of the Government to improve it directly. How shall it be done? The strongest and most potent agent is the settlement of the surrounding country, by owners of the soil, who would engage in the work.

Our new States and Territories stand to the General Government as colonies, the older members having become rich by improvement and patronage, with a surplus population, many of whom are anxious to embrace the provisions of this bill.

I believe, with this law, more land will be sold and money paid in ten years than would be without it. This idea I know will be regarded by some as Utopian, but of its correctness I have no doubt. Many who enter upon the land with a view of acquiring it, will be impatient of delay and to add to its value will pay the money and sell, and buy again. The sagacious capitalist, ever ready as by intuition for a good bargain, seeing the advantages the settlement has added to that which remains, will invest his money, and that, too, extensively.

The neighbors of the settler will follow his trail to his hut and buy in the neighborhood. The country will be more extensively explored, and favorable situations hunted up and bought, and others occupied under the law, and by the labor bestowed, the land enhanced in value, and afterwards abandoned before five years, and the improvements bestowed furnish new inducement to buy and invest money. Americans are restless and impatient and are constantly going and coming from place to place.

Every settler who goes to a new country, explores it, and discovers its resources and learns its wants to a greater or less extent, and the information he obtains is communicated, and from it, new enterprises are undertaken and extended.

No man by a course of reasoning and argument can demonstrate the extent and influence of any given improvement. When once it begins, it begets sympathy and influence and effects, and it widens and deepens and overreaches all our calculations, if it can be kept up.

All who are thrifty and prosperous are not very ready to perceive a reason why all men are not so, and impute some fault. But we must take men as they are, and furnish the materials if we have it, to make them what we would wish. Our country is unbounded in extent and resources, but we cannot use it and realize its value without men upon it; and in its rude state we cannot furnish them without some strong inducement. We are indebted for our high position and present prosperity to the reward we give to mental and physical labor. Our halls of legislation, professional skill, mechanic arts and agricultural products, all testify to and establish the fact.

Our proudest statue, that is to be a model for the world, was conceived by an untutored mind, forged in a hovel, and built by faith and reared for admiring thousands. The brightest gems are made from the rudest materials; the most exalted intellects are often culled from the neglected, and pointed to the road that is open and unoccupied, to the summit. Occupation is education, and education is capital. To multiply capital we must multiply occupants and occupation.

Under this bill, there is one condition precedent to a title being given, that is a powerful engine of improvement. This is the five years' occupation. Under it, the tenant or apprentice has a strong interest to improve, for at the end of the term a title is conferred with all the improvements made. It cannot be affected by any contingency, not even death, for that is provided for, and the title conferred upon him who represents the tenant by blood or affinity.

As this bill is, the alternate section cannot be selected, and it will soon be an object for some purchaser. Felling the timber in a new country is a most efficient agent to invite the investment of capital in its vicinity. Its agency is various and general. It robs the gallows and jails, diminishes poor rates, multiplies agents of defense and protection. It erects buildings, builds roads, and opens communication with surrounding inhabitants.

As the land now is, it is a source of speculation. Instead of multiplying farmers, it multiplies speculation.

As this bill is, you propose to change the fashion from speculation to occupation. Instead of holding the warrants as a basis for bartering and gaining, you hold the ax and hoe, by which to domicil and feed and clothe yourself and family; from being alone a consumer, you become a producer.

Those who have money invested in wild land, instead of fearing this bill, should be its advocates, for it certainly tends to increase their investment by improving and occupying that which surrounds theirs.

By the sale and appropriations of the products of your neighbor, the chance of selling your own is increased.

Those who oppose this bill because it appropriates all the land, are greatly mistaken, in my apprehension. By it but a small quantity will be taken; how much and in what localities, no one can tell. But from the difficulties and embarrassments that attend the settlement of all new countries, no one can rationally infer that it will be great enough to make it dangerous to any of our relations, or interfere with the prosperity of any localities.

The settlement of any of our new States or Territories for farming purposes has in no instance injuriously affected the old States. It has rather quickened and brightened the energies of the old to improve and keep pace with the new.

It is now very common to emigrate from new States to old. In new States property is heavily taxed to make the improvements that old ones have. In old States, new improvements spring up that give them the freshness of youth, and furnish additional employment for hands over new States. They have the advantage of roads, markets, schools, and other improvements, over new States.

Many of the older States have permitted their land to run down and become very cheap. This should never be. Land was not made to wear out, like man. It remains as the last thing to be destroyed. It is populated and depopulated from age to age, and if unabused, remains the same. These lands now furnish instances more favorable than any others for the enterprising farmer, for the culture of sheep and growth of wool, and will soon be sought after for this and other purposes. Manufacturing in the old States will, from policy and necessity, soon be much increased. They have nothing to fear from this bill.

This bill is opposed, because it is an unconditional gift. It is not so. It is a grant upon condition you occupy five years, and, as an incident, improve the country.

But the opponents say the Government will relinquish the occupation, and oppose it upon that supposition. The occupation is the vitals of the bill. Dispense with them, and it is subject to all your objections; with it, to none.

In this provision is the consideration to the Government, and the advantage it has over all other schemes, as a financial measure.

Every additional freeholder the nation has is an additional pledge and safeguard of its stability and perpetuity. The stability of the property adds to the stability of character. Each freeholder has something to guard and protect and improve. Nine tenths of the mobs in our country are composed of those who are not freeholders. Make land-owners, and you make towers of law and order. Multiply freeholders, and you increase virtue and sobriety, and decrease vice and debauchery. Increase freeholders, and you diminish your bills of mortality. Increase your freeholders, and you increase the strongest basis of wealth the nation has.

But the Government are the gainers in other respects—by the amount of improved lands added to that now occupied, and also the products drawn from it. Suppose, in five years, one hundred thousand take possession under this law, and each one each year subdues and tills two additional acres, and raises from each acre three dollars in value, how much would this amount to annually? But the incidental and relative value they throw around them is greater than the direct and immediate product. All this is in addition to what would have been produced without this process. Again: new settlers soon present themselves and their property in a situation to help bear the burdens and expenses of the Government, by paying taxes and contributions.

That the bill is a private and individual advantage, seems to be admitted. If it is a public benefit, it is also a private; for the interests of the public and of individuals are so intimately connected they cannot be separated. Improve the one and you improve the other.

It is said by the opponents of the bill, "No one will embrace its offer that is not able to buy and pay for the land." I know it is difficult for a thrifty man to see a good reason why a poor one cannot earn and save enough to pay a five dollar debt; but the fact is so. You place before him a motive; find a plan for him; encourage him, and he can pay a hundred easier than he could the five while no object stimulated him. It is said, the bill will have no influence upon the population of cities. I think differently. Many who have been unfortunate in business, and those out of employment, will embrace it. They may not all hold out and perfect a title. The attention of our whole population will be turned to it. It will be talked of and discussed; and the location of the lands, the geography of the country, its capacity, her products, and facilities for commerce will all be more studied and generally understood. Our mountains are filled with the richest minerals, as various and multifarious as the wants and capacities of man; their rocks are fertilizers; at their base flow majestic rivers upon which to manufacture and transport their treasures. Our valleys are covered with most luxuriant vegetable growth, enriching themselves annually from age to age with their own resources and surrounding deposits, and preparing for the hand and mind of man. All that is wanting to bring all into use, is to be sought and found, understood and appreciated.

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES COOPER,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE SENATE, February 18, 1853.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill for the protection of the emigrant route and a telegraphic line, and for an overland mail between the Missouri river and the settlements in California and Oregon.

Mr. COOPER said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I do not rise for the purpose of continuing the debate on the subject of the bill which is now pending before the Senate, at any great length; nor do I design to follow the honorable Senators who have advocated the bill, through the long labyrinth of questions of a character entirely foreign to the objects of the bill, which they have raised and discussed before the Senate. I will not follow the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] in his inquiry whether peace or war be probable in Europe, or whether, in the event of a war, the United States is likely to be involved in it. I will not inquire whether Cuba, in a military point of view, is an important acquisition for the United States, and necessary to its safety. Nor will I indulge in vaticinations of what the present generation is to see in the character of the improvements of the country. I do not know, sir, how many roads will span the continent from ocean to ocean at the end of the existing generation. Nor is it pertinent to the issue that is now pending before the Senate, whether one or more shall follow this one which is now in contemplation. Nor will I pursue the traces of my honorable friend from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH,] and inquire whether it would be competent for England or any belligerent Power, with a single privateer to lay San Francisco under contribution and conquer from us our Pacific possessions. Nor will I indulge, sir, in ante facto encomiums upon the incoming President. I shall rather trust to my acts than to my words, to show that my course of conduct towards his Administration, when he comes to be installed into power, will not be a factious one. Sir, I regard it as unsafe, altogether unsafe, to venture upon any great laudations of any officer in advance. Sir, even when they are indulged in, in the case of friends on whom we have bestowed the most extravagant encomiums for their wisdom and patriotism, we are oftentimes disappointed. We ought, therefore, to fear somewhat to indulge in such encomiums as these upon those who have not heretofore merited by their conduct, very extensively, our approbation. But these are foreign questions, and I shall not pursue them.

Mr. President, I stated in the casual remarks which I had occasion to make some days ago on this subject, that my opposition to this measure was not founded in hostility to a road between the Atlantic and Pacific sides of the continent. I avowed then, and avowed in a spirit of sincerity and candor, my approval of some great line of intercommunication of this kind; and my objections to this measure were founded upon the fact that it was to be commenced without a preliminary survey and reconnoissances, and because if it were completed, the company would possess powers that would make it inconvenient to the operations of the Government, if not eventually dangerous. Now, sir, I have other objections, which I will state in the course of the brief remarks which I propose to submit.

We were told by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] in the remarks which he made some days since, that if the opponents of this bill had examined it with care and a proper degree of candor, (that was the word,) they would have found that the reconnoissances were already provided for by the bill; and the Senator proceeded, by inference, to show that such reconnoissances were provided for. Yesterday, in the course of the debate which took place, another advocate of the bill, [Mr. SMITH,] more ardent, more enthusiastic, if we may judge from his manner on the occasion, admitted that there was no provision of that kind; and he justified his position, upon what ground do you think? Why, that the reconnoissances and survey would require more time than to make the road itself. That was the position which the Senator from Connecticut took. One gentleman tells you the bill provides for reconnoissances and surveys, and another tells you it would be foolish to make them, because it would take as much or more time to make the reconnoissances and surveys than to build the road. That was somewhat extravagant; and allow me, who generally follow that Senator almost blindly in whatever course, political or otherwise, he chooses to pursue, to doubt in this case whether his usual sagacity, if not to say his usual candor, was not wanting. I am, then, having no one to follow, obliged to grope along and find my way by my own miserable rush-lights.

Mr. President, is it no objection to such an enterprise as this, that preliminary reconnoissances and surveys have not been made? We are told by Senators who are the advocates of this bill on all sides, that this in unnecessary. We are told that Captain Sitgreaves, Major Emery, and Professor Bartlett, have traversed these wastes between the western limits of what was formerly the United States and California, at various times, and that they have pronounced opinions favorable to the practicability of such a route as this. The honorable Senator from Tennessee told us that hunters and trappers had penetrated these wild wilderness wastes, and that they too had expressed opinions favorable to the practicability of a route between the waters of the Atlantic and those of the Pacific. Are not these opinions, expressed by men under circumstances such as these under which those men expressed them, rather unsafe to act upon when a measure of such immense magnitude—"magnificence," as the Senator from Connecticut said yesterday—is in contemplation? Why, sir, in your State and in mine, [Mr. MANGUM in the chair,] although every foot of the ground within their limits has been traversed, and has been known for almost a century, who would undertake to make a road from the Atlantic waters upon your coast to your western border without a preliminary survey? Would it be enough that you, in your carriage, or upon horseback, had traversed for the last forty years the country between the remote points? No, sir; it would hardly be deemed sufficient by wise and prudent men to induce them to embark in so great an enterprise; one, however, comparatively insignificant when compared with this.

In my own State, from Philadelphia, on the Delaware, to Pittsburg, on the Monongahela, every foot of ground has been known for a century, for it is about a century ago since Washington first traversed it on his expedition to Fort Duquesne. Every foot of that ground is known and has been traversed thousands and tens of thousands of times, and every hill and every valley between those two points were filled with an intelligent population at the time that the great system of internal improvements in that State was commenced. But we did not embark in it without a reconnoissance and survey, without having every foot of it leveled, and the practicability of the work demonstrated. We knew that it was practicable. We knew that money, if plenty of it were expended, would conquer the intervening obstacles between the Delaware and the Monongahela, and although we embarked in it hastily and improvidently, as after facts demonstrated, yet we did not think it safe to begin until surveys and resurveys had not only demonstrated its practicability, but its practicability at no unreasonable or extravagant cost.

Now, if this be so in States almost every acre of which has its inhabitants; if it is necessary where every foot of ground is known, where the condition of the climate and the obstacles which nature has interposed with almost absolute certainty, that reconnoissances and surveys should be made, how much more so, when you have to traverse a continent in which the foot of civilization has not permanently fixed itself? It is true that many have crossed the continent with wagons, on horseback, and on foot, and they are satisfied that it is possible to get from the Atlantic borders to the Pacific; but, sir, when you embark in an enterprise which is to cost millions of dollars, when you propose an expenditure in land and in money, of forty or fifty millions of dollars, ought you not to know first if the route is practicable without unreasonable and extravagant delay? In the second place, ought you not to ascertain whether it is practicable to furnish the motive power which will be necessary, and fuel in order to keep it in motion? All these things require not only to be ascertained to be possible, but to be practicable, and within reasonable limits of practicability. Sir, it is not enough that the trapper or hunter, with his traps or his rifle, has penetrated from one ocean to the other. It is not enough that Lewis and Clarke, and their successors in adventure, have followed the meanderings of the mountain valleys from one coast to the other. They must show us how, where, at what cost this great work can be done before I shall be willing to embark in it. Is it not necessary, sir, that we should know something of the grades, how much elevation is to be overcome, and how it can be overcome? Is it not necessary to know with some accuracy the distance? Perhaps that may not be so necessary. If any of these things be unnecessary, that perhaps would be because distance is but a simple thing.

We have been told by travelers, and it remains uncontradicted to the present hour, except the speech of my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] may be considered a contradiction of it, that there are wastes extending hundreds of miles in which there is not a stick of timber, scarcely a blade of grass, or a drop of water. From what we know of the ability to propel locomotive engines at this day, I would ask how are cars and great railroad trains to be carried over such wastes as those? Sir, I doubt exceedingly, if fuel be not found in greater abundance than it is believed to be in those wastes, that a railroad will be found to be practicable on that account. If coal shall be found of a quality such as would be proper for consumption in the propelling of the machinery necessary for this purposes, that obstacle would be removed; but at present we do not know whether there is coal, or whether it is to be found in quantities sufficient for that purpose. Now, is it not the part of wisdom that exploratory surveys should be made for these purposes; that geologists should be sent to examine the country, and to ascertain whether those wastes indicate the presence of this kind of fuel? for if nature has not provided for traversing those wastes in this way, by beds of fuel being found in them, in no other way has she done it, for wood, which is used in many places for that purpose, is not to be found there.

I think that I have now demonstrated, by simply stating the difficulties, that there is some necessity at least for preliminary explorations of the country between the western limits of Missouri, or Texas, and the Pacific coast.

My honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] said that these wastes were not much better in the quality of their land than the State of Georgia, and that they would not yield much more corn or many more potatoes to the acre perhaps than the soil of Georgia. That was jocular, of course. The Senator did not intend to assert that these wild wastes, which produce no blade of grass, through which no stream of water passes, are equal to that fertile State, or are capable at all of supporting human life. That was not his object. It was a jocular expression of his, intended to meet statements perhaps equally extravagant. I may be permitted to say, on the other side, that is one of the reasons why I object to this road.

We are told that it is practicable—that we know it to be practicable. I do not deny that it is practicable to make a road, and to make a road at grades that can be traversed, between the two points. But that is not enough. We are to look to those other conditions to which I have just now referred; that is, the practicability of supplying fuel, not merely for ten years, or for a century, but for all that indefinite time in the future, during which this great Republic is to live, continually expanding until in the folds of progress the whole world shall have been embraced. Are we assured of the existence of those conditions that should be precedently understood? No, sir, we are not.

We ought to know something of the probable cost of this enterprise. We are told that the bill fixes the limits that the Government is to extend; that those limits are embraced in the $20,000,000 which are to be given to the company for the construction of the road, and in the twelve miles of land on either side in alternate sections extending from the east to the west. The bill, we are told, fixes that amount, and it cannot go beyond it. I know it does fix it, but there is no security that you will even stop at the end of that expenditure. Far less extensive enterprises than this have been undertaken; an entering wedge in the shape of an appropriation to begin the work has been given, and Congress has been induced afterwards to spend millions before the work was completed. We have had some experience in our steam lines. We commenced by giving those lines of intercommunication between the Old World and the New bonuses, sums of money to enable them to start their great enterprises; and presently, when the appropriation failed, they come here, appealing to our patriotism and our pride of character as a nation, and they have induced us to double the appropriations and continue them from year to year. They forced themselves upon us as beneficiaries, and they will remain our beneficiaries as long as they possess the power of appealing to the sentiment of pride which inhabits the bosom of every American; and while they can bring outside influences to bear upon the two branches of the National Legislature, such as are within the command of these companies. You, sir, have seen it, and I have seen it. You have felt it, and I have felt it. I do not mean that influence has been exerted upon us, but we have felt it in the atmosphere, and we knew it was useless to resist it. Stimulated by what I believe exists as strongly in your—and if I were not a modest man, I would say, to some extent in my own—bosom, patriotism, and a disposition to see our own marine eclipsing in speed and all the essentials of maritime excellence, that of Great Britain, we have voted thousands upon thousands, and hundreds of thousands, to keep up that supereminence of our marine. Give this corporation $20,000,000, give it fifteen million acres of land in alternate sections from the Atlantic to the Pacific, or from the starting point to the Pacific, and with what kind of an influence will you have clothed it at once? I shall be told directly that it is not a corporation. I do not care whether it is in terms clothed with corporate powers or not. To all intents and purposes it is a corporation, and one with the most fearful powers that has ever existed in the world, or which ever was about to exist. It does not exist yet, and I hope in God it will not. I say, sir, that clothe this company with the power and influence which it will derive from commencing this work, and the expenditure of a portion of these funds, and see where you will be as to ability to resist further applications. Helpless, absolutely helpless; tied hand and foot, and driven perforce to all such expenditures as may be necessary to the completion of the road. This temptation, as my friend from Connecticut called it—and it was an admirable word—in the shape of $20,000,000 in money, and $20,000,000 in land, with the profits in the distance, will glitter in their eyes, and great companies will be congregated for the purpose of carrying out this vast project. All portions of the country will rival each other in endeavoring to reap the advantages of this magnificent temptation which is held out. And, sir, when Maine and Florida—when Pennsylvania and the other sea-board States unite with the far West, through those who will embark in this enterprise, in pressing Congress to make new appropriations, do you think Congress will have the power to stop it? No, sir.

I say, then, that there is no certain limit to the expenditure in this bill. There is no knowing, according to it, what expenditure Congress may not be called upon to make. Then, when it is probable that in the end all will be shouldered upon us, ought we not to know in advance, from a preliminary survey, what is the probable amount which we shall be finally compelled to pay? It seems to me that statesmanship, the commonest wisdom that actuates individuals even in relation to their domestic economy, should induce us to look at least for information to satisfy us upon this point. I do not know what others think, but I know that is my impression.

I have stated that there has been no corporation in any country which would possess such powers as these under this bill. Gentlemen have told us not to deal in round assertions, and I will try to deal as little as possible in them. I said in the course of the remarks which I formerly submitted—and they were exceedingly brief—that Fox's East India Company did not possess powers and influence so enormous as would be conferred by this vast amount of money and appropriation of lands upon this company. I was somewhat called to task about my historical knowledge on that point. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] told me there was no similitude between the one and the other—between that corporation and this. I did not say they were alike. I should have been a fool to have said so. Their objects were entirely different; they were not at all the same; nor did I say that they were the same. I only spoke of the character of the powers, and said that the powers here given were greater, and that the influence which the company would be able to exert would be greater than that company, under the provisions of Fox's bill, would have been able to exert. The gentleman himself, or from the promptings, I believe, of a gentleman who sat by him at the time, said that Fox's bill gave to the East India Company the power to make war and conclude peace. Sir, the Senator was entirely mistaken; Fox's bill did no such thing. Long before Fox's bill was thought of war had been made by the company, and it had conquered provinces extending from Cape Comorin to the Himalaya mountains—an extent of territory larger than all the British possessions elsewhere in the world up to that moment. Originally the East India Company was a mere company of traders; but powers were conferred upon it from time to time, and it made war, conquered provinces, and when it was called to an account for it by Parliament—and that was why I produced this measure for the purpose of comparison—it had power and influence enough in the country to scout at the objections which had been made to the policy which it had pursued. Warren Hastings was impeached, as you, sir, very well know, for his conduct; and although he had violated all the laws of his country and humanity, the company had influence enough to screen him from punishment. I believe he deserved well of England in many respects, and I never found fault with the British House of Lords for their decision in that case. I was only referring to the great powers that such great companies possess. It was with this view that I referred to Fox's East India bill. The East India Company had extravagant powers conferred upon it by the act of 1773. It has gone on under those powers making war, until finally it has become clothed—or, if not the company, those who are under the control of the company, and who have managed in India all the concerns of the British Government—with power to make war at their pleasure, always dictated by the company, and also to establish the terms of peace. That is what I alluded to.

These were my principal objections: first, that a preparatory survey ought to be made; in the second place, that the powers conferred upon this company were of a character to induce apprehension in the eyes of those who have looked to history to see how such power has been exercised and abused. We have been asked to point out how a power of this kind could be abused. Sir, it would be very hard to point to the specific measures that a corporation might pursue; that would be very difficult, but it is not difficult to see that, having such a power as this, it would exercise it, as all companies founded upon pecuniary considerations do. Is it not natural, that possessing power to coerce the Government into such measures as would be necessary for the increase of its grandeur, its wealth, and its dignity, it should exercise it? All other companies that have existed in the world have done so.

Sir, our friends on the other side of the Chamber used to be terrified by a monster which had its den in my own good State—the bank of the United States—and they supposed that with its capital of $35,000,000 it had it in its power to break down and trample under foot the liberties of the country. Have men grown better than they formerly were? Are there any indications in the moral world that men would now be less likely to abuse great power conferred upon them than they would ten, fifteen, or twenty years ago? No, sir; I see no signs abroad, in the political or moral heavens, that indicate a change for the better in that respect. Sir, are the powers that are conferred here of a character which would be likely to permit of an unwholesome exercise, such as in the case of a bank? In my judgment they permit of greater abuse. I have seen, in a neighboring State, the influence of these railroad corporations. There are two or three railroads, not, perhaps, more than four hundred or five hundred miles in extent, and yet they control, politically, socially, and morally, the whole population of that State. They make and they unmake at pleasure. And let a railroad of this kind be built across the continent; let the company have at its command the transportation of the commodities of the whole eastern world, as you are told it will—supposing that fuel and everything else can be found in sufficient abundance to make the communication between the East and the West in this way practicable and easy—and what kind of powers will it possess? Unexampled in the history of the world. I repeat, I cannot particularize in what way it might affect the public interests; how it might eventually be used to the danger of the public liberties. There are things in the future which wisdom cannot foresee. It is not necessary that I should particularize, that I should, in short, do that which is impossible to be done; but it is enough to repeat, that possessing such powers as it will possess, and such vast pecuniary resources, it will use them as other corporations have used theirs, and it will abuse them as other corporations have abused them. There is nothing more certain than this.

But let us look at the question in another aspect; and in this view there is a strong objection in my mind. Let the eastern terminus of this road be Texas; let it commence in Texas, and be made across Texas. Let the other end commence, as the bill requires it shall commence, in California. Let it run eastward across California. You have then a road made through these two States, at the expense of the General Government. Sir, is that to be doubted? What good would the forfeiture be? You are told that if the road be not completed there will be a forfeiture; yet there is nothing in the bill providing for the way or the means in which this forfeiture is to be brought about. But, sir, forfeiture or no forfeiture, the road would be there, and the States through which it passed would have the advantage of this great outlay of money. Now, I call the attention of my southern friends, those gentlemen who are strict in their construction of the Constitution, to this. I do not think, I must say in all candor, that it forms a constitutional objection; but it certainly does give to those States advantages which the other States cannot enjoy. By the provisions of the bill, as you are aware, you are to commence the road at each end; and when fifty miles are completed, so much money and so much land are to be delivered over to those who have built it. We may very well suppose that they will proceed at any rate until the money and the land, or the principal part of the money and the land is exhausted; and by that time they will have finished the road through Texas, and finished it through California. Thus those two States will have this magnificent boon accorded to them at the expense of the other States, and without the slightest benefit to any of them. Now, sir, that, if not unconstitutional, is unequal and unjust, and I trust that Senators all around me will see it in that point of view. This, sir, is the third objection to the bill in my mind.

Sir, I shall not detain the Senate much longer; and I will only advert now to some of the arguments used by the various Senators who are advocates of the bill.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] tells us that there can be no difficulty about this road at all—that there are some twenty-five passes, through each of which a road might be constructed. If there be so many, we ought certainly to select the best. We ought to send out companies for the purposes of exploration, and to ascertain which of those twenty-five passes is the best. That I think would be the part of wisdom and judicious statesmanship; certainly we ought not to go blindfold into a work of such immense magnitude as this. My honorable friend from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] told us yesterday that he did not apprehend there was any difficulty from the snows—that he had learned that on the route between this and California, the snows were not much deeper, and the winter not much longer than in corresponding latitudes in the States. That is true, to a very considerable extent; but in the gorges of those mountains through which the road must pass, in all the northern latitudes, there will be found in those snows an insurmountable barrier during six or seven months of the year. I have it from authority not to be questioned at all, that very often, during the winter and spring months, the snows are found in those gorges and valleys between the mountains, to a depth of fifty or sixty feet, and lie to a very great depth until the latter end of May or June. That is not true of the southern latitudes; and in all probability this road will take a southern route. I will state here that I do not care a fig which way the road goes, or rather from what point it starts, north or south. It is entirely immaterial to me. I only desire that the best route shall be selected, and that over that route, if found practicable, and to contain all the conditions necessary to the safety of such an enterprise, in advance, a road shall be constructed.

Now, Mr. President, I think the arguments made use of against my colleague's amendment are not just, and that they condemn themselves. Yesterday, we were told by the Senator from Connecticut, that a hundred thousand dollars was nothing like sufficient for the purpose—that even a million of dollars would not be sufficient for this reconnoissance, and that it would take as long to make the reconnoissance as to make the road. It seems to me that that is no good argument against my colleague's amendment. If $100,000 be not sufficient, amend it and make it sufficient by increasing the sum.

We have been asked over and over again, if we were afraid to intrust the incoming President with the selection of the route? No, sir, I am not. I was not a supporter of that gentleman for the distinguished seat which he is soon to fill, but, sir, I never doubted his integrity; and thank God, I never, without doubting, assail the integrity of anybody. I believe his integrity would be sufficient for this, and I trust, for all the exigencies of the public service which he will be called upon to perform. But, sir, he has other duties than those of a surveyor. He has his Executive functions, which will require all his time and all his attention. And, sir, how is he to judge? Is he to traverse those inhospitable wastes which exist between the States of the Mississippi valley and the Pacific ocean? It must be done through the medium of engineers sent out for the purpose.

He cannot guess at it. He would not do it if he could. No, sir. I have confidence in him, if it were a duty pertinent to his position, and if he had information to enable him to act judiciously on the subject; but he has not. The mere books of travels, of which we have published so many in this body, form very poor criteria for the commencement of such a work as this. To acquire the information necessary to the commencement of such a work as this, he must have something more certain than these books, by which he will be enabled to judge as to which route to select. We are told that he must indicate the points in the mountains. All require the same kind of examination and exploration precedently by engineers, whether you begin at El Paso, or further north. It would not be very convenient to change, if it should be found out afterwards to be wrong. You ought, as is the case in every wisely-managed enterprise of the kind, to have a complete survey from one point to the other before commencing the work. Then, sir, if any incidental advantages which due experience furnishes during the progress of the work occurred, they can be made use of. But, sir, it cannot be that a work of this magnitude is to be commenced in this way in the dark.

I agree in many of the suggestions which have been made as to the value of this great enterprise of the Pacific railroad. I think it will be one of the most magnificent that human genius and human skill have carried out and perfected. But this is nothing to the purpose. It can only be thus magnificent, it can only add to the character and the grandeur of this country, by being what it ought to be—as perfect as possible. I therefore, in view of the character of the country, desire that this enterprise shall be undertaken upon such principles as will insure as much perfection as possible. If it be completed, it will be, as has been stated by my honorable friend from Connecticut, a grand and magnificent project—not a project, for it will have ceased to be a project—but a grand and magnificent work, placing us in that respect above all nations which have preceded, or which exist with us at present. I admit it; but I desire that we shall not disgrace American genius by hurrying forward into a great enterprise of this kind, and making it a miserable patchwork thing, when it ought to be one grand and magnificent whole, honorable to the skill and genius of the country, as it will be beneficent to the world.

Sir, for this reason, as well as for others, I am for having light before we act. Sir, I am sorry that I have detained the Senate so long as I have done; but I believed it was due to the vindication of the views which I had casually thrown out that I should state my opinions at length; and having done so, I yield the floor.

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

SPEECH OF HON. H. S. GEYER,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE SENATE, February 18, 1853,

On the bill for the protection of the emigrant route and a telegraphic line, and for an overland mail between the Missouri river and the settlements in California and Oregon.

Mr. GEYER said: Mr. President, the construction of a railroad to connect the valley of the Mississippi with the Pacific ocean has attracted the attention and commanded the approbation of the people of the United States for a number of years. Long before the acquisition of California, when our possessions upon the Pacific were bounded by the forty second degree of latitude, the popular mind had been earnestly directed to this great subject. At that time there was no division of opinion as to the pass of the mountains through which it should go. The South Pass being within half a degree upon our southern boundary line, was the only one deemed practicable, then within our territory. The will of the people was almost unanimously expressed, sometimes represented in primary assemblies, sometimes expressed through the medium of the Legislatures. Congress was implored to take the subject up. The people then not only believed in the necessity for the construction of such a road, but they felt that it was essential to their highest interests, political, social, and religious. Had Congress then seconded the voice of the people, one road would now be nearly or quite completed, and we should be ready to commence a second instead of spending our time in debating how long it shall be postponed.

With the acquisition of California came upon us new difficulties. Our line was extended to near the thirty-second degree of latitude. Several passes were ascertained to exist that were perfectly practicable, and then came up the difficulty which stands in the way of the execution of the work to this hour. Difference of opinion arose as to the pass that should be selected. The South Pass, which before had been approved by the almost unanimous voice of the people, is now in the judgment of some gentlemen unfit; and we are divided in opinion, according to the section of country in which we happen to reside, and from which we come. Every town on the Mississippi, from St. Paul to the Gulf, is contending for the terminus of the road. Every principal town supposes that it is entitled to that favor, and imagines that the evidences are conclusive in favor of its point as a terminus. The Senator from California [Mr. GWIN] attempted to meet these difficulties by furnishing a branch to each one of the States on the west of the Mississippi. That did not appear to find favor with the Senate. A Select Committee was appointed to take into consideration the whole subject. It had before it the various plans that had been suggested. One of them, which seems to find favor with the Senator from Pennsylvania, looked towards the construction of this road out of the National Treasury, under the superintendence of the National Government; another proposed to make a road by the intervention of a private company, to whom was to be granted a bonus in money; and still another proposed to make a road entirely out of the public lands. The committee has reconciled these difficulties by the proposition now before the Senate.

It proposes not to increase the patronage of the Government, or the duties which now devolve upon it, by committing to it the management of this railroad, organizing the Government into a sort of railroad corporation, for the purpose of the transportation of merchandise across the continent. That plan it rejected. At the same time the committee was aware that the work could not be executed exclusively by private enterprise and private means. It has, therefore, combined lands and money, by way of assisting any company that may undertake it; and although I do not entirely approve this bill, and it is not the plan which I would be disposed to favor, the experience of many years has shown me that a member must not always hope to succeed in carrying a favorite plan. There must be compromise on this as upon any other subject.

The multiplication of the difficulties has not decreased in the least the intense anxiety of the public that the road should be built; and now that it seems to be admitted on all hands that it is practicable, that it is essential to the public interests, that it is necessary to the national defenses, and indispensable in the time of war, I cannot forbear to express my astonishment that there is a proposition before us to postpone the execution of the work until some future day. If this work is found to be impracticable, it is because of the impracticability of Congress, and not because the work cannot be accomplished.

But it is said to be indispensably necessary that we should have preliminary surveys. The honorable Senator from Ohio tells us that the bill itself provides for that; and he states, and states truly, the question to be whether the location of the termini and general route of the road shall be made by the President or by Congress; but he says that by transferring it to the President, we abdicate the power of Congress. I was at a loss to understand his meaning until I heard the speech of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania. He requires a survey in order that the grades of the road may be ascertained, and its exact line laid down, and then that there shall be a specific direction as to the mode of construction; and unless Congress maintains its power over that subject, we shall be held to have abdicated it. Sir, I would ask that honorable Senator whether Congress abdicated its power when it intrusted to the President of the United States the selection of the plan for the additions to the Capitol? Whether Congress abdicates its power to raise and support a Navy when it commits to the President the construction of vessels for the public service under his superintendence? Are we, under the power to authorize the construction of this road, to superintend as a body of contractors composed of two branches, the entire operations on the road?

But it is said we cannot proceed without a preliminary survey; that we have not knowledge enough upon the subject; that it is necessary that a detailed survey of the line and grades of the road should be reported to Congress, and that Congress should then fix the termini and locate the route by an act. The honorable Senator inquires if Congress cannot now locate the road how shall the President do it? Sir, if Congress has not been able to locate the road in ten years, is it to be expected that it would be very prompt, when the bone of contention will be presented to them in the form of surveys of the different passes of the mountains and the grades of the road, to the different points on the river? Shall we not encounter the same difficulties that we have encountered all along? Do we not see it apparent now, that one of the sources of opposition to this bill is an apprehension that the President may select a point which is not the first choice of honorable Senators? Is there not a trembling anxiety upon that subject to which much of this opposition may be traced?

It is said that we propose the same sort of survey and examination by the bill that is proposed in the amendment. That may or may not be. What we propose is, that there shall be a sufficient examination, and that sufficient information shall be obtained by the President to enable him to fix the termini and the passage through the mountains. That is all the survey that is required. The amendment does not propose to limit the survey or the inquiry to particular points, but it asks for a survey and an examination which shall enable Congress to exercise its power so as to control the location of the road. But suppose that the surveys are to be of the same character and require the same time; we shall by the bill gain this advantage: that a question which we have found ourselves unequal to, will be decided. On all hands it is said that the incoming President may be trusted with a subject so momentous as this; and in my judgment—without intending any disrespect to either House of Congress—he would be more apt to decide it correctly than the two Houses of Congress will, when the surveys are brought in.

But the honorable Senator says the President of the United States will have enough to do in the discharge of his high functions without attending to the location of railroads; he will not have time to make an examination for himself, and he must depend upon the reports which are made by the engineers. And, I pray you, Mr. President, will Congress have time to examine the road for themselves? Will the members of either House feel it a part of their duty, or consistent with their high obligations, to absent themselves for the purpose of making a personal inspection? Congress will have to rely, as the President must, upon the surveys and reports that are made. Congress, then, will have more to do than the President. Congress will be embarrassed, as I have already remarked, by the conflicting interests of various sections of the country bordering on the Mississippi, nay, sir, the conflicting interests on the seaboard, and those who are interested in the lines of roads which now take a particular direction, whether north or south.

Another objection taken by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, is to the cost, which he estimates at $40,000,000. It is not $40,000,000 given away without an interest in, or control over the road; but it is $40,000,000 advanced in lands and money, to execute the work, retaining a control over the use of the road for public purposes. But, Mr. President, I imagine that the honorable Senator is entirely mistaken. He has described the country through which the road will probably pass, as a sterile waste, and yet he estimates it at a price for which choice lands will not sell within the organized States. He estimates it, at least, at $1 25 per acre. Permit me to tell him if the land is worth anything to the Treasury, its value will be given to it by the construction of the road, by the outlay of the capital of the company to make it, and it will not yield a dollar until the road is made. As the road progresses there will be settlements, and demand for the lands; but if you abandon the road, you have the lands worth nothing at all to the Treasury. But twenty millions, it is said, are to be appropriated. Twenty millions is the maximum. No more can be given under the bill. I would inquire of the honorable Senator whether he has ever estimated what is the cost of the transportation of troops and supplies in time of peace? It appears by the report of the Quartermaster General, that there were expended during the last fiscal year more than $2,500,000 in his Department. If he will compare that expenditure with that of years before the Mexican war, he will find that an addition is made in consequence of the posts that are not accessible by the ordinary means of transportation. Sir, before that war, all our posts on the frontiers were either upon navigable streams, on which transportation was easy, or within very short distances of them. Now, that which was a point of delivery before the war, is the point of shipment inland for eight hundred, or one thousand, and sometimes fifteen hundred miles. If we estimate the expenses of transportation in time of peace, we find that the Government will be indemnified for its money, if the road shall be completed, by the facilities of transportation. One million of dollars may be saved per annum, and a much larger sum in time of war, when you will have the regulation of the transportation by the terms of the bill. The bonds are to be at five per cent., yielding an annual income of $1,000,000. That sum, I will venture to say, will be saved in the single article of the transportation of troops and supplies. To that must be added, as was said by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] the transportation of the mail, which can by this means be afforded daily for a much less sum than it is now afforded semi-monthly.

But the Senator from Pennsylvania is mistaken in another view of the bill. He supposes that it either contains no limitation, or if it does, that Congress may be practiced upon at some future day to abrogate it. That argument does not cohere very well with that of the honorable Senator from Ohio, for he has informed us that there is more danger, in regard to that point, in the President than in Congress. We have the counter argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that although Congress can be trusted in the location of the road, and in the bargain which it will make for the construction of it, when it is made, influences may be brought to bear upon them hereafter, by which a much larger and unlimited expenditure may be made. If the Senator had looked at the bill carefully he would have seen that that contingency was not likely to arise, because the bonds are to be issued as the road is built by sections; and if there is a failure to construct any section of fifty miles, there is a forfeiture of all the work that has been done, and not another dollar, or another acre of land will go into the hands of the company.

Mr. COOPER. The Senator misconstrues my argument. My argument is, that although the amount of twenty millions was fixed in the bill, and the number of acres, though not fixed, is ascertainable by calculation, yet, if it became necessary, this company would have it in its power, by its pressure upon Congress, to obtain as much more as was necessary. It does not matter at all whether Congress is subject to such influences or not; it does not affect my argument at all. I may have been wrong, but if I was right in supposing that Congress was subject to such influences, my argument was good.

Mr. GEYER. The argument is one in favor of a dissolution of this Union, or at least of the incompetency of Congress. If a great and beneficent measure cannot be compassed, because we cannot trust Congress, we had better cease to legislate. Sir, I do not believe that any influences can be brought to bear upon a future Congress which cannot be brought to bear upon this. There are influences adverse to this measure. There are the roads across the Isthmus. There is the influence of the Atlantic cities, which want the ocean transportation, and which would be somewhat reluctant to erect a rival road. Why, even now we are so very solicitous to get a means of transportation across Tehuantepec that there is a threat of war. We are to seize it per fas et nefas, to get a line of transportation between the Atlantic sea-ports and the Pacific. We would prefer to go to war, and hazard all the expenditure of blood and money to which it would lead, and the calamities which it would bring upon us, than to give it up.

Another objection is, that we have not knowledge enough to commence the work; that we do not know enough of the country through which the road will pass. Sir, we know to a certainty that on this side of the Rocky Mountains there is no difficulty in the way. You may pass upon the line of the Red river, or the Canadian, or the Arkansas, or the Kansas, or the Platte, and that either of them will afford an easy grade is ascertained beyond all doubt. The only difficulty, and the only important fact to inquire into, is as to the passage of the Rocky Mountains, for the Sierra Madre is merely an extension of the Rocky Mountains or the Sierra Nevada. We have to ascertain that, and when that is ascertained, we know that the road is practicable. We know that it can be made of easy grade, except at the points I have mentioned; and therefore we are under no necessity for further information upon the subject, except to know what passes shall be taken, and where shall be the termini of the road, neither of which Congress is prepared to decide, or will be prepared to decide when they have the surveys.

Another objection to the bill is, that the work is to be committed to individuals, who, in consequence of its magnitude, will have a fearful power. Sir, when we look at the thirteenth section of the bill—which is all that it contains about a corporation—we shall see that its powers are very limited; more so than those of any railroad corporation in the State of Pennsylvania. The thirteenth section of the bill provides:

"That for the purpose of this act, the contractors, their associates and successors, are hereby created and constituted a body-politic and corporate by the name of 'The Pacific Railroad and Telegraph Company,' by which name they may sue and be sued"—

That, I take it, is not among the fearful powers which are so much apprehended—

"plead and be impleaded, and have and enjoy all proper remedies at law, and in equity, may organize and elect such officers as they may deem necessary, and have and use a common seal; they may also open books and issue certificates of stock"—

These are the specific powers; then comes a general one—

"and perform all other acts necessary to carry into effect the provisions herein contained."

There is the limitaton of the power of the corporation. To contend that that power may be abused, is to contend that no corporation should ever be created; nay, sir, that no trust shall be confided to any individual, for it is liable to be abused. But in this country we have no reason to apprehend any great abuse of power. If the corporation should exceed its powers, we have a judicial tribunal that will rebuke it. Its powers may be tested by the same law and by the same tribunal that our rights of property are inquired into. But it is to have these general powers only to carry into effect the provisions of the act. What are they? To construct a railroad of a gauge to be approved by the President of the United States; to construct it from one point fixed on the Pacific to another point on the Mississippi, it having not even the power conclusively to locate the road between the points. The location of the road is to be with the approval of the President of the United States. It is then limited as to the mode of construction, and the weight of the iron that it is to use. It is limited by the act itself to the objects contemplated by that act, and it has no powers but those which are necessary to carry the provisions of the act into effect.

But the alarm is in the name "corporation." The honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] intimated that within the States it was clearly unconstitutional, though with their consent, and of doubtful constitutionality, to say the least of it, within the Territories. I will not enter at large into the argument of the power of Congress to incorporate a body of men employed by them to do a work, under an acknowledged power under the Constitution; but I would ask the honorable Senator what is a territorial government but a municipal corporation? You have two bills now on your table, one to incorporate the inhabitants of the Territory of Washington, so called, and the other of Nebraska—municipal corporations with general legislative powers—an "abdication," in the language of the Senator from Ohio, of the power of Congress to legislate. Sir, if it be an "abdication" to intrust any person with the execution of a work for which it is in the power of Congress to provide, the Constitution has been broken at almost every session of Congress, from the time it was first signed down to the present day.

Mr. President, I did intend, when the subject was first introduced into the Senate, to have gone somewhat at large into the question; but I regret that we have spent so much time in the discussion of measures of less importance, that we have very little time to bestow upon this. I will not, therefore, at this late period of the session, trespass further upon the time and attention of the Senate but to explain some amendments which I intend to offer when I shall have the opportunity.

I propose to confine the operation of the bill, except as to the survey of the road and the termini, to the Territories; in other words, if the bill is amended, as I propose, the termini will be fixed by the President of the United States; but the provisions of the bill for the construction of the road shall be confined to the Territories. I then propose, that where the road is located through any State, there shall be a grant of alternate sections of land for the purposes of the construction, under the authority of the State, by some persons, or corporation if you please, authorized by the State. I propose to subject that road to the same conditions as are in the bill in relation to the gauge of the road, and to the regulations contained in the eighth section of the bill, which secures for the United States the transportation of its supplies upon the road. If this amendment shall prevail, it will strip the bill of the difficulties which have been made by some honorable Senators, and I hope will facilitate its passage. I propose to strike out all that part which relates to the action of a corporation within the States, and leave therein the management to the States. I will own here, Mr. President, that in making this proposition, there may be a little difficulty in that part of the State of Texas which projects west of Arkansas, but there will be no greater difficulty under the amendment than is under the bill. The bill provides for a grant of the alternate sections of the United States lands, of course, but there are three degrees of longitude belonging to Texas through which the southern route will pass, as it is laid down upon the map furnished by the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN.] Under the provisions of the bill, the company can get no land there. They must apply the money to the construction of that road unless they obtain a grant from the State of Texas; and so it will be if the amendment is adopted. The road there must be constructed by the means of the State of Texas. She will provide for her own grant of land, for she owns it, and the benefits resulting from the construction of the road will be hers, so far as it operates in an augmentation of the value of the land. But in a State through which the road may pass where there are United States lands, I propose to increase the appropriation, as some compensation for the burdens which will be imposed upon those who construct the road by the terms of the bill. They must conform their gauge to that which is approved by the President. They must use iron of the same weight, and they must be regulated by the general rules which are adopted for the regulation of the road through the Territories.

When I have the proper opportunity I will present my amendments. I have made these few remarks now to present my views upon the subject, and shall not occupy further the attention of the Senate.

LANDS TO RAILROADS.

SPEECH OF HON. H. H. SIBLEY,

OF MINNESOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 10, 1853,

In favor of the policy of grants of land for railroad purposes in the West.

Mr. SIBLEY said:

I have made several attempts, Mr. Chairman, during the last few weeks to introduce for proper reference and examination, "A bill granting the 'right of way and a portion of the public lands, to 'the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, and 'Iowa, and to the Territory of Minnesota, to aid 'in the construction of a railroad from a point op-'posite the city of New Orleans, to the northern 'boundary of Minnesota, with a branch to the 'Falls of St. Anthony." Owing to the arbitrary rules of this body, I have as yet been unsuccessful in my endeavors to place that bill in a position where it could be reported upon by the Committee on Public Lands, and it is with a view to discuss the merits of the proposition, and others of a kindred character, that I now ask the attention of the House.

While the new States lying east of the Mississippi have received more or less aid from the General Government in land grants for the construction of railroads, the immense region on the west of that river has been comparatively neglected. I am aware that Arkansas, Missouri, and Iowa, have severally been assisted in the same manner; but when the remote position of those States from the Atlantic is taken into consideration, as well as the fact that these newly-settled regions are necessarily less able than older and more wealthy communities to open great lines of communication unaided, it must be conceded that these grants are not commensurate with the requirements, either of the people themselves, or of the Government.

I shall very briefly advert to the argument so often and so triumphantly advanced, as well by eastern as by western men, in support of the general policy of granting lands for building railroads and canals through the public domain, as my principal object is to attempt to show that artificial lines of commerce in the distant west are absolutely requisite, not only to develop the wealth of those vast mineral and agricultural regions, but as a measure of strict economy on the part of the General Government itself, taking into view the state of the frontier, which it is the duty of that Government to protect and defend.

It is not only in the power of Congress under the Constitution, but it is binding on that body, as the custodian of the public property, to dispose of the public lands in such a manner as may directly or indirectly inure to the benefit of the greatest number of its citizens, so far as that can be accomplished without injury to any portion of the country. Mr. Calhoun gave the weight of his great authority in favor of grants of land by the Government to aid in works of internal improvement through the public domain in these words, in a debate in the Senate in 1848:

"And I doubt whether, in any case, either of a canal or railroad through the public lands, the United States would not be a gainer. To that extent I am prepared to go, be the road long or short. If it be long, you gain the more; if it be short, you gain the less; and you contribute in proportion to your gain." * * "Long since it was agreed that the grant of alternate sections was a fair contribution on the part of the United States, considered as a proprietor, and from which the United States would be a very great gainer."

Again:

"The Government, in my opinion, ought to be ashamed to allow their lands to be enhanced in value by the exertions and at the cost of a State, without contributing in some degree to bring about this result."

Surely, if the strict constructionist and eminent statesman, whose opinions I have quoted, deemed it incumbent upon this Government to aid its citizens in constructing roads and canals through its public domain, on the score of propriety as well as economy, we may reasonably expect those gentlemen who represent the Atlantic States to pause before they commit themselves against that policy. And may we not also appeal to those Representatives to emulate, to some extent at least, the liberal sentiments of Virginia, New York, Connecticut, and others of the older States, towards the West in the early days of the Republic? Then there were no apprehensions expressed lest the great valley of the Mississippi should advance too rapidly in all the elements of wealth and power. With expanded and patriotic views that embraced all portions of the country, every concession that could reasonably be required to enable the sparse settlements west of the Alleganies, to work out the high destinies of that rich and fertile region, was cheerfully granted. Under the benign influences of so liberal a policy, those infant settlements have extended and increased, until more than ten millions of freemen now inhabit the land which three quarters of a century since was a wilderness. It has been left for the older States in these latter times to discover that the General Government has heretofore manifested too liberal a spirit towards the West. Now the fiat seems to have gone forth, that henceforward Congress must not aid in making roads through its own domain, unless the Atlantic States receive an equivalent for their votes in favor of such measure, in the shape of public lands. Now, if a new State asks that the proprietor of large tracts of untaxed land within its limits shall contribute a fair proportion of the expense to make them accessible to the settler, it is met with the cry of "more land stealing." Now, if a grant of land is perchance obtained for purposes formerly admitted as right and proper in themselves, it must undergo the ordeal of the most bitter and unrelenting opposition from the Representatives not only of the original thirteen, but of other States which have heretofore profited by cessions of a like kind.

Have the members from the land States at any time banded themselves together to defeat appropriations from the public Treasury for the benefit of the Atlantic sea-board? Have they refused to vote for measures because they had reason to believe that the old States were particularly interested in their success? No one, Mr. Chairman, can justly charge any such ungenerous proceeding on the part of western Representatives. If they oppose the tariff system, which eastern manufacturers so fervently advocate, it is because the democratic sentiment of the agricultural States is overwhelmingly in favor of the doctrines of free trade. When they record their votes against the system of coast fortifications, they but act in accordance with the public sentiment of the country, which has emphatically pronounced against further great expenditures for such purposes, as antiquated and absurd. In short, you do not find them opposed to any measure introduced into Congress, simply because their own particular constituencies are not immediately interested.

This land question bids fair to create serious difficulties between the East and the West, unless Congress shall devise some equitable and just method for its settlement. The embarrassments involved in this subject should be met in a manner satisfactory to both parties or sections, by wise legislation, before they become, as they certainly will, if not disposed of, more aggravated and embittered in their character. The West will now be satisfied with grants of the alternate sections upon the great thoroughfares through the public domain to aid in the construction of railways and other works of internal improvement. Should these be denied, it needs no prophetic spirit to foretell, that in a very few years that concession will not be received as a sufficient indemnification to the people of the West, for all the toils and sacrifices they have endured in reclaiming the wilderness, and converting it into a fruitful field, and for protecting and rendering valuable your lands, without imposing any tax upon them. They will then insist upon more, and they will have the power, in both branches of Congress, to make good their demands. As a matter of public policy, therefore, no less than of justice, this vexed question of the public lands should be definitely disposed of by the enactment of a law by Congress, embodying the main features of those railroad grants which have lately been made, and which shall have a general application, whenever, in the opinion of the constituted authorities of a State or Territory, the wants of the people require new avenues of communication therein.

The financial affairs of the country are in a flourishing condition, and the present time peculiarly auspicious for railroad enterprises. Capital will seek investments in the great lines of communication between the remote points in our Confederacy. California and Australia continue to pour their golden tribute into the money circulation of the world, until there threatens to be a plethora of wealth everywhere. All kinds of stocks are unprecedentedly high in the market, and millions of treasure lies dormant in the banking establishments of the large cities, ready to be employed whenever opportunity offers. I repeat, therefore, that the present time is most propitious for originating the great railroad projects which are to bind together the different portions of the Union.

With these few remarks in connection with the general subject, I beg leave to dwell for a short time upon the features of a Pacific railway proposed to be constructed, also of the bill I seek to introduce, and of another upon your calendar, the three being intimately connected with each other. I have perused with much pleasure, Mr. Chairman, the details of the scheme introduced by an honorable Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] for uniting the waters of the Pacific ocean and the Mississippi river by means of a railroad. That such a communication must be made very soon, no one can doubt who reflects upon the necessity that exists for its immediate construction, and the favor with which the project is received in all parts of the country. The integrity of the Republic may depend upon that great link in the chain which is now wanting to complete the union of our eastern and western extremes. There may well exist an honest difference of opinion in Congress as to the best mode to effect that desirable object, but it is to be hoped that the whole energies of the nation may be devoted to bring the work to a speedy conclusion, and in a manner the least calculated to entail future evils upon us, by the creation of huge landed monopolies.

The proposition of the Hon. Mr. GWIN embraces several branches of railroad connected with the main trunk from Memphis, Tennessee, to San Francisco; these branches to terminate severally at St. Louis, Missouri; Dubuque, Iowa; New Orleans, and at Matagorda Bay, Texas, and a western branch to terminate at Fort Nisqually, in Oregon. He estimates the distance from Memphis to San Francisco, by the valley of the Red river and Walker's Pass, at two thousand miles; and the aggregate length of the branches at three thousand one hundred and fifteen miles—in all, five thousand one hundred and fifteen miles; and that an appropriation of ninety-seven millions five hundred and thirty-six thousand acres of land, which, at the minimum price of the public lands, would be equal to $121,900,000, be made by the Government to construct these four thousand four hundred miles of railroad, (excluding the Texas branch,) assuming that the cost would not exceed $27,700 per mile, which, according to Mr. GWIN's statement, has hitherto been the average of the railways already built. This is indeed a gigantic project, and requires to be weighed well before it becomes a law of the land. In my judgment, the main trunk should first be constructed, (the termini to be at the most favorable and convenient points,) without embarrassing the scheme with the proposed lateral branches. These will follow in course of time, when the requirements of commerce and of travel shall demand these additional aids.

Another route to the Pacific, which seems not to have received much attention in the discussion of the question, and which must sooner or later be resorted to for a railway communication, is that from the head of Lake Superior to Puget's Sound, in Oregon. The distance between those places, diverging at one point to avoid the North Fork of the Missouri river, is only one thousand four hundred and ten miles, while the country, so far as it is known, is remarkably favorable for railroads. Two single ranges of mountains are alone to be traversed, and the passes through them are probably more practicable than those by any other route. The lower extremity of Puget's Sound, and the head of Lake Superior, are in almost precisely the same parallel of latitude, not far from 46½° north, so that the course between them is directly east and west, save where the curve would be required, as I have before stated, to avoid two crossings of the North Fork of the Missouri river. The passage of the first mountains once effected, the valley of Clark's Fork of the Columbia river presents the most eligible track for a railroad, down to the defile through the western range nearest to Fort Nisqually, on Puget's Sound, which is doubtless the best terminus on the waters of the Pacific in the Territory of Oregon. It may be objected that the snow in those high latitudes will impede or prevent the passage of railroad cars for some months in the year. To what extent this is well founded, I do not pretend to know, but as the snow decreases as we proceed westward, there is, in my judgment, no more reason to apprehend difficulties from that source than on the other proposed routes to California, which must necessarily traverse the Rocky Mountains proper, the Sierra Nevada, and the Coast Range, some of which are covered with perpetual snows. Whatever may be the facts in the case, a glance at the map must convince every man that the route on the parallel of 46½° north is far less mountainous in its character, and the distance at least five hundred miles shorter, than by either of the others contemplated. It should be borne in mind, also, that ships bound from San Francisco to the East Indies run up the Oregon coast for several hundred miles, that being the most direct course, so that so much of distance would be saved by enabling those ships, on their return trips, to discharge their cargoes at Fort Nisqually. The overland trade will naturally seek the most direct route from New York, the commercial metropolis of the Union, to the Pacific ocean, and the one which will diminish the distance between that city and the great ports of commerce in Asia, a thousand miles or more, must eventually, if in anywise practicable, be preferred above all others. It is highly desirable that proper explorations of a scientific character should determine the relative merits and demerits of each of the proposed routes, and I trust that Congress will at this session authorize such to be made.

The line of railroad from Pembina, in Minnesota, to New Orleans, will, when constructed, bisect any or all of the contemplated routes from the Mississippi to the Pacific, and add much to the commerce which will be carried on by their instrumentality. The region to be traversed is, of all others on this continent, the most favorable for such an enterprise. There, you have neither mountains nor hills to penetrate, but a continuous, level prairie, with few interruptions, invites you to open a line of communication north and south, through nearly twenty degrees of latitude of your own territory, which, in point of fertility and mineral wealth, has no equal in the world. This immense region is now accessible to the settler only at a few points, remote from each other, where the western rivers pass through it to join the Mississippi. The distance from Pembina, in 49° north latitude, situated on the Red river of the north, to a point opposite New Orleans, by a direct course, is fifteen hundred miles. By adding twenty per cent. for necessary deviations and deflections, the length of the line of railroad between them would be increased to eighteen hundred miles, of which five hundred and ten would be in Minnesota, two hundred and seventy in Iowa, three hundred and fifty in Missouri, three hundred in Arkansas, and three hundred and seventy in Louisiana. The contemplated branch to St. Anthony may be safely estimated at eighty miles—thus making the course of the railroad in Minnesota five hundred and ninety miles long, and the whole distance one thousand eight hundred and eighty miles. To aid in the construction of this great work, my bill proposes that there shall be granted the alternate sections for ten miles on each side of the road, which would give to—

Minnesota	3,776,000 acres.
Iowa	1,728,000 "
Missouri	2,240,000 "
Arkansas	1,920,000 "
Louisiana	2,368,000 "
Making together	12,032,000 acres, which, at the present price of the public lands, would be $15,040,000, the amount of the contribution of the Government towards the accomplishment of this grand object, second in importance only to the Pacific railroad enterprise.

Taking into view, however, the fine quality of the soil through which the road must pass, it may safely be presumed that three dollars per acre would be received for the granted sections, as a general average, so that the sum of $36,096,000 would be the yield from that source. Thus far the cost of railroads in the United States has been $27,300 per mile, which would make the whole cost of construction of the main trunk, and the St. Anthony branch, $51,324,000. But from this may well be deducted twenty-five per cent., if not more, in consideration of the peculiarly favorable character of the country, (precluding the necessity for deep and expensive excavations, unless at a very few points,) and the abundance of materials to be found everywhere along the line. It is true, that the item of bridges over the numerous tributaries of the Mississippi, should not be overlooked in the calculation of the cost.

Imagination can hardly depict the magical effect which the completion of this work would have, in developing the resources of the West, and in adding to the aggregate wealth of the nation. The valuable fisheries of Lake Superior would be increased in a tenfold ratio, if a market was thus opened to the South. The pineries of Minnesota and Wisconsin would send forth, annually, their inexhaustible supply of building materials to the valley below. The iron, salt, and coal, of Missouri, and the copper and lead of Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota, could be thereby exchanged with advantage, for the products of the "rich and sunny South." The immense tracts of public land for scores of miles on each side of this proposed railroad, now without a purchaser because of their remote position from the water courses, would be taken up at once by an industrious and enterprising class of settlers, admirably calculated as the whole of that region is for the support of a dense population.

There are other considerations involved, Mr. Chairman, in favor of the speedy completion of this contemplated work. The magnificent Mississippi and its principal western tributaries, are not to be depended on for purposes of navigation throughout the year. At the north, during the winter months, we are ice-bound, while in the summer, except in extraordinary seasons, the low stage of water embarrasses us in our intercourse with the southern Mississippi States. The obstructions in the Mississippi river, judging from the niggardly policy of the past, are not likely to be removed for many years to come. The tax annually levied upon the people of the States and Territory living above the rapids, in the shape of extra freight for the transportation of goods and provisons over them, is already enormous, and acts as a serious drawback upon the prosperity of that region; so much so, that unless a remedy is applied, the Upper Mississippi valley must abandon the present natural channel of commerce, and seek a market at the East for its products.

The average distance of the proposed northern and southern railroad from the Mississippi, is probably somewhat more than one hundred miles. I care little where the northern terminus may be designated, whether at Pembina, or some other point. I fixed upon that place in my bill, because its location is better known than any other spot on that part of the boundary of 49°, and because it is in the valley of the Red river of the north, which is more favorable for a railroad than any other line in that region. The necessity for the completion of the work beyond the Falls of St. Anthony, will depend upon certain contingencies, one of which is the adoption of the parallel of 46½° for a Pacific railway, the expediency of which I have already adverted to. Still, as the whole of that country is now comprised within the public domain, if a grant is to be made, it should be for the entire length, that it may be rendered available when required. You have now an extensive Indian frontier, which you are obliged to defend at a vast annual expense. If the longitudinal line of communication along that border was perfected by means of a railway, the Government might control the savage tribes with much greater facility than can now be done, and with less than one half the force at present requisite for that purpose. Troops could be transported rapidly to any point that was menaced. The same reasons might be urged as one of the necessary preparations against the occurrence of a foreign war.

I know that many regard that as an almost impossible event. I am not one of that number, for I can well imagine that we may be forced to resort to that, so much to be deprecated, alternative, at any time, to defend the honor or the rights of the nation. Grave Senators have assured us that our foreign relations are in a delicate position; and I am bound to believe that they are not alarmists, or actuated by any vain spirit of boasting, when they make that declaration. I am not in favor of filibustering expeditions, but I do trust that the high position of this Republic will be sustained and vindicated, and the Monroe doctrine strictly adhered to, even at the hazard of a war with France, England, or any other Power. And I feel assured that the incoming Administration will enforce this cardinal policy of the Democratic party, indeed I might say, of the whole American people. Should hostilities follow, we ought to be prepared to repel the intrusion upon our soil of an enemy's force, with the whole power of the country. If the projected railway from north to south was completed, it would enable the Government to concentrate in a very few days thousands of the best marksmen in the world, at any point on our southern coast that might be threatened by a foreign foe.

Mr. Chairman, I have already trespassed too long upon the attention of the House, and yet I beg its indulgence while I bring before it the other railroad project to which I have previously alluded, upon which I hope to secure an affirmative vote to-day. There was a bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands at the last session, to grant to Minnesota alternate sections of lands for the construction of a railway from the Falls of St. Louis river, on Lake Superior, to St. Paul, on the Mississippi, with branches to St. Anthony and Stillwater. That bill is now on your calendar, and I wish to state very briefly the necessity that exists for its passage. The distance between the termini is about two hundred and sixty miles, and much of the country through which the road would pass is very favorable for settlement. The great object is, to open a communication between the waters of the St. Lawrence and the Mississippi, at the most eligible and proper points, and it is one of immediate interest to every State bordering upon the latter river, and upon the lakes. Congress granted seven hundred and fifty thousand acres to the State of Michigan, at the last session, to enable it to make a canal around the Falls of St. Mary, on the score that it was not a local benefit, but one in which several States would share, and that was true. I rejoice that the appropriation was made, especially as my own Territory will necessarily profit by it. Complete the measure of your liberality, and I may say of your justice, by contributing to the infant but enterprising Minnesota, from your ample resources, your proportion of the means necessary to build a railway between the northern and southern portions of our Territory, through what is now but little better than a trackless wilderness.

Minnesota Territory comprises in its limits all the northern shore of Lake Superior up to the British line. We have reliable information that copper, interspersed with silver, abounds in that region. I have already mentioned the fisheries and pineries as of immense value, and that they must necessarily constitute a large item in the commerce with the Lower Mississippi valley. We who live on the waters of the Mississippi are now absolutely cut off from communication with our own lake coast, for want of a railroad. To reach that part of our Territory, without resorting to the primitive mode of conveyance by bark canoes and portages, we must descend the Mississippi nearly four hundred miles to Galena, thence to Chicago, and through the whole length of Lakes Michigan and Superior, and a part of Lake Huron. In other words, we must travel more than fifteen hundred miles to visit a portion of our own Territory, not more than two hundred and fifty miles distant in a direct line. In the transportation of troops for frontier defense, the Government is put to the same inconvenience and expense. If the railroad was made, a very small force of regular troops would suffice for keeping the peace with the savages on that extensive border, as they could move with celerity to any place where their presence might be required. For supplying your garrisons and Indian agencies with necessary goods and provisions, the road would be very advantageous, and incalculably decrease the expenditures of the Departments of the Government to which they belong.

While these great benefits would accrue to the Government by the opening of a railroad communication, Minnesota would thereby be enabled to develop its boundless resources with great rapidity. The southern portion of the Territory could then send their agricultural productions to those of our citizens engaged in the fisheries and in mining and lumbering operations, and receive their commodities in exchange. Now, as I have before stated, all communication of that character is precluded by the impassable nature of the intermediate country. St. Paul is already an important commercial town, and is rapidly increasing in population. If a connection was formed between it and the two other places named as termini of the road and branches on the waters of the Mississippi and Lake Superior, a vast impetus would be given to the trade of the Northwest, and to the prosperity of the Territory.

In view of these facts, I trust that gentlemen will not vote against this project, because they are opposed to general grants of a like character. Minnesota has not yet received an acre of land from the General Government, except for purposes of education. The number of acres included in the proposed donation, estimating the distance at two hundred and sixty miles, is nine hundred and ninety-eight thousand four hundred. Should this bill be passed by Congress at its present session, the work will soon be commenced and prosecuted to its completion. If the grant is not made, years may elapse before a railway will be built, and meantime the Territory and future State must suffer great detriment, and the Government be subjected to vast expense and inconvenience, which might have been avoided by a timely liberality on the part of Congress.

It is the duty of the General Government to provide for the common defense and for the common welfare of its citizens. How can this be discharged so well, and so appropriately, as by opening the great line of travel through the length and breadth of its public domain? These works are national—not local—in their character. They will contribute, in an eminent degree, to draw closer the bonds of union between the East and the West, the North and the South. The more rapid the means of intercommunication between the distant parts of the country, the more will the people of the different sections realize their identity of interests with each other, and the more repugnant must be the idea of separation into distinct communities. If this is a fact—and it cannot be controverted—no stronger or more valid reason can be given or required for the adoption of a general system of railroad improvements by the Government in the West. These are days of progress—I use the term in its legitimate sense—and Congress cannot, if it will, resist the spirit of the age. The untold millions of acres of public lands were acquired for settlement, and for that alone, and the people will not permit that they shall be hermetically sealed to the pioneer, by obstinate persistence in the present policy of the Government. France, Spain, and England have always pursued a wise system of encouragement to bona fide settlers in their colonial possessions, by making to them donations of land. You, who profess to be guided by more just and liberal principles towards your own citizens, not only exact from them a fivefold price for your public domain, but refuse to aid them in constructing roads through it, the expense of which you ought exclusively to bear.

I respectfully submit, Mr. Chairman, that the Territory I have had the honor to represent upon this floor, before and since its organization, has not been troublesome or exorbitant in its demands upon Congress for grants of land, although, in common with the West everywhere, we have had to struggle against the many and serious obstacles and embarrassments of a new country, not the least of which has been and still is, the lack of proper facilities for inland communication. Give us your aid to free us from this difficulty, and I can safely promise that Minnesota will soon be knocking at your doors for admission into the Union, with a population inferior to none of her sisters in virtue, intelligence, enterprise, and devoted attachment to true Democratic principles, and to the Government under which we live.

COINAGE.

SPEECH OF HON. C. L. DUNHAM,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 1, 1853,

On the "Act amendatory of existing laws relative to the half dollar, the quarter dollar, the dime, and the half dime,"

Mr. DUNHAM said:

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a very important bill, and therefore commends itself to the careful and earnest attention of the members of this House. It proposes a change in the small silver coins—the half dollar and under—and also a very important change in our system of coinage.

The proposed change in the small silver coins is, to reduce the weight of the half dollar from two hundred and six and a quarter grains, the present weight, to one hundred and ninety-two grains; and the quarters, dimes, and half dimes in proportion, leaving the metal at the present standard of fineness. This will make the intrinsic value of these coins 6.91 per cent.—not quite seven per cent.—less than the value of the present ones, and will make their relative value to our gold coins about what it was prior to the passage of the act of 1834, as that act reduced the intrinsic value of the latter 6.681 per cent. This reduction is rather more than the present difference between the nominal and intrinsic or market value of our silver coins, as they only bring in market, for purposes of exportation, about four and a half per cent., and for use as small change five per cent. premium. But as the same cause which has produced this difference in the relative value of the two metals, viz: the cheap production of gold, and consequently the increased quantity raised and brought to market, still exists, and indeed is increasing, this difference will go on increasing, and it is to be apprehended that we shall soon find that the proposed reduction is too small rather than too great to enable the new coins to maintain themselves in circulation. So far from there being any prospect of a diminution of the present stock of gold, each successive month adds immensely to it from the increasing productions of California, Australia, and Russia.

Mr. HALL, (interrupting.) I wish the gentleman from Indiana would explain the first amendment proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means. The bill, as it came from the Senate, provides that this new silver coin shall be a legal tender for all sums of five dollars and under. The Committee on Ways and Means propose to strike that out, and provide that this new coin shall not be a legal tender for debts due from one individual to another, but that it shall be for debts due the Government of the United States. Now I ask the gentleman, what is the meaning of this proposed amendment? If it is proper that this silver coin should be received in discharge of debts due the Government, why should it not be received in discharge of dues from one individual to another?

Mr. DUNHAM. If the gentleman had waited until I had arrived at that point in the due course of my remarks, he would have been saved the necessity of asking his questions, and I should have endeavored to explain the point to his satisfaction. But as he has now brought it to the attention of the House, I will at once dispose of it. I think it is susceptible of a very easy explanation. The only object of either provision is to give currency and credit to these new coins, and thereby to maintain them in circulation. The provision of the Senate for the accomplishment of this, is to make them a tender in payment of small debts of five dollars and under. This would no doubt be sufficient for the purpose, as the intrinsic value of the metal in them is so little below their nominal value, and as the supply is to be limited, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to the necessity for them for change. This, however, would make them a standard in all small transactions; we would thereby still continue the double standard of gold and silver, a thing the committee desire to obviate. They desire to have the standard currency to consist of gold only, and that these silver coins shall be entirely subservient to it, and that they shall be used rather as tokens than as standard currency; and they propose to maintain their credit and circulation not only by limiting the supply to the wants of the country, but by making them receivable for all public dues to the United States, by providing a customer ready at all times to receive them at their nominal value to any amount. This would undoubtedly be also sufficient, even was the intrinsic value of these coins much less than we propose to make it. I think this preferable to the provision of the Senate, but I do not deem either very essential; for the supply will be limited, and their actual value, as compared to gold, will be so little below their nominal value, that the convenience and necessity for them will be amply sufficient to sustain their credit and circulation without either of the provisions.

Mr. HALL, (interrupting.) I wish to say, if the gentleman's reasoning be correct, and if this change does not improperly change the relative value of gold and silver, it does appear very extraordinary that you should make this new silver coin a legal tender in discharge of Government dues, and not make it a legal tender in discharge of debts from one individual to another; and it appears to me very much as if it were an attempt to give an individual an advantage over the Government.

Mr. DUNHAM. I cannot see that an individual has any advantage whatever over the Government. I think the gentleman's remarks are an evidence of what too often takes place in this House. The gentleman undertakes to catechise me upon a subject to which he has evidently given no attention whatever, and undertakes to raise objections and difficulties without really understanding the matter. He talks about this proposed coin being worth about fifty cents to the dollar, though I have just stated to the House that it will vary but little more than one and a half per cent. from the actual intrinsic market value of silver. Our present silver coins will bring in market five per cent.—not as bullion for exportation, but as currency for change. This bill proposes to reduce the intrinsic value only six and ninety-one hundredths per cent. It shows how much the gentleman understands the subject which he undertakes so sharply to catechise me about this morning.

Mr. HALL. I am exceedingly gratified at the lecture the gentleman from Indiana has delivered me; but if the gentleman would understand my argument and take it into consideration—perhaps it is not worth his consideration—he would see that they are based upon sound principles. As to his idea that this silver coin is based upon a proper standard, with reference to gold, he may be right or wrong; but I say that if the principle is right, this silver coin should be a legal tender in discharge of Government dues, and a legal tender in discharge of debts from individual to individual. If the principle is not carried out, you may make a coin—I do not say that is the case here—worth only fifty cents on the dollar, a discharge of public dues, and which in the case of individuals would not circulate at all.

Mr. DUNHAM. I shall be happy to reply to the gentleman's argument. But before going on, I will move to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole House, in order to prevent its going to the Speaker's table, for if this course is pursued, I shall not get through this morning.

I repeat, in reply to the gentleman, we propose, so far as these coins are concerned, to make the silver subservient to the gold coin of the country. We intend to do what the best writers on political economy have approved; what experience, where the experiment has been tried, has demonstrated to be best, and what the committee believe to be necessary and proper—to make but one standard of currency, and to make all others subservient to it. We mean to make the gold the standard coin, and to make these new silver coins applicable and convenient, not for large but for small transactions. I trust this sufficiently explains the reason of our pursuing this course.

This can neither be unjust to the Government or to any citizen. Not to the Government, for it alone manufactures and puts them in circulation. It should, therefore, as a matter of duty, maintain their credit; and as it cannot part with them without receiving their full nominal value, it should always be ready to retake them at that value. It is no hardship, because the Government will receive them at precisely what it will have paid them out. It can, therefore, suffer no loss. It can be no hardship upon the citizen, because, as it is entirely at his option whether he will take them from the Mint or not, he certainly will not take them unless they are worth to him their nominal value, the price at which he receives them. A nominal dollar of these coins must be worth a dollar in gold, for they must be worth the price they will bring, and as no one can get them from the Mint, the sole manufactory, for less, and as the Govment will stand pledged to redeem them at that price, they must always bring it. They must therefore always be worth and pass for a dollar in large or small sums. This we see verified by our three-cent pieces and the Spanish coins now so extensively circulated in the country. No one doubts but that when he receives a dollar in them at their nominal value he is getting the worth of a dollar of gold or silver, because he can get them for no less, and he can readily exchange them for the one or the other. Yet that nominal dollar in three-cent pieces is intrinsically worth, of standard silver, only eighty-three and one third cents, and in the Spanish coins usually in circulation only from eighty to ninety-four cents, according as it is in fips, twelve-and-a-half-cent pieces, or quarters, the depreciation of these Spanish coins by abrasion being from six to twenty per cent.

If, then, the mere necessity and convenience of the community maintain in circulation at their nominal value coins thus intrinsically depreciated, can there be any doubt that one of an intrinsic value of at least an average of twelve per cent. more, issued by and bearing the stamp of our own Government, which will also stand pledged to redeem them, will do so without loss to the citizen? Your copper coin maintains its credit and circulation, though not intrinsically worth seventy per cent. of its nominal value. You need no law making these new coins a legal tender. The creditor will be but too anxious to receive them, as he now is the old worn-out Spanish coins, which there is no law to compel him to take, and, as he now is, our three-cent pieces. Another reason why the Government should receive them in payment is, that, though—as these coins will only be issued from the Mint upon the demand of our citizens—there can be but little danger of an issue beyond their actual wants, yet if, by any possibility, there should be, they will immediately find their way back to the Treasury in the payment of public dues, and thereby be withdrawn from circulation, and the amount reduced to the wants and convenience of the people. They can then never be a drug in the market; can never fall below their nominal value.

So much for this change, and so much for the principle upon which it is to be made. Every one who has given the least attention to this subject must be satisfied that some alteration in the relative value of our gold and silver coins is necessary, and must be made, or that we shall soon be without any of the latter. The value of coin, like the value of anything else, is in proportion to the cost of its production; or, if gentlemen prefer the expression, in proportion to the supply and demand, which comes to the same thing; for if the amount of labor required to produce an article is lessened, the production is cheapened, and the amount produced, so long as there is a market for it, is increased. We are all aware that within the last few years it has required less labor than formerly to raise gold, whilst the cost of raising silver has remained about the same. The quantity of gold raised has been increased as a consequence, and it has become cheaper, when compared with silver, or other commercial commodities. Silver, then, when compared to gold, has appreciated in value, not only in our own market, but in the markets of the commercial world.

The same amount of silver bullion will now buy more gold bullion than heretofore; but as it now takes no more gold bullion to make a dollar than before, no man thinks of paying his debts in silver dollars or coins, but he gathers up the silver coins, exchanges them for gold, and has the gold made into dollars, and with them pays his debts, or, which comes to the same thing, he exchanges his silver for the amount in gold coins that the gold bullion, which his silver dollars would buy, would make, and with them pays his debts, saving to himself, by the operation, the increased number of gold dollars which he gets for his silver. As our coins of gold or silver are regarded in a foreign market simply as so much bullion as merchandise, when debts are to be paid in those markets, those will be taken which will bring the most there in proportion to what they cost here. The intrinsic above the nominal value in a single silver coin, or in a small number, being small, they pass singly, or in small numbers, as a currency at their nominal value only; but as in large sums this difference amounts to considerable, there is a profit in gathering them into large sums and selling them as bullion, thereby withdrawing them from circulation. A like interest prevents the holder of large sums from paying them out as currency. As the advance received from the exporter by the person who gathers them up at their nominal value is clear profit, he can sell them to him at such a price as will enable him to make a handsome profit by their exportation to a better market. There is, then, a constant stimulant to gather up every silver coin, and send it to market as bullion to be exchanged for gold, and the result is, the country is almost devoid of small change for the ordinary small business transactions, and what we have is of a depreciated character. This does not injure your Wall street brokers, who deal by thousands; they are making a profit by it; but it is a serious injury to the laboring millions of the country, who deal in small sums. I am not so much surprised, therefore, to find the gentleman from the city of New York [Mr. BROOKS] opposing the measure.

This evil must be remedied; and I know of no remedy but to make the relative intrinsic value of gold and silver coins correspond with their relative nominal value. You must diminish the intrinsic value of the silver coins, or increase that of the gold; you must diminish the quantity of silver in the silver coins, or increase the quantity of gold in the gold coins. Which shall we do?—which ought we to do? This we can only determine by examining the effects of the one and the other; by whether we should or should not interfere with the present state of existing contracts; whether we should legislate for the benefit of the creditor at the expense of the debtor; for the benefit of the capitalist at the expense of labor; whether we shall use the powers of the Government to advance the interests of the rich, or to protect the poor?

And first, what will be the effect of increasing the quantity of gold in the gold coins? Our gold coins are a legal tender in payment of debts at their nominal value. If the debtor has, therefore, given his note for a hundred dollars, that is practically a contract to pay the quantity of gold, of the standard fineness, now contained in a hundred dollars of those coins. If you by law increase the quantity of gold in those coins seven per cent.—about what this bill proposes to decrease the silver coins—the debtor must then, to discharge that same debt, pay the quantity of gold contained in one hundred and seven dollars of the present coins—seven dollars more than he contracted to pay. Or, to give a further illustration, suppose I borrow a hundred dollars, and receive it in the present legal gold coins, and gave my note payable ten days after date. This note, if its terms were fully expressed, means that I shall, ten days after date, pay the gold in quantity and fineness contained in one hundred dollars of our present gold coins. Before it comes due you pass a law requiring that the legal gold coins shall contain seven per cent. more gold than now. I have had no occasion to use the money; it has lain in my desk; it has neither gained nor lost anything intrinsically; yet it will not pay off the very note which I gave for it by seven dollars, saying nothing of interest. This, then, is not only violating the validity of contracts, but as the creditors are generally the wealthy capitalists, and the debtors laborers, operators of moderate means, it is using the powers of the Government for the benefit of capital at the expense of labor—of the rich at the expense of the poor.

I know it is said that as gold, by the cheapness of its production, has depreciated in value, therefore by increasing the quantity in the same nominal coins in a like proportion, the creditor only gets the value of his credit notwithstanding he receives a greater quantity. This would be true of those debts contracted before the depreciation of gold commenced, but not of such as have since been contracted, of which is by far the largest proportion of the private debts now in existence; and in reference to those contracted before, the loss must fall somewhere, either upon the creditor or upon the debtor; for the debtor has probably received and saved up the means with which he proposes to pay the debt since the depreciation commenced, and of course received them at the present nominal value, and if he cannot at that nominal value discharge his debt, he must suffer the loss. Is this just? The poor debtor does not undertake to insure the creditor against the silent, but no less important and powerful changes of nature or of natural causes. If the currency had appreciated, the creditor would not have remitted one jot or title of what was nominated in his bond. A contract to pay in money is not different, so far as risk is concerned, from a contract to pay wheat or any other commercial commodity. The contractors stipulate the article, the quality and quantity. If it rises in value, the payor loses, and the payee gains. If it falls, then the payee gains, and the payor loses; each takes his risk. If it was the wheat contained in a hundred bushels instead of the gold in a hundred dollars, and that wheat was at the making of the contract worth one hundred dollars, and before the time of payment wheat should become scarce, and worth twenty per cent. more in price, would the debtor expect to pay or the creditor to receive any the less quantity; or if it should depreciate in value, would the one expect to pay, or the other to receive any the less? Each has taken his risk and must abide the consequences. Or would gentlemen throw the entire risk upon the poor laboring debtor, so that if it rises the creditor gains; if it falls the debtor must lose? This would be the effect. There would be no reciprocity.

Besides, sir, what shall the Government do? It has stamped and put into circulation these various gold coins at their nominal value. Shall it now repudiate its own currency, and refuse to receive it at the price at which it was issued? Shall those who happen to have the present coin on hand at the time of the change suffer the loss, or will gentlemen vote out of the Treasury a fund which will enable the Government to receive these coins at their nominal value, and replace them with those of a greater intrinsic value? This will still throw the burden upon the producing, the tax-paying people. On the other hand, do any of these evil consequences follow the change of the silver coins proposed by this bill? Not at all; for as our gold and silver coins are both legal tenders in payment of debts at their nominal value, the debtor has now the right to pay in gold at such value, which the creditor is bound to receive in discharge of his dues. This being the case, the debtor, although he may tender silver if he chooses, which the creditor must receive at its nominal value, yet as he can exchange that silver for a larger nominal amount in gold, which his creditor must also take, no debtor will pay in silver at its nominal value. This change, therefore, of the silver coins, does not injure the creditor, especially as we do not propose to make the new coins a legal tender in payment of debts, leaving it at the option of the creditor to receive them or not. He, of course, will not receive them unless they will be of as much value to him as the only present practical legal tender, gold, because he may still insist upon the gold. If, then, he does receive them it will be because they will answer his purpose as well, and be therefore of as much value to him as the gold. He then can suffer no loss. It will be no especial benefit to the holder of silver, because he may now sell his silver for gold in the market at its increased market value, and as he will not be permitted to take it to the Mint to be coined into these new coins—for they will only be made out of bullion purchased in the market for the Mint, under the direction of the Treasury—he can still only get for his silver the amount of gold it will bring in market.

This bill will not enhance the value of the present silver coins. They have already been enhanced, when compared with gold, by natural causes. It neither increases nor decreases their value. It will leave that value as it is, to be regulated by the market, but it provides for making new coins for the convenience of the people, whose nominal value shall correspond somewhat to their real value, and pass currently at that nominal value by tale. It does not change the value of anything, but it gives new coins, with their actual intrinsic value marked upon them, which is not now the case with the present silver coins.

I know, Mr. Speaker, we are told if we will only wait patiently, this thing will soon regulate itself, and that the two metals will soon return to their former comparative value. I think those who thus content themselves have but little heeded the lessons of the past, and as little attended to the prospects of the future. They have but little studied the cause which has produced the difficulty, or they would see that it still continues, and to all human probability must continue with an increasing power. The cause, as I have before stated, is the cheap production of gold. The value of a thing where the production is unlimited, is in proportion to the labor required to produce and get it to market, compared to the labor required to produce other commercial commodities which are exchanged for it.

This is proved by the state of things existing in California and Australia, where the effect of the small amount of labor required to produce gold is directly seen by the increased quantity necessarily given in exchange for every other commodity produced by labor—in the increased quantity which has to be given for labor itself in other pursuits. Why? Because if labor in other pursuits did not command about the quantity of gold which that same labor applied directly to raising the gold would, it would immediately be withdrawn from those other pursuits and directed to raising the gold. Therefore, as much less labor is required now to produce gold than before the discovery of those mines, labor has been attracted to its production, the supply has been vastly increased, and the value, when compared with other articles, diminished. If the production of these new mines should now cease, the present supply of gold would not be diminished; and as before their discovery the production of gold kept pace with that of silver, there is no reason why the present relative value of the two metals should not be maintained, at least for some time to come. The evil which we now endure would still continue and would need a remedy; but so far from the supply from these mines ceasing, there is every prospect, as before observed, of its continuing in an increasing ratio. On the other hand, what have we to look to for the increase of silver? Nothing, except that quicksilver is a little cheaper from the discovery of new mines, the productions of which are not subject to the monopoly which has controlled that article heretofore, and some little improvements, perhaps, in the machinery with which the silver mines are to be drained and worked. So far, then, from the present evil remedying itself, it must be greatly augmented.

Another objection urged against this proposed change is, that it gives us a standard of currency of gold only. We sometimes become attached to old forms and usages, and obstinately insist upon continuing them, without considering the reasons for their adoption, or the propriety of their continuance. What advantage is to be obtained by a standard of the two metals, which is not as well, if not much better, attained by a single standard, I am unable to perceive; whilst there are very great disadvantages resulting from it, as the experience of every nation which has attempted to maintain it has proved. The constant, though sometimes low change in the relative values of the two metals has always resulted in great inconvenience, and frequently in great loss to the people. Wherever the experiment of a standard of a single metal has been tried, it has proved eminently successful. Indeed, it is utterly impossible that you should long at a time maintain a double standard. The one or the other will appreciate in value when compared with the other. It will then command a premium when exchanged for that other; when it ceases to be a currency and becomes merchandise. It ceases to circulate as money at its nominal value, but it sells as a commodity at its market price. This was the case with gold before the act of 1834; it is now the case with silver. Gentlemen talk about a double standard of gold and silver as a thing that exists, and that we proposed to change. We have had but a single standard for the last three or four years. That has been, and now is, gold. We propose to let it remain so, and to adapt silver to it, to regulate it by it. This is eminently proper. Gold is the production of our own country; silver is not. Let us use our own productions, and, so far as that use can, increase its value. Why should we leave our own to use the productions of a foreign soil, when we can gain nothing by so doing?

Another important provision of this bill is, that hereafter the Government shall make a charge of one half of one per cent. for coinage at the Mint, to defray the actual expenses. The bill also provides that the depositor may, at his option, have his gold or silver cast into bars or ingots, or formed into disks of standard or pure metal, of one, two, three, five, or ten ounces, and upwards, with the weight and fineness stamped upon them, for which the charge shall not exceed the actual cost of manufacture. This is what is usually, though not very properly, denominated a seigniorage.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not intend to interrupt the gentleman, but would ask what he designs to do with this bill when he has finished his speech? If he proposes to put it on its passage, it will be necessary to make some inquiries as he goes along.

Mr. DUNHAM. I am ready to answer any inquiry which may be put to me. I intend, at the close of my remarks, to call for the previous question, and leave the House to put the bill on its passage, continue the discussion of it in the House, or to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as it may see proper.

Mr. FREEMAN. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana whether he has the least idea of putting a bill of this importance on its passage without any discussion in the House?

Mr. DUNHAM. The question has been before Congress for nearly the whole of two sessions.

Mr. FREEMAN. Before your committee, I suppose.

Mr. DUNHAM. It has been before the Senate, and this particular subject of seigniorage has been discussed upon one side, at any rate, in this House, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] will recollect; and if he does not, I will endeavor to remind him and the House of a speech delivered by him upon it, at the last session.

Mr. BROOKS. With the gentleman's permission, I will state that a proposition for seigniorage was then introduced, and on a vote by yeas and nays received only fifty votes in the affirmative.

Mr. DUNHAM. I am happy the gentleman has reminded me of that fact; I will endeavor to give the gentleman some reasons why it then received so little favor here. It will be recollected that the gentleman made a speech against it, upon an occasion which allowed no opportunity to reply. I will now endeavor to satisfy the House that his arguments were founded in fallacy, and that he was much mistaken in his facts.

Mr. FREEMAN. As the gentleman designs putting this bill on its passage by calling for the previous question, I desire to propound an inquiry to him. I consider any change in the metallic currency of the country would interfere greatly with the interests of the people. Now, the gentleman has stated that gold is now the standard of value in this country, and that silver was much more valuable than gold, and, therefore, I take it, not the standard of value.

Mr DUNHAM. Yes, sir; precisely.

Mr. FREEMAN. But in order to bring silver down to the standard of value, he proposes to depreciate the silver currency of the country. Every member of the House will see that that is a very important change, and one the people of this country will not willingly submit to. The question of a change in the value of existing American coin, is not one, however much it may be discussed in this House, which has been assented to by the voice of the people of the United States. I hope the gentleman will not undertake to cut off discussion on this subject. However well-informed he may be, he should recollect that there are inferior minds who cannot grasp so great a question as quickly as the committee to which he belongs. We should have an opportunity to examine.

Mr. DUNHAM. I am obliged to the gentleman for his compliment. There are some gentlemen who, from their manner at least, think they understand these questions as well as the Committee on Ways and Means. I do not want to force the House to anything, and if there be any general objection to the call for the previous question, I shall not make it. I designed giving the House the opportunity to pass this bill, or to refer it, which will be to defeat it, as to it seemed best. I am sure there is nothing unfair or improper in that.

But I wish to reply to one remark of the gentleman right here. I repeat, we do not change the whole present silver currency of the country. We do not depreciate it. We do not propose to change its value in any way. We do not propose to recoin the whole silver coin of the country. We propose to leave the existing coin where it now is; where it has been for at least the last three years; that is, leave it to sell in the market for its value as merchantable bullion. We propose to buy as much of this merchantable bullion, at its actual market value, as may be necessary, and out of it to make and put in circulation, for the convenience of those who want it, a new coin, of the same denominations, to be sure, but of a different weight and value, the stamp upon which shall truly indicate its value.

Mr. MILLSON. I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Indiana, which I trust will meet with his approval, as I doubt not it will meet with the concurrence of the House. This is really a very important bill, and I am sure the gentleman himself would not desire the House should pass on it without the opportunity for mature examination. I merely suggest to the gentleman that, instead of terminating the debate and forcing the House to a vote, he will allow the bill, by general consent, to be referred to the Committee of the Whole. Then he may move a reconsideration of that vote, which he may call up to-morrow, and thereby make the bill the first one in order for discussion, and give the House an opportunity of examining in print the amendments which have been proposed to the bill by the Committee on Ways and Means, as well as those submitted by the gentleman himself.

Mr. DUNHAM. I have remedied the whole difficulty. I have already made a motion which will keep this bill before the House. I have no desire, I repeat again, to force this bill to a vote in the House; and I say again, if there is any general objection to my calling the previous question, I will not do it. Certainly, the House have it in their power to vote down the call for the previous question, or not. I hope that gentlemen will not further interrupt me, until I get through with the general remarks which I wish to make in explanation of this bill, and then I am willing to answer any question which may be put.

To return to the question, I repeat, sir, we propose to impose a charge or seigniorage upon the coinage of gold and silver, to cover the actual expense of the coinage, instead of defraying that expense, as heretofore, out of the public Treasury. This is a very important provision, and notwithstanding the gentleman tells me there was at the last session a vote of fifty only in favor of it, I trust gentlemen will give it their careful consideration, and that it will in consequence meet with much more favor at this time. What do we propose?

Mr. BROOKS. Let me correct the gentleman in point of fact. He proposes to levy only the actual expenses of the coinage. The amount of coinage at the Philadelphia Mint was, last year, about $50,000,000. One half of one per cent. seigniorage will be $250,000 annually. The expenses of the Mint at Philadelphia, as I stated and proved the other day, are now nearly obtained out of the depositors, because the Mint, in the estimates, demands $250,000 as the expenses for maintaining itself, and says, at the same time, that it only wants only $48,000 out of the public Treasury, leaving about $200,000 to come out of the public. Now, this bill proposes to add $250,000 more, to come out of the depositors, making $410,000.

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman has fallen into an error; in this, that he has taken the appropriation for the Mint at Philadelphia alone as the appropriation for the whole Mint establishment—the Mint at Philadelphia and all the branches. In discussing this question of seigniorage, I propose first to inquire what coinage is, its object, and effect? I apprehend that much of the opposition which exists to the charge of seigniorage results from the want of a proper understanding of the nature, purposes, and effects of coining. Coining does not fix or control the value of the currency. It is a simple manufacture of the metals into pieces of a convenient form and size, and marking upon each its respective quality and quantity. For instance, when we see an American silver dollar, we know by the stamp upon it that it has been examined and tested by the proper officers, and that it contains four hundred and twelve and a half grains of silver nine tenths fine. When we see a gold dollar, we know in the same way that it contains twenty-five and eight tenths grains of gold of the same fineness of silver, (nine tenths.) This does not fix its value, but it simply marks quality and quantity, for the convenience of those who have occasion to receive or pay it, and saves them the trouble of having to examine its quality, or weigh it to ascertain its quantity. The value is then known by the market, and it is paid and received accordingly.

The law fixes the quality and quantity of metal in our coins, and when parties do not themselves in their contracts stipulate the quantity and fineness of these metals, which are to be paid and received, which they may always do, but stipulate the name and number of the coins, the law supplies the hiatus by presuming that the parties mutually referred to the law, made it a part of their contract, and meant the quality and quantity of the metal contained in the stipulated name and number of coins. Thus, when one agrees to pay and the other to receive a hundred dollars, the full terms of the contract, as construed by the law, are to pay and receive the number of grains of gold or silver of the legal standard (nine tenths fine) contained in one hundred dollars. This being the case, who ought to pay the expense of the coinage, of this manufacture? Should not those who are benefited by it, and in proportion to the benefit they receive? Will any gentleman tell me why a man who only receives and pays out one hundred dollars of this coin in the course of a year should pay as much and perhaps more of the expenses of maintaining this Mint than the one who may handle ten thousand or ten millions? And yet this may be the case so long as we raise our revenues by a tariff, and the expense of the Mint is paid out of the Treasury. If we charge upon the coinage a seigniorage sufficient to defray that expense, we make those who have the benefit of the manufacture pay the expenses of it.

When you change bullion into coin, into a form which you may more conveniently use, it is just as much manufactured as if you had manufactured it into jewelry. He who has the benefit of the manufacture should pay the expenses in one case as much as in the other. When the bullion merchant takes his gold or silver bullion to the Mint, and has it manufactured into coin, that coin is worth just as much more than the bullion as the labor is worth which has been expended in its manufacture, and consequently he should pay for that labor. It is for his convenience when he comes to pay it out to others. It saves him the time and labor which would otherwise have been required to weigh it. It saves him the time, labor, and annoyance which it would have taken to ascertain and agree upon its fineness. It saves all dispute as to quantity or quality. This is worth more than the cost of manufacture. It makes his commodity worth that much more. He can, therefore, afford to pay for it, and he ought to pay for it. When he parts with it, it will bring him that much more; for as the person who will receive it will have all the convenience of the manufacture, he will allow for its enhanced value. The labor employed in the manufacture becomes incorporated into the article as much as the raw material, and like it contributes to its intrinsic value, and like it passes from hand to hand in its circulation. There can be no loss of the seigniorage so long as the coin remains, for whoever possesses that has the benefit and value of the manufacture, and has allowed in receiving it for the enhancement of value which that manufacture caused. It can only be lost when the coin, by accident or design, shall be reduced to bullion again, and this labor evolved (if I may use the expression) and lost to him who should be so unfortunate as to meet with accident, or so stupid as to conceive the design.

It is possible that coin may be remelted into bullion without loss to the holder, notwithstanding a charge for coinage may have been exacted; but this can only happen when the production of gold is limited, and the demand for it for other purposes than currency is greater than the need of it for currency; and then the holder of the coins can suffer no loss, as the bullion in them will be worth as much for those other purposes, as the coin is worth for circulation. But so long as the production of the metal is unlimited this cannot happen, as the demand for those other purposes will be met with the increased production of the raw material. Impose a charge for coinage, then, equal to its cost, and there can scarcely be an over coinage, as no one will ordinarily have an article fabricated unless its value when manufactured is equal to the value of the raw material added to the cost of manufacturing. There can be no danger of a short supply, because so long as the article is worth this, it will be made. Impose this charge, and you at once put a stop to our present immense coinage at such an enormous expense to the Government, induced and fostered by our free system, merely that the coin may be put into boxes and sacks at the Mint and sent without emptying to the melting pots of Europe. When an hundred ounces of coin has cost and is worth as much more than an hundred ounces of bullion as it has cost to make it into coin, that coin will no longer be remelted into bullion.

We are coining over fifty millions a year. Who is so simple as to suppose that this is for circulation among our own citizens? Who so simple as to believe that even the largest portion of it is now in the country? Who does not know that we have been defraying the expense of this immense coinage for the convenience and profit of New York brokers? Is it not time to put a stop to this? Is it not time that those who derive the profits of this coinage should pay the expense?

But, sir, we are told that the Government monopolizes and controls the coinage, and should, therefore, bear the expense. That must be a curious monopoly where the monopolizer pays all the expense, and those upon whom it operates have all the profit. The Government forces no man to bring his raw material to the Mint to be coined. He may bring it or not, as he pleases; he will not bring it unless it is to his interest. If he brings it, the Government puts its stamp upon it, but it does not prohibit him from putting his own upon it and selling it, or from having it manufactured into plate or jewelry. The Government stamp may increase its value, but it cannot diminish or limit it, for we see silver with that stamp upon it selling above the stamped price. The law says that his creditors shall take this coin in payment of their debts, but it does not say that they shall receive no other. It says that they shall take it at the value marked upon it; it does not say they shall allow no more for it. It may, therefore, be to his advantage to have his bullion manufactured into coin, but it cannot be to his disadvantage. Why, then, should the Government coin it free any more, I repeat, than it should make it into plate or jewelry?

But we are told it is for the general good of the people that there should be plenty of coin; therefore the Government should pay for the manufacture. So it is that there should be plenty of iron, flour, and salt. Shall the Government pay for their manufacture also, or shall those pay who use them, that have the benefit of them? And if because it is useful to have an abundance of gold coin, the expense of the manufacture should be paid out of the Treasury, so as to encourage gold to come into the country to be coined, why should not the freight from California and Australia be also paid out of the Treasury? Why should we not pay a premium for its production? Nay, why not have it dug at public expense? And all to what good, when the irresistible laws of trade immediately sweep it away, and distribute it among the commercial nations of the world, in proportion to their wealth and the frequency of the exchange of that wealth, leaving no traces of its having passed through our dominions other than an empty Treasury, and the profits of Wall street brokers, ship-owners, insurance and express companies? Might we not as well at once pay these profits out of the Treasury?

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] in a speech which he made a few months ago, talked most learnedly about this seigniorage being a "relic of feudality." He said that it ought to belong to the Grand Seignior, because it is seigniorage. Indeed, he talked so very learnedly about feudalities and feudalisms, that I almost imagined that he was himself a relic of those ancient times when men talked most flippantly about that which they least understood. Does he not know, does not this House know, that seigniorage then meant something very different from what it does as used in this bill? Then it was a tax upon the coinage to replenish the treasury of the feudal lord; here it means simply a charge, not for a revenue, but for the actual expenses of the manufacture of the coin. The gentleman seemed to me to under-estimate very much the intelligence of the House, when he sought to appeal to your prejudices, by talking about such a charge as being a relic of the feudal times of antiquity, in order to deter you from adopting it, though it might be ever so proper and judicious in itself.

FEBRUARY 2, 1853.

The bill being again under consideration—

Mr. DUNHAM. I wish to inquire how much time I have left?

The SPEAKER. About fifteen minutes, according to the recollection of the Chair.

Mr. DUNHAM. I am sorry it is so short, and I will endeavor to condense my remarks as much as possible.

Mr. Speaker, the first thing to which I wish to call attention this morning, is a matter to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] alluded on yesterday. His statement was, that we did not require one half of one per cent. seigniorage to pay the expenses of the Mint, and stated the fact that the Mint at Philadelphia only asked an appropriation of $48,000 out of the Treasury to defray its expenses for the next fiscal year, in addition to the profits it now derives from coinage. It is very true that that Mint only asks an appropriation out of the Treasury of $48,000 for the next fiscal year; yet its whole expenses will be considerably more than that. For instance, during the past year—and it is a matter to which I wish to call the especial attention of the House—there have been coined at Philadelphia 18,663,500 three-cent coins, making $559,905; as these coins are of the proportionate weight to our other silver coins, and are made of metal only seven hundred and fifty thousandths fine, instead of nine hundred, the proper standard, their nominal is twenty per cent. above their intrinsic value, or in other words, they are actually worth but two and a half cents each. Therefore, as silver is received at the Mint at its proper value, and made into these coins, which are then paid out by tale at their nominal value, the profit from this source last year was over $100,000. This is what I call a seigniorage, and a very heavy one, too. There is also a profit of the same character arising from the copper coinage, and a charge for refining or parting the metals. These profits go towards defraying the expenses of the Mint.

The estimated profits from the coinage of three-cent pieces, for the next fiscal year, is $70,000; if, however, we should change the fineness of that coin to the regular standard, which I think we ought, by all means, to do, we must add this amount to the $48,000 to be appropriated out of the Treasury; and if the gentleman had taken the pains to examine, he would have discovered that this sum was asked upon the estimate that there would remain, unexpended, of the present year's means, to commence the next, $38,000, which must also be added, making, in all, $156,000, to come out of the Treasury for Philadelphia alone. If we pass this bill making these new coins, and do not change the standard of the three-cent pieces, there will still be less demand for them, and hence less profit from their manufacture. But, sir, this bill does not propose to apply the revenues from this seigniorage entirely to the expenses of that particular Mint or branch at which they are raised. It will make them a common fund, out of which the expenses of the coinage at the Mint, and all of the branches, are to be defrayed, irrespective of the place of collection. Now, sir, we know that it will cost a larger per cent. to coin money in California, where provision has already been made for a branch Mint, than at Philadelphia, as it now does at the branches at New Orleans, Dahlonega, and Charlotte. Whilst it costs less than one half of one per cent. at Philadelphia, it costs about three per cent. at Dahlonega and Charlotte. And I will suggest here, that the sooner we abolish those two, the better for the Treasury and the country. We are continuing them at a large annual expense, when neither of them coins in a whole year as much as the Mint at Philadelphia does in two days. They ought to be abolished at once.

The ordinary expenses of the Mint at Philadelphia for the fiscal year '51-'52 was $271,213 95, of which $75,000 was appropriated out of the Treasury, and the remainder was obtained from its profits or reductions, of which, as before stated, over one hundred thousand dollars were received from the coinage of three-cent pieces. The amount expended out of the Treasury at the Dahlonega branch, was $10,800; at the Charlotte branch $10,615, and at the New Orleans branch about $98,000. If we abolish the three-cent profits, the amount to be met during the next fiscal year out of the Treasury or by seigniorage, for ordinary expenses, according to the estimates of the Treasury Department, will be, for Philadelphia $156,000; for Dahlonega $11,000; for Charlotte $11,600; for New Orleans $121,000; making the whole amount of expenditures to be met from the Treasury or by seigniorage $299,600. I presume it is known to the House that three-cent and cent coins are only made at Philadelphia.

Now, sir, the coinage for the calendar year 1852 was:

At Philadelphia	$52,403,669
At New Orleans	4,622,000
At Charlotte	396,739
At Dahlonega	473,815
Total	$57,896,218

A seigniorage of one half of one per cent. would be $289,481 09. So that supposing the future rate of coinage to continue equal to that of the past year, the gentleman from New York and the House will see, that if you hereafter make your three-cent pieces of standard metal, the seigniorage proposed by this bill is not exorbitant, and will not defray the actual expenses of the coinage, much less yield a profit to the Treasury. It is true if this bill shall pass, so as to authorize this proposed new silver coinage, an income by way of profits will, for two or three years, be derived from that, in addition to this seigniorage, but this will not long continue. The expenses of the California Mint will also have to be added, when it shall he put into operation.

There is another large loss to the Government from the present system of coinage. The bullion fund kept at the Mint for the convenience of depositors is about $6,000,000. This fund is to enable the Mint to receive the bullion of the depositor, assay it, and ascertain its value, and at once pay him for it in coin, which is usually done in a few hours, thus saving him from delay and loss of interest. The interest on this fund alone is a loss to the Government, for the benefit of the depositors, of $360,000, for which no charge is now made, nor is proposed to be made by this bill.

Sir, I wish, before leaving this subject, to again call the attention of the House to the enormous coinage of these depreciated three-cent pieces—over half a million of dollars in a single year. Why, sir, if we do not soon make some change in our other silver coins, the whole silver currency of the country will soon consist of these three-cent coins and the old worn-out clipped Spanish coins, whose intrinsic value is depreciated about twelve per cent. on an average.

Mr. OLDS. And yet such is the demand for small coin they pass current.

Mr. DUNHAM. Yes, sir; the demand for silver coin for change is so great that they readily pass current, notwithstanding this vast depreciation. Which is the best, I submit, to leave things thus to go on, and compel the people to use these old, worn-out, depreciated coins, to have the country filled with these debased three-cent pieces, or to make a currency of the proper standard, adequate to the wants and conveniences of the people? The manufacture and circulation of these three-cent coins should satisfy gentlemen that even a high seigniorage will not drive the metals from your Mints, when the business and wants of the people require them to go there for manufacture, and that a small reduction of the quantity of metal in a coin does not prevent its circulation when it is made up by its convenience. That convenience causes circulation as well as the intrinsic value.

We are told if we make this charge for coinage we shall drive the productions of our gold mines from our own to the British Mint for coinage. Well, sir, if it must eventually go to the English market, is it not better that it should go there directly, rather than it should be brought this way merely to be stopped here in transitu long enough to be coined, at such immense expense, and then go immediately to that market? If it must go there—if the laws of trade require it to go there, it will go, and it is better to let it go as bullion than as coin, when, as the gentleman from New York himself shows, the impress of our eagle is effaced so soon as it touches British soil. This charge for coinage will send no more gold to England, will not control the laws of trade, will not cause importations or exportations. Gentlemen will find proof of this in silver. We coin silver here free, but in England they charge a seigniorage of some nine per cent. If you take a pound of standard silver to the Mint, they coin it into sixty-six shillings and give back sixty-two shillings—keeping four shillings to pay for the coinage; or, which is in effect the same thing, they buy silver at sixty-two shillings the pound by tale, and coin that pound into sixty-six shillings. You may call it seigniorage, or just what you please, but they make so much by the coinage.

Mr. BROOKS. You said upon gold.

Mr. DUNHAM. Oh, no; you misunderstood me. They buy an ounce of gold at £3 17*s.* 9*d.*, in Bank of England notes, and they coin that ounce into £3 17*s.* 10½*d.*, which is one and a half penny, or about three cents seigniorage upon the ounce.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. DUNHAM. I should be glad to do so, but I cannot, for I have very little time left. There is also a seigniorage of one and a half per cent. upon the coinage of silver in France, and there is a seigniorage upon the coinage of silver by every other civilized Government, so far as we have any reliable account. Yet we find this silver bullion not coming to the United States where we coin it free; but forcing its way to Europe, or being drawn thither by the wants of commerce and the irresistible laws of trade, to Mints imposing this enormous seigniorage. This shows that seigniorage cannot control the exportation or importation of silver bullion. Every man who at all understands the principles of political economy, must see in a moment, that where property has to be exchanged by means of a circulating medium—where commercial necessities require a circulating medium, there will be the demand for the material which composes, and there will it go.

The gentleman says that where the bullion of the world goes, there will go the commerce of the world; and he seems to infer that the gold takes with it the commerce. But is not that a most absurd proposition? Does not the bullion go where the commerce exists, and where it requires that bullion for a circulating medium for the convenience and necessity of that commerce? The gentleman takes the cause for the effect. This seigniorage will have only this influence upon the exportation and importation of gold and silver: it will induce those who desire to make payments in Europe to make them in bullion; or, if made in coin, it will tend to cause the reimportation of that coin; for if, as before stated, it is worth as much more than the bullion from which it was made as the cost of manufacturing, he who exports it to a market where it is only recognized as bullion, will lose that much, and he who reimports it from such a market to where it can again be used, and is needed as currency, and therefore where it is again worth as much more than the bullion as that cost, will derive a profit. The result will be, that in a few years we shall have an abundant supply of specie currency for the convenience of the country, and a comparatively small coinage will be sufficient to maintain it, whilst now we have an immense coinage at great expense, but a deficiency of specie for circulation.

DELAY OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

SPEECH OF HON. G. S. HOUSTON,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 16, 1853,

In reply to Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, concerning the causes of delay in the transaction of the Public Business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed by the House for the termination of debate on this bill has now arrived, and the gentleman from Alabama, having reported the bill, is, under the rules, entitled to address the committee on it for one hour.

Mr. HOUSTON said: Mr. Chairman, on yesterday when this bill was taken up, it was not my intention to occupy any portion of the hour to which I am entitled under the rules; but the character of the debate which has taken place makes it to some extent necessary that I should make, at least, a brief explanation, and, at the same time, to give, with all proper respect to other gentlemen, my opinion as to the causes of obstruction of the public business.

I regret that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] thought it proper for him to make an assault upon the organization of this House. It seemed to me that his remarks did not come legitimately within the range of a proper debate, and so far did he, in my view, travel out of the line of pertinent discussion, that I am almost led to believe he had some other than the ostensible object in view. I did not suppose that the relations between the honorable gentleman and the Speaker, or between him and the committees of the House, were of such a character as to induce so severe a criticism as that in which he has seen fit to indulge. I am willing to admit that I have not discharged my duty to my own entire satisfaction. I take it, we have but few members who have discharged their entire duty. We all have short-comings. The frailties of our nature are such as to render it almost impossible for any of us to come fully up to our sense of duty. The gentleman possibly reaches the standard fixed by himself. If he does, I congratulate his constituents on having a representative here who, at all times, discharges his duty as the representative of their interest in this House.

I desire to say, in the beginning of my remarks, that upon no occasion during this Congress have I made a motion or given a vote for the purpose of delaying business or postponing proper action on any proposition; and for the correctness of this statement, I appeal to the members, as well as to the Journals of this body. I have usually been punctual in my attendance upon the meetings of the Committee on Ways and Means, and also of this House. I have generally voted upon propositions that have arisen, and in everything (I feel that I can properly say) I have faithfully labored to discharge my duty, and to prove myself worthy of the trust which has been confided to me by my constituents and by this House.

Mr. Chairman, I hope I may be excused for recurring very briefly to the action of this Congress. At the first session, after the formation of committees, every member knows, and none better than the gentleman from Georgia, that the public printing (necessary to enable committees to investigate subjects committed to them) was not executed in due season. The printing of that session is not, up to this period, entirely completed. All of the bills upon which the Committee on Ways and Means could act, in the absence of that printing, were reported to the House within the thirty days prescribed by the rules; and I, as its chairman, was instructed to report to this body, that the reason why some of the bills could not be reported within the prescribed time, was, that we could not examine the various items which they contained in a satisfactory manner without the necessary public documents. I made that report.

If the honorable gentleman had been disposed to accuse me of delinquency, then would have been the time for him to have done it; and it does seem to me as singular that he has postponed the performance of such a task until the close of the Congress, when we are within a few days of separating. If the gentleman will take the trouble to institute an examination, he will find that the Committee on Ways and Means, at the last session, reported the appropriation bills within the usual time, notwihtstanding the difficulties and delays to which I have already called the attention of this committee. The fortification bill was reported as late as July or August. During this session the public printing has been more promptly executed, and the Committee on Ways and Means have, consequently, had better facilities for the investigation of the subjects which have been committed to their charge. Hence, not only the four bills required by the rules to be reported within the first thirty days, but every one for which estimates had been submitted, were reported within that time.

The estimates for the Post Office appropriation bill, as well as those for the ocean mail steam service, were not submitted to Congress until late in January, and within a few days after those estimates were sent to the House of Representatives, the Committee on Ways and Means reported those bills. The question then presents itself, if the bills were thus reported, why were they not acted upon? That brings up the whole difficulty—that is the matter of controversy which has been occupying the attention of the House for the last day or two. Early in March a special order was made, and, with the exception of a few days, special orders were continued, for a portion of the day from that time until about the close of the session. The homestead bill became the special order of the day on the 2d of March, and it was continued until the 12th of May, at which time it passed this House. I do not mean to say that the merits of the bill itself were discussed every day, but that most of the time that measure was ostensibly under consideration.

On the 24th of May, Congress made another special order, appropriating the morning hour to the reception of reports from committees, to the exclusion of all other business. Under that special order the morning hour was mostly occupied for the residue of the session, and not only the morning hour was thus employed, but occasionally bills coming before the House under that order would occupy the whole day.

The question may be asked, why the homestead bill was so long under discussion, and especially when the merits of the proposition were seldom examined in the course of debate? If that question be asked of me, I will turn the inquirer over to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who (as he will remember) voted against and opposed closing that debate, and thereby prevented the House from having an early vote upon the bill and proposed amendments. I thought at the time, and the gentleman himself seems to think now, judging from the course of remark in which he on yesterday indulged, that much the largest portion of that discussion was irrelevant, and therefore useless for any legislative purpose. Upon the occasion when an effort was made to close debate on that bill, so late as the 20th of April, the gentleman voted against it—thereby aiding in a defeat of a proposition looking to the dispatch of business. The gentleman interrupts me now, and says it was a very good discussion, and that he did not vote to stop it at last. Let that be so; I propose to show that he has generally been with those who have opposed efforts to close debate, and in that way has himself been instrumental in the delay and obstruction of business. I am in favor of free and full debates. I like to hear propositions connected with our duties here thoroughly investigated, but I have generally been for closing the debate when it wandered from the issues legitimately arising from the proposition under consideration. My recollection is that the gentleman has usually pursued a different course.

Aside from the special orders to which I have already referred, there were various questions connected with the public printing which came before the House under one of its rules, which authorized the Committee on Printing to report at any time, and in that way making the report a privileged question. After the reports were made, they were generally (and I believe in every instance) debated in the House, and for the time precluded action upon anything else. Gentlemen will remember that the printing propositions created great warmth of feeling on all sides of the House—so much so that the House would not pass from them to other things, even if it had been in order to make a motion for that purpose. During all of the time covered by special orders it was not in order to move the consideration of any other subject—it required unanimous consent to pass from them. The reports from the Committee on Printing in many respects are very similar in effect upon other business to a special order. These were causes of delay at the first session of this Congress, which, under the circumstances, could not well be avoided. Those special orders were made at a time when, I take it for granted, it was not the expectation of the House that they would occupy so much of its time and attention; but when made, they were fastened upon us, and we could not relieve ourselves from the difficulty without obtaining a vote which, under ordinary circumstances, could not be obtained. The gentleman from Georgia in his remarks on yesterday drew a contrast between the condition of things now and the condition of things twenty-five years ago. He said that we ought to have such statesmen here now as we had then. My friend should remember that it is not every district which, in that particular, is equally blessed with his. When the people of a district do the best they can, they should not be assailed either directly or through their representative for having furnished members who do not happen to come up to the high standard of statesmanship set by other gentlemen. I do not think, however, the gentleman's contrast is sustained by the record, and if members of this committee will refer back to the action of Congress, from a very early period of the Government, they will find that at every short session of Congress, the appropriation bills became laws in the very last days of the session in nineteen cases out of twenty—from 1795 up to this time. So far, then, as the gentleman drew a contrast to the disadvantage of Congress at this time, his comparison does not hold good, and is not warranted by the history and facts of the case.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

Mr. HOUSTON. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS. I was not speaking yesterday particularly of the appropriation bills. I was speaking of the vast accumulation of business upon the Speaker's table, which was blocking up everything, and which we all understand. But the gentleman speaks particularly of the appropriation bills. I think he will find himself in an error in regard to the statement he has made. It has been usual for those bills to pass the last day of the session, I grant that; but it has not been usual that they should be so long delayed in this House. They have usually passed this House at an early stage of the session, gone to the Senate, come back, and remained over for amendment. It is usual, and it is not improper, as the gentleman stated this morning, that they should pass the last days of the session, but they ought to have been discussed in this House before and investigated. We are within a few days of the adjournment, and the civil and diplomatic bill is to be forced upon us. A resolution was passed this morning to close debate in one hour upon a bill appropriating millions of dollars. Two months of the session gone, and there has been no investigation of the bill, which is not even read by sections at the Clerk's desk. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means asked to take it up without a first reading, and voted for a proposition to close debate upon it in one hour. That is his system of legislation, of which I complain.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is mistaken in his facts again. I did not propose to close debate in one hour.

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not say the gentleman did. I say the House did.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I proposed the resolution to close this debate. There were some two or three hours yesterday consumed upon this bill, and if any solitary speaker touched a clause in it I am not aware of it.

Mr. STEPHENS. I spoke of the resolution introduced to-day which was to stop debate in one hour. I did not say that the gentleman from Alabama moved it, but I say that he voted for it and the House sustained it.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman understands me and I do him. If his remark is worth anything, it will convey to the House and the country the idea, that there was only one hour's debate allowed on this bill, when the fact is, the bill occupied all day yesterday, except some business in the morning. The gentleman made a speech upon it, and had an opportunity to discuss its features and provisions. Did he propose to ascertain the propriety of appropriating "the millions" of which he speaks? Did he touch the question of these millions at all? Did he propose to call the attention and consideration of the House to any provision of the bill? He did not. Then why should he complain? I did not intend to dispute with the gentleman as to who offered the resolution closing debate—I was not attempting to play upon words. I speak of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES] as a movement of the House, and say that the gentleman is mistaken in his understanding of the facts. It is a mistake to say that debate was stopped on this bill in one hour. There were several hours allowed; and if gentlemen have shown a disposition to debate anything and everything except the bill, then debate should be closed. But the gentleman says I asked that the first reading should be dispensed with. Does he not know that such is the usual practice with appropriation bills? When did an appropriation bill come up in Committee of the Whole that the first reading was not dispensed with by unanimous consent, and its second reading proceeded with for amendments?

Mr. STEPHENS. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman, but I never knew the first reading dispensed with. I recollect very well in the last Congress that the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BURT] held that it was out of order to make such a motion, and the whole bill was read through in the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will not speak of the last Congress. I was not here. The gentleman from Georgia has certainly paid but little attention, in Committee of the Whole, to the appropriation bills. I assure him that so far as I am concerned, I have taken up no appropriation bill since I have been a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, in which we have not, by unanimous consent, dispensed with the first reading. This, however, is an unimportant matter, and I would not have noticed it but for the fact that the gentleman alluded to it as if it were a new thing under the sun, and for the purpose of creating the impression that I am asking the House to do an unusual thing in the progress and dispatch of the public business. But the gentleman says that the appropriation bills have usually passed before this time. In that he is also mistaken. I may not know what he means by "usually." I am at a loss to know whether he intends to apply it to the last Congress, to the Congress before that, or to all preceding Congresses. I have not had an opportunity of examining very carefully upon that point; but I know that at this period of the last Congress, the bills were not so far advanced as they are now, and at the Thirtieth Congress they were but little if any in advance of those bills at a corresponding period of this. It is true that some of the bills that are now unacted upon by the House, were in that Congress disposed of earlier in the session than this; but some of the bills that have been acted upon by the House at this session were unacted upon at the same period of that Congress. It is therefore difficult to say what is usual in regard to the time at which the appropriation bills pass the House.

The gentleman says "everything is pell-mell;" that there is great confusion; that the Speaker fails to do his duty; there is a want of confidence in the heads of committees; the organization of the House is defective; and he gives these things as the cause of the obstruction of business in the House. Mr. Chairman, I would like any gentleman to tell me how the Speaker, or any committee or member of the House, could have cleared the Speaker's table?

Was it possible? Is it possible now? If so, point out the course. Could it have been done in any other way than by the coöperation of a majority of the members of this body? Sir, the responsibility is upon that majority who have cast the votes, and not upon the Speaker, or upon any particular committee or member. My friend from Georgia understands this as well as any one else, and his failure to present it constitutes my main objection to the course of remark in which he has indulged. I think he has failed to present a full statement of our condition, and the causes which led to it. If he had felt it his duty to present more fully the working of our rules, as well as the responsibility of the Presiding Officer, the heads of committees, and the members constituting the House, showing the responsibilty of each, I would have been content to let it pass without comment or reply. I feel that he has not done that; hence I have to commit this trespass upon the time and patience of the House.

The gentleman said the chairmen of the committees ought to have influence enough to get the business before the House. Sir, the appropriation bills are all before the House, and were reported in due time; no one questions that. My own duty, as well as that of the committee over which I have the honor to preside, has been punctually discharged, as well as I or the committee could perform it. The Committee on Ways and Means have gone through a vast deal of labor and investigation in preparing its bills for the action of the House. The bills now upon the Speaker's table are not measures which have proceeded from that committee. They are not bills over which I or that committee have control beyond that which may be exercised by other members; and the Speaker's table cannot be cleared, unless a majority determine that it shall be done, by proceeding in order. If a majority of the House think proper to go to that business, they can do so each day after the morning hour; and if that majority decide to transact other business, with them rests the responsibility, and it is idle to attempt to charge it upon the Speaker, or upon the committees, or individual members.

Mr. Chairman, there are other causes which operate to obstruct and defeat legislation beside those to which allusion has been made. It is not always that even a majority of those who may be present are able to dispatch business. We very frequently find ourselves without a quorum, and have to resort to calls of the House for the purpose of securing the attendance of the number necessary to transact business. And in this connection, I propose to call the attention of gentlemen to a fact, which not only illustrates the view I am endeavoring to present, but also furnishes a very strong commentary which may be useful to my friend from Georgia.

The gentleman from Georgia, on yesterday read some of us a lecture for not discharging our duty, and afterwards, while we were endeavoring to transact business, he absented himself, so that when the committee rose, we found ourselves in the House without a quorum, and consequently unable to pass the Post Office appropriation bill, in part for want of the attendance of that gentleman. He lectures us, and then retires, leaving the House without a quorum, and rendering it unable to take a single step in legislation. Nor is this all. Upon reference to the Journal of yesterday, it will be found that we were occupied for three quarters of an hour, probably longer, in the morning in calling the House, endeavoring to get a quorum. Was the honorable gentleman from Georgia at his post? Where was he? Where was he in the evening? I was here, endeavoring to act upon the measures before us; my friend was not; and although my efforts may be unavailing, and have been too much so to secure the dispatch of business as I desired, yet I am generally here when the House is in session, ready to do what little I can; and if we could only secure the attendance of the gentleman from Georgia, with his ability and his disposition to expedite business; if he would fully act out what we have a right to infer from his remarks, I flatter myself that we should be able to clear the Speaker's table before the end of the session, and accomplish for the good of the country much other necessary legislation. Let us in future, then, have no occasion for a call of the House. Let us obviate the necessity of such a proceeding and the consequent delay of business, by attending every morning at the hour of meeting, and remaining at our posts until the period of adjournment. But I suppose the Speaker is to blame because the gentleman from Georgia was not in his seat yesterday morning? And the Speaker is also to be unceremoniously arraigned and censured because that gentleman did not stay here yesterday afternoon to aid us in passing the Post Office appropriation bill. Or perhaps his absence is chargeable to the heads of committees, or the organization of the House. I should like to know what control the Speaker has over the outgoings and incomings of gentlemen.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion another great cause of the delay of business is what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. NABERS] very properly calls "Buncombe speeches," presidential harangues—party speeches—such debate as was had upon the homestead bill, (except a few of the speeches on that bill,) which the gentleman now says was a very proper one. It was eminently proper, in the estimation of the gentleman, to consume time upon that measure in debating whether General Scott was in the keeping of Seward, or the Democratic aspirants were true to their constitutional duties!

I understand the gentleman as calling that a proper discussion upon a bill proposing to give "land to the landless," as some of the friends of the homestead bill speak of it. Suppose General Scott was under the influence of Seward, was that any reason why you should or should not give the poor man a piece of land? And yet the gentleman maintains that such was a proper and desirable debate, and that it ought not to have been arrested. Sir, I have made no speech wandering from the subject under consideration, further than may have resulted from my want of ability to confine myself within the proper scope. I have made no presidential speeches during this Congress. The House will sustain me in that assertion.

A MEMBER. How will you apply your present speech to the subject under consideration?

Mr. HOUSTON. Sir, I, together with other members, have been assailed as being responsible for the accumulation of bills on the Speaker's table, and I am endeavoring to show that the charge is not well founded. I presume that under these circumstances I will be excused for attempting to set the facts truly before the country. I am presenting facts which, in my judgment, conclusively show that the Committee on Ways and Means have at least labored faithfully in the discharge of its duties. But the gentleman from Georgia says that one reason the business has not been advanced is, that there has been a want of influence in the heads of committees. I believe that is the substance of his remarks. Well, sir, it may be true that they are wanting in influence; but I wish to prove to him that he mistakes the House and mistakes himself. He will recollect that he objected during the last session to my reporting from the Committee on Ways and Means the fortification bill, and the objection rendered it impossible for me to bring the bill before the House. I had a conversation with him upon the subject at the time, and I suppose he will say now, what he frankly said then, that he made that objection because he did not want that bill to pass. Am I right?

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then does not that furnish an argument against his statement? He objected because of his opposition to the bill, and not because he had objection to me. His objection was founded upon principle. He thought the country needed no more fortifications, and his opposition arising from principle, I hardly suppose he would have surrendered or relaxed it for any one. Another member objects, upon principle, to some other bill, and so on until you pass over the entire catalogue of members—all upon principle, and of course not to be yielded up until their judgments are convinced of the utility and propriety of the bill objected to. The purpose of the objection was to defeat the bill, and would not be withdrawn until the opposition to the measure, in the mind of the member objecting, should have been overcome. Now, if the gentleman will pursue that course, why will he not allow other members to do the same thing? There are various other propositions to which other gentlemen object, and their objections being presented and pressed, create delay. During the summer—I think in the month of July—I made several attempts to report that bill, but met with objection until the occasion on which I did report it, when those who had objected were absent.

Mr. STEPHENS. My recollection is that the gentleman presented that bill in the latter part of the month of July.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, I suppose the latter part of July is in the month of July, as well as the early part.

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not wish to get into a discussion with the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means as to his efficiency in discharging his duties. That was not my object. Nor did I design especially to arraign him or the head of any other committee before the House. But the gentleman seems to be going into a defense of himself personally. Well, if he wishes to do that, I will say, that if the Committee on Ways and Means intended to report a fortification bill last session, it was their duty to have reported it long before they did. When they brought forward the measure, out of order, and at the heel of the session, I did avail myself of my right to defeat it in that way.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then the gentleman from Georgia will certainly not complain that other members avail themselves of the same right that he exercised on that occasion, and object to clearing the Speaker's table, or doing any other legislation out of order, if by so doing they can defeat a bill to which they are opposed.

Mr. STEPHENS. Of course I do not.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is one reason why business is delayed, and such action on his part does not seem to be consistent with his complaints of the tardiness of legislation. It is certainly not very proper in him to complain of the delay in reporting a measure, while he, in the exercise of a right conferred upon him by the rules of the House, interposed obstacles to prevent the bill being reported at an earlier day.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I have a word of personal explanation which I desire to make. Yesterday, during the debate in this committee, entertaining proper respect for myself, and I am sure with proper courtesy towards the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] I rose for the purpose of asking a question of him during the time he was addressing the committee. In justice to myself I must state, that when I rose to ask that question I had no intention of exciting any ill-feeling upon the part of the gentleman from Georgia, nor can I believe he so understood me. I rose to ask a question which I supposed, considering the tenor of the remarks he was making, he might properly undertake to answer; but to my surprise the gentleman saw fit to make a personal allusion to myself, which I see reported in the Republic. The only objection I have to that report is the manner in which it stands before the country. The gentleman has just stated that he meant no disrespect to the heads of any of the committees of this House, and I am happy to hear him make that statement. But I will read that portion of the report to which I allude:

"MR MCLANAHAN inquired how a chairman of a committee could make a report unless under the rules. The Committee on the Judiciary had not been called.

"Mr. STEPHENS replied, that if the chairmen of committees had the confidence of the House, they could make their reports.

"Mr. MCLANAHAN said it was to be regretted the heads of committees could not command that confidence. Let the gentleman point them out.

"Mr. STEPHENS replied, that perhaps he might begin at a point which would not be agreeable to the gentleman. He further argued that the neglect of business was owing to the members, and not to the rules."

I remember then to have remarked to the gentleman from Georgia, after he uttered the first sentence in the last paragraph, that I did not interpose any objection to a full and free expression of his opinions upon that subject. The gentleman from Georgia then said that he was replying to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE.] I rose simply for the purpose of saying the report in the Republic was not correct, and having made that statement, I have nothing further to say on the subject.

Mr. HOUSTON. I shall not occupy the time of the committee much longer. I wish, however, to say a word or two in relation to another point which has been presented in the course of this debate. The gentleman from Georgia says he objected to my reporting the fortification bill out of order; will he allow me to tell him that it never was in order, after a very early period of the session—probably March or April—for the Committee on Ways and Means to report at all?

Mr. STEPHENS. The gentleman ought to have reported it long before that.

Mr. HOUSTON. In the opinion, then, of the gentleman, I ought to have reported it before the estimates and explanatory documents were printed, and before the committee could know what the Government required for this branch of the service. If my honorable friend can report bills upon what he deems a proper sense of duty, before he has the necessary data furnished by the proper officers of the Government, I yield to him. I confess I cannot. The gentleman makes an argument founded upon the hypothesis that members vote upon public measures in accordance with their likes or dislikes to the committee or member reporting the bill. Can he be serious in such an argument? If that position be true, I regret it, for it shows a great want of a proper appreciation of the duties and responsibilities of sworn representatives of the people. Under any circumstances, it is not a statement which I should expect a member of this body to make. I take it, there can be no one who would so far stultify himself as to vote for or against a measure, because he might entertain prejudices for or against the member having it in charge. I must think that such an argument does the members of the House, as well as the gentleman himself, great injustice.

Mr. Chairman, as our country expands and enlarges, and our population increases, private interests will multiply in number and expand in magnitude, and as they so multiply you will find greater numbers of them submitted for the legislative action of the Government; and as this accumulation takes place, the various and important private claims will delay, and sometimes defeat public measures. It is inevitable; and no Speaker, whatever might be his talents as a statesman, or his skill as a parliamentarian, can prevent it. Should the Speaker propose to present to the House the bills on his table when not in order, the mere objection of any one member could defeat his proposal; and suppose you were legitimately at the table, and a majority of the House determine that they will go to some other business, could the Speaker, by the exercise of his authority, prevent that majority from carrying their determination into effect? Should the Presiding Officer of this body desire to go to the table and a majority of the members feel opposed to his views, could he compel them to conform to his wish? I can see no force, no propriety, no justice in the position of the gentleman. There are now on the Speaker's table bills combining interests, which together would ordinarily control the vote of this House. I, of course, will not be understood as meaning personal interests of the members. There are the alternate section railroad bills, there are many private bills, together with the French spoliation bill; and when the friends of these various measures, having a common interest, leading them all to the same point, combine, they can go to the business on the Speaker's table, and can, by a vote, carry the House in opposition to the wishes of any committee. And one great cause of the delay in the transaction of business is because all are animated with a desire to get at the bills in which their constituents are so deeply interested; members who are anxious to get at the alternate section land bills, at the French spoliation bill, together wih the private bills in which the constituents of so many are interested.

Sir, I desire that the House should understand the embarrassments under which I have, to a large extent, labored. I cannot think gentlemen are aware of the extent to which these things are carried. Some gentlemen who have charge of, or feel interested in bills upon the Speaker's table, have told me frankly that the appropriation bills could not be passed through the House until the table should be cleared, thus setting up those private bills to delay others. It may be right to do so. I think not, however. I do not mean to charge a corrupt combination. On the contrary, it results from the fact that those particular interests, growing out of measures upon the Speaker's table, induce their respective friends to exert themselves to take those measures up for action; and when a motion to that effect has been carried, and the House takes up a railroad bill, or some other measure, a contest arises, in which interests that commanded the strength to proceed to that business, separate according to the views of members upon the particular proposition taken up. The struggle which then springs up may continue through several days, and at last result in no definite action, and all the time thus occupied is of course lost.

Again: some very intelligent and experienced members think that the appropriation bills should not pass until the close of the session, as was to-day avowed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY.] Estimates are coming in continually. This day I have received estimates of appropriations for the bill now under consideration; and if the objects for which these appropriations are sought be proper and worthy, they should be incorporated in the bills.

Again: every member who has a bill in which his constituents are immediately interested, is desirous of passing it; and for the purpose of obtaining action upon it, they will use every proper effort. They will vote to postpone all other bills to get at those in which their constituents have a more immediate interest. Gentlemen have frequently said to me that they regretted to vote against my efforts to get up the appropriation bills, but they felt bound to get theirs passed if they could; and if they could only get some particular bill through, they would vote with me the remainder of the session whenever I attempted to press forward the general measures. I have had such statements made to me by many members during this session.

But there is still another argument with which I am frequently met. When I have been urging gentlemen to assist me in taking up the appropriation bills, they have told me not to be uneasy; that those bills would be sure to pass; that they never pass until within the few last days of the session; that it has invariably been so. They ask if I have ever known an appropriation bill which really should pass fail for want of time; that such measures are bound to pass; that every member wishes and intends that they shall; but that they wish to get bills through for this, that, or the other purpose. Such reasoning and feelings as these operate to retard the progress of business, and especially to prevent early action upon the appropriation bills.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, that I have had occasion to occupy any of the time of the House upon a subject which is not particularly pleasant to me, is not pertinent to business, and which, therefore, cannot be very interesting to the members of this body. But having been arraigned, in common with the heads of the other committees, I felt it my duty to say this much in reply.

I admit that if I could have had things as I desired them, business would have been in advance of where it is now; but I deny that the appropriation bills have heretofore, for the last fifty years, become laws until near the close of the session, as is the case now. The gentleman says that great changes have come upon the country. Sir, changes have been made everywhere and in almost everything. Changes have been made in this House. Mr. Calhoun is not here, Mr. Webster is not here, Mr. Clay is not here, Silas Wright is not here, John Forsyth, the former representative of the gentleman's present district, is not here; hundreds of other good and great men, who in time past honored and adorned this House by their presence, are not here. Truly, Mr. Chairman, changes have taken place. In that the gentleman and myself are perfectly agreed; but, sir, changes are inevitable, and it is not for us to complain of the decrees of fate, or of evils over which we have no control. We must make the best we can of our present condition; while our hopes, our aspirations, and our efforts, should be directed to the amelioration of the ills that surround us, and the removal of the obstacles that lie in the way of our usefulness. Such is the teaching of philosophy—such the dictate of justice. I assure my honorable friend from Georgia, that while I entertain not in the slightest degree a feeling of unkindness growing out of his strictures, (which I regarded at the time as not entirely necessary to the business then before us,) yet I think he placed me, as well as the Speaker and other members, in a position which was somewhat unfair. I do not suppose that he so intended, but such was the effect of his remarks. Had he made what I deemed a proper statement of the facts of the case, I should have refrained from saying anything upon the subject. I am willing to share, with other gentlemen, in whatever of censure may be due to the action or inaction of this body; but I am unwilling to have the sins of other men (if sins they be) charged exclusively to my account; I fear I shall have quite enough to do in answering for those for which I am properly responsible. Each gentleman should meet his own responsibilities. I am ready to bear those which legitimately fall to my lot, but am entirely unwilling to assume those which should justly rest upon any other gentleman, or upon this House as a body.

RECIPROCAL TRADE.

SPEECH OF HON. AMOS TUCK,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 22 and 23, 1853,

On the bill "establishing Reciprocal Trade with the British North American Colonies upon certain conditions."

Mr. TUCK said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I had more than one reason to be interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FULLER.] I wished to see how well, and in what manner, a free-trade Democrat would argue the question of restriction; and I must confess, though I do not sympathize with the gentleman in the conclusions to which he has arrived, that he has discussed the question quite ably, considering the materials from which his argument has been constructed. I wanted to see in what manner a Representative from Maine, with such a long line of border on the neighboring British Provinces, and a gentleman with all the interests impressed upon his mind which necessarily must be, would attempt to convince this House that restriction was for the benefit of the country. That is the proposition which he has been attempting to establish.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I wish to correct the gentleman. My position was against partial legislation. I divided the proposition, and I wish the gentleman so to understand.

Mr. TUCK. The House will understand both the gentleman and myself. Now, I want to give the gentleman a history of this effort for reciprocity, as I contend it is properly called, and some authorities which are arrayed against him in regard to it. The first authority in relation to the subject to which I will call the attention of the gentleman, is James K. Polk, late President of the United States. The next one, James Buchanan, who recommended reciprocity in respect to the Canadas.

Mr. FULLER. And only the Canadas.

Mr. TUCK. I so stated. This recommendation came to the Thirtieth Congress, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, over which the Hon. Joseph Grinnell presided, received the unanimous approbation of the committee, and a bill was reported to the House, which bill passed the House. It failed in the Senate for want of time.

Mr. FULLER. It included only half of the articles embraced within this bill.

Mr. TUCK. In the last Congress the subject again came up. It was referred to the Committee on Commerce, over which presided the Hon. Robert M. McLane. It received the sanction of that committee, and a bill was reported to the House. It was not acted on by the House, because of the perplexing territorial questions which we all know blocked up the ordinary course of legislation. It is now recommended again, but doubly fortified by considerations growing out of our fishery difficulties. With this reference to the past favor which the main features of the bill have received, I beseech gentlemen on both sides of the House not to vote against the proposition before examining it. The only favor I ask of any gentleman on this floor is not to be misled, either by the arguments of the gentleman from Maine or any other individual, but to examine this question before he condemns it. It has been sanctioned by the authority of previous Congresses, and of men standing deservedly high in the confidence not only of their party, but the people of this country; and I only ask that it be examined before being condemned. It now comes before us with double claims to those which it has ever had heretofore, and I will tell you why: We have now the opportunity of securing reciprocal trade not only with the Canadas, but with the other British Provinces. We have also the important incentive to accept of the terms which are generously offered to us by Great Britain and her Provinces, because, by the proposed arrangement, we obtain a most desirable settlement of the difficulties which have taken place on the fishing grounds. Our fishermen cannot go through another summer without involving themselves in serious difficulties with the people of the Provinces. I am not going to use any threatening argument, by saying that war will ensue unless the fishermen are quieted, but I believe that there is danger of bloodshed. There will be no war; for, although the sympathies of our people are as intimately connected with the fishermen as with any other class of our inhabitants, yet our people will not tolerate any war except for causes which will arouse the whole country, and the fishermen will endure as long as endurance is a virtue.

The advantage in respect to the fisheries which is offered to us is this: In the convention with Great Britain in 1818, there was a provision by which we relinquished the right to fish within three miles of the shore of the British Provinces, with a few trifling exceptions. Now the mackerel fishing cannot be successfully pursued without going within three miles of the shore. At that time the mackerel fishery was not an interest which required to be considered in that convention, because mackerel were as abundant on the coast of New England as any other portion of the world. But in 1828, or 1830, mackerel began to disappear from our coast, and our fishermen followed them down to the coast of the British Provinces. They have been pursuing that trade since; but there have been difficulties attending its pursuit for the last twenty years. These difficulties have been adjusted from time to time, by the earnest endeavors of the authorities of both Governments to preserve peace, and to settle all difficulties in a spirit of liberality which has characterized both parties. It is impossible to pursue the mackerel fishery without occasionally going within three miles from the shore. Unless we have this privilege, to enjoy the shore fishery without annoyance—which we do not now have—the mackerel fishery will be broken up, and that important nursery for American seamen will be destroyed.

The British Government proposes to give us the privileges of the shore fishery, and also the right to cure on shore the fish caught, provided this reciprocity proposition is acceded to by our Government. The offer that is now made, comes with tenfold the encouragement, and tenfold the reason for its acceptance, which existed when the first overture received the sanction of the House of Representatives of the Thirtieth Congress, or the sanction of the Committee on Commerce of the last session. We can obtain important rights by accepting this reciprocity proposition. I believe it will accord with the judgment of each and every member of the House who will examine it. If it does not receive the support of every one who thoroughly examines it, I am confident it will be in consequence of some supposed local hardship, and not from a doubt of the general interests of the whole country.

I desire to put this question on the broadest national grounds. And I wish now, for the benefit of the gentleman from Maine, and the information of the whole House, as evidence of the nationality of the proposition, to refer to a few authorities of a different character to those to which I have already called your attention. The North American Review has contained one or more articles, written with signal ability, urging this matter upon the attention of Congress, and sustaining the same by arguments applicable to the whole country, and appreciable by every friend of general development and prosperity. Hunt's Merchants' Magazine, a journal which all know stands deservedly high in every part of the country, has also argued the same question with great earnestness and ability. De Bow's Southern and Western Review, printed at New Orleans, has contained very able articles of the same tenor on this subject; and the Charleston Mercury has lately, as I am told, promulgated similar views, and joined the general approbation in favor of reciprocal trade.

With these proofs that this measure is regarded as national in its character, and as likely to be generally beneficial, I am sorry to witness the effort of the gentleman from Maine to brand it as a sectional proposition, and to prejudice the House against it by calling it a railroad and manufacturing scheme.

I admire the gentleman's art in attempting to give it a character at the outset of his argument, which should arouse the prejudice of some parts of the country. But I condemn his object much more than I admire his skill. Let every question stand on its own merits. Let this measure stand or fall by the judgment of the representatives of the American people, without any resort to efforts of that sort to give it a bad name. If it were in fact a railroad proposition, I should expect to find the gentleman from Maine advocating it. The great thoroughfare from the city of Portland to Montreal—the Atlantic and St. Lawrence railroad—will be more benefited than any other railroad by any increase of commerce with the Provinces. If, therefore, reciprocity be a railroad scheme, the State of Maine is most interested, and the gentleman ought to advocate it, instead of attempting to defeat it.

Neither is there any justice in the attempt to convince the House that it is to be mainly advantageous to manufacturers. I am sure it will benefit our manufacturers materially, because it will give us new customers, and open to those customers the way of bringing to us something with which to make their purchases. But it is no scheme to benefit manufacturers, except by the additional prosperity which it is to give to the whole community. The representatives of some of the manufacturing districts have doubts, I am sorry to say, about the scheme; yet I am confident, those doubts will be removed when they have found time to examine more carefully the bill and report under consideration.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] has signally failed in giving any proof to this House which can satisfy them that this is a sectional measure, or that it is to be exclusively beneficial to railroads or manufactures. He has, however, demonstrated to this House the character and the sole cause of his opposition to it. The lumber interest, and the plaster of Paris interest, embrace the alpha and omega of his argument. Yes, sir, in order to maintain a monopoly of lumber in the State of Maine, in which there are not more than five hundred men interested, he would shape the legislation of the entire country, and abandon his favorite doctrines of free trade.

Mr. FULLER. I would like to have the gentleman's authority for that. I say that there are more than forty thousand men interested in that trade.

Mr. TUCK. If you count the day laborers, there may be thousands interested in the lumber business; but the wages of such will not be diminished or increased by the passage of this bill. If you count the holders of land only, I have good reason to say, and I challenge contradiction, that there are not more than five hundred in the whole country who are interested in the Maine lumber monopoly;—in that restriction and anti-free trade which the gentleman argues so zealously. He sees his own citizens engaged in building railroads in order to have that intercourse which is desirable between the Provinces and the sea-board; and yet he comes here and argues for the lumber interest and the $100,000 invested in plaster of Paris, against intercourse and in favor of restriction. I am not disappointed to find the gentleman arguing what he thinks to be the interests of his constituency with earnestness and zeal, although those interests are, in my opinion, adverse to the general good.

But I am astonished to see that the gentleman from Maine will desert his avowed principles of Democracy, as I have always understood them to be, for the sake of the plaster of Paris and the lumber. Here is an amendment which the gentleman has introduced so as to give the go-by to reciprocity, and to maintain restriction. Its object is to prevent action. I wish it to be understood distinctly, that the gentleman must know as well as others, that the only purpose which his proposition can accomplish is to defeat any reciprocity bill, and any and every settlement of the fishery troubles. His amendment has an aspect of reciprocity, but it does not mean anything, except opposition to reciprocity. Restriction for the benefit of lumber and plaster of Paris is its whole purport and object.

I wish to refer, in a few words, to the amendment which my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SABINE] proposes to offer to this bill. He had the kindness to show it to me. If I understand it correctly, it is substantially like the bill proposed by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] in the Senate. The main proposition seems to be this: if Great Britain and the Provinces will give us the same rights of fishery they themselves enjoy, we will give them the right to go upon our fishing grounds, and the right to import their fish into our market. I trust that Congress will not make such an unreasonable proposition to the Provinces as this. It is a matter of surprise to me that such a thing has been seriously contemplated. What! a proposition to be made to these Provinces, that we will admit them to our fishing grounds, where we cannot catch good fares of fish ourselves, provided they will admit us to their fishing grounds, where we can catch good fares, and where we must go if we make the mackerel fishery a profitable or saving business! To admit their fish into our markets is a consideration entirely inadequate to the advantages we shall gain.

I have repeatedly referred, Mr. Speaker, to the report and bill which is before this House. In relation to the report, I will relieve my own mind, by expressing the obligations which I feel as a member of this House, to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SEYMOUR,] for the able manner in which this proposition of reciprocity and fisheries has been examined and set forth in his report. The subject is ably presented, as a national measure, and its connection with the agricultural, manufacturing, and the general interests of the country, is successfully shown by statistics, details, and conclusions, which cannot be resisted. It is only necessary to read his report in order fully to understand the general importance of the subject, and that all interests may well unite in its support. The report is a document of signal ability, and if the gentleman from New York, in retiring from Congress at the close of this session, (which I hope he will not do,) should leave no other monument, this report would be an honorable and an enduring evidence of his statesmanship, ability, and expanded views.

In this connection, permit me to refer to another document on the subject under consideration, which has attracted my attention, and which I have examined to some extent with great profit and pleasure. It is a report made to the Secretary of the Treasury, by Mr. J. D. Andrews, who has given the last two or three years solely to the business of collecting statistics, and of laying them before the Treasury Department, relative to trade with the British Provinces, from the extreme northwest to the Atlantic ocean, and to facts and statistics relating to the fisheries. Mr. Andrews's last report constitutes Senate document No. 112, and is a production evincing great industry, great ability, and great success in mastering the subject committed to his investigation. The Secretary was fortunate in employing so competent a person to make these investigations, and to collect the facts set forth in this document. I have it in my hand, and I commend it to the perusal of gentlemen, assuring them that it is a production of no ordinary interest and value.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] has stated that the bill under consideration will not secure actual reciprocity. By reading the bill its character can be correctly understood:

A BILL establishing reciprocal trade with the British North American Colonies upon certain conditions.

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever the Government of Great Britain shall agree with the Government of the United States that the people of the United States shall enjoy unmolested, the same rights to take fish of every kind in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, on the coasts and shores of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, and Cape Breton, New Brunswick and Prince Edward's Island, and of any and all other the British possessions in North America, and in all the bays, gulfs, creeks, and waters, or places of the sea, bordering on and adjacent to the British possessions in North America, and to dress, cure, and dry the same on the coasts and shores of any part of the British possessions in North America, as are or shall, from time to time, hereafter be enjoyed by subjects of Great Britain, subject, however, to the rights of the proprietors or possessors of the ground where said fish may be dressed, cured, or dried; and whenever the Government of Great Britain shall agree with the Government of the United States that all leases of fishing rights or privileges, and lands necessary for the enjoyment of the same, made by British subjects to any of the people of the United States, shall have the same force and effect as if made to British subjects; and whenever the Government of Great Britain, with the consent of the Government of the Provinces of Canada and New Brunswick, shall agree with the Government of the United States that the people of the same, in American bottoms, and with boats, rafts, and vessels of every description, may use and navigate the river St. Lawrence, and the river St. John, in New Brunswick, from their sources to the ocean, together with all canals and waters connecting the great northern lakes with the Atlantic ocean through the river St. Lawrence, as the same now are or hereafter may be enjoyed by the subjects of Great Britain, subject only to the charges and regulations which now exist, or shall hereafter be prescribed, for the use and navigation of the same by the inhabitants of the British provinces in North America or other British subjects; and whenever the Government of New Brunswick, with the consent of the Government of Great Britain, shall abolish all export duties on lumber cut on lands within the territory of the United States, and transported down the river St. John and exported thence; and whenever the President of the United States shall issue his proclamation declaring that the articles hereinafter enumerated, being of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States, are admitted into the British North American provinces by law free of duty;—that on and after that day the like articles being of the growth, production, or manufacture of the said British North American provinces, shall be admitted into the United States free of duty, when imported directly from such provinces, so long as the said enumerated articles are admitted into such British North American provinces when imported directly from the United States free of duty, or until otherwise directed by the Government of the United States, to wit: Grains, flour, and breadstuffs of all kinds, seeds, unmanufactured hemp, unmanufactured flax and tow, animals of all kinds, undried fruits, fish of all kinds, dried, smoked, salted, and fresh; meats, salted, smoked, and fresh; hides, sheep-pelts, wool, butter, cheese, tallow, lard, horns, manures, ores of all kinds, stone and marble in its crude or worked state, gypsum, ground or unground, ashes, firewood, agricultural implements, including axes; fish oil, broom-corn, bark, unwrought burr-stones, dyestuffs, rice, cotton, unmanufactured tobacco, unrefined sugar.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the President of the United States shall issue his proclamation declaring that the Government of Great Britain has agreed with the Government of the United States that round, hewed, and sawed timber of all kinds, and all lumber of every description, the growth and production of the United States when exported directly therefrom to the British West India islands, shall, during the continuance of the reciprocal trade provided for by this act, be admitted into the ports of said islands at no higher duty than shall be imposed in such ports on similar articles when imported into said islands from the British North American provinces, that on and after that day, round, hewed, or sawed timber of all kinds, and all sawed lumber of every description, undressed and unmanufactured in any way, the growth and production of the British North American provinces, when they shall by law admit into their ports free of duty the articles named in the first section of this act as therein provided, shall be admitted into the United States, when imported directly from said provinces, free of duty, so long as similar articles, the growth and production of the United States, shall, when exported from the United States, be admitted free of duty into the ports of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or until otherwise directed by the Government of the United States; and when any duty is or shall be charged in the ports of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland upon such articles so as aforesaid imported directly from the United States, the same duty shall be charged upon round, hewed, or sawed timber of all kinds, and all sawed lumber of every description, undressed and unmanufactured in any way, when imported from said provinces directly into the ports of the United States.

February 23, 1853.

Mr. TUCK resumed: Mr. Speaker, I had nearly concluded my remarks, when I was arrested by the expiration of the morning hour on yesterday. At the close of the last session of Congress, in accordance with my convictions of duty, I published a speech upon the subject of the fisheries and reciprocity with the British Provinces. In that speech I set forth at length my views upon this subject, and I do not, therefore, feel inclined to occupy the whole of the hour to which I am entitled under the rule, but knowing the feeling of the House, and their indisposition at this late period of the session to listen to any discussion at length upon any subject, I will conclude with a few additional remarks.

I have heard an objection made to this bill, reported by the Committee on Commerce, because of its supposed injurious effects upon the agricultural interests of the North and West; particularly with regard to the article of flour. Now, upon this subject I invite the attention of the House for one minute. Sir, I will state one fact, which I think will inevitably remove the objections that any of the friends of the flour interest can possibly entertain to this bill. It is supposed, that if we have reciprocal trade with the British Provinces, they will raise a surplus of wheat, and send it to the United States overland. Now, sir, is this fact covered by the statistics of the country, and from the reports of the Treasury Department? We find in the report of the Committee on Commerce, upon this matter of reciprocity, the statement "that the lower colonies, Nova Scotia, New 'Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and New-'foundland, have been among the best customers 'of American breadstuffs. The market which 'they have afforded is equal to that of Brazil. 'Our exports of breadstuffs to these colonies in '1852 amounted to $1,659,285, and to Brazil '$1,655,558."

I state the further fact, that we pay a duty upon this flour which we have exported to these Provinces, varying from twenty-five to seventy-five cents per barrel. Now I would ask gentlemen if it can possibly prejudice the interest of the wheat-growing portion of this country to have reciprocal free trade with these Provinces, when we now, in spite of the duty, export so largely to these Provinces? All fear on this subject must be removed by the statement of this one fact, that Brazil is a very important consumer of our flour, and yet we export, as I have before mentioned, more flour to these Provinces annually than we do to the whole of Brazil.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] has proposed an amendment to this bill, the design of which is, as I understand it, to open the coasting trade of the whole country to British competition. I do not understand the amendment exactly, but I suppose that to be the purport of his proposition. Now I would ask the gentleman from North Carolina if he would favor such a proposition as this, unless Great Britain will admit us to a free competition in her coasting trade?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Such are the terms of my amendment.

Mr. TUCK. The gentleman would not, and no man who sympathizes with the interests of his country, would hazard his reputation by making and supporting such a proposition here. But the gentleman has no reason to believe that England would admit us to a competition in their coasting trade on the coast of England. We have no proposition of that kind from the British Government. This matter of reciprocal trade is one thing, and the opening of the coasting trade is another. When it is necessary to consider this latter subject, let the gentleman be heard upon it; let him then bring forward his proposition and argue it with his usual ability, and let the judgment of the House be taken upon it; but I ask the gentleman not to bring it forward now.

Now, I wish to say one word in relation to the lumber trade. I beg leave to differ with the gentleman from Maine in regard to the prejudicial effects which this bill may have upon the lumber interest. The lumber interests are amply provided for in this bill. How? The head waters of the river St. John are in the land belonging to Maine, and there is around those [illegible] large lumber interest. The lumber cannot now be taken under that river through the Provinces, without paying a duty. There is a provision in that bill that the duty shall be abolished. That is one of the advantages which this bill affords to the lumber interest; and the gentleman from Maine will observe that in the second section of the bill there are other provisions for the security of that interest, among which is one that provides that lumber shall be admitted into the ports of the West Indies duty free.

Now, I contend that it is demonstrable satisfactorily to the mind of every man from every part of the country, that this bill cannot operate to their prejudice, but will be as generally useful to all interests as any bill that can be brought before the country; and take it in the long run, the gentleman's constituents—those lumber dealers—will be better off by the passage of this bill. And, after the lapse of a few years, when this lumber will have been cut off from the Maine lands, the gentleman's constituents will empower him, or his constituents will come here and contend as ably for reciprocity as he now does against it. It is true that this bill is not as perfect as I should like it in some particulars, and I have been almost tempted to offer an amendment to the bill providing that coal and iron castings shall be included. It would be decidedly beneficial to my constituents, and to New England generally, if such provisions were incorporated into the bill.

But I wish to call the attention of the wakeful Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania, to the fact, that if in following out the indefinite fears which haunt their imagination, they, by their opposition, defeat this bill, probably another Congress will not pass by without having a reciprocity adopted, including coal and iron free. If sir, this bill should now fail, and it should be my fortune again to occupy a place upon this floor, I should sustain a bill which provides for a more comprehensive reciprocity.

I wish to make one remark in reference to my own views upon the subject of protection. I believe that protection is a temporary policy. I have never believed that it would be a permanent policy. But there is no need of protection between two countries lying side by side, in which the labor of one is equally expensive as the labor of the other, and in which money in one is equally abundant as in the other. There is no need of our protecting ourselves against Canada. There is no need of our protecting ourselves against any country that lies coterminous to us upon this continent. And sir, I would give my support to-day for a great system which should deserve the name of an American system of free trade in respect to countries that lie adjacent to us. But we cannot adopt that policy in reference to the countries of Europe where labor and money is cheap, and I am happy to know that there are no gentlemen in the country who argue, with any great appearance of seriousness, for such a policy.

THE HOMESTEAD BILL.

SPEECH OF HON. SPEPHEN ADAMS,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE SENATE, February 24, 1853,

Against an amendment proposed by Mr. WALKER to the Pacific Railroad bill, as containing all the principles of the Homestead bill.

Mr. ADAMS said: Mr. President, the amendment under consideration, proposing, as it does, a disposition of the public lands, I shall avail myself of the liberty it affords to give my views on the various propositions pending before the Senate, for the disposition of the public domain. I shall first consider the bill which has acquired the title, by common consent, of the "homestead bill;" a term which gives it a popularity throughout the land that no other could confer. Perhaps there is no name, save that of wife, children, or friends, that is hallowed by so many endearing associations as that of the family homestead. It forms a common platform on which the affections of all—the rich and the poor, the old and the young, meet as upon a level. Every Senator in this Chamber, yielding to the impulses of his own heart, will testify to the truth of the poet's decla-

"[illegible]"

Every cottager's heart in this broad land beats responsively to its truth; and as we all take delight in conferring benefits upon the necessitous, I feel confident that every Senator on this floor is disposed to vote for the bill when it shall be taken up, or for some proposition that will embody substantially the great object sought to be attained by it, if he can do so consistently with his duty to the Constitution and the country.

I propose, sir, to enter upon a brief examination of our powers over the public domain, and our duty upon the important question of its proper disposition. I assume the position as a postulate, that the public lands have been acquired by the common blood and treasure of all the States of the Union—that the citizens of each State have a common interest in the fund, and that Congress is the trustee, charged with the duty of disposing of the lands in such manner as shall best promote the interests of all, without doing injustice to any. The power of Congress over the public domain differs materially from its power over money in the Treasury. If the best interests of the cestui que trust will be promoted by it, it is not only the right of Congress, but it is its duty to give the lands away. But we have not the power to collect money in the form of taxes to give away, for the conclusive reason that the Constitution has not conferred the taxing power for any such purpose, and we cannot appropriate money when collected and in the Treasury for any other object than that for which we were authorized to collect it. With this view of the power and duty of Congress over the subject, I proceed to consider the merits of the bill. The object sought to be attained by the bill is, that every head of a family shall have and enjoy one hundred and sixty acres of the public land upon his or her making the application in due form, taking an oath that he or she is the head of a family, and not the owner of any estate in lands, and with the additional requirement that the applicant shall occupy and cultivate the same for five consecutive years; that after all these requisites shall have been complied with, a patent shall issue. These are the leading features of the bill.

Mr. President, I am by no means certain that it would not be a money-making operation, having in view its effects on imposts, to give to actual settlers the public lands, in preference to the present mode of selling them at $1 25 per acre. Bear in mind that the Government has adopted the principle of raising revenue for its support almost exclusively from duties on imports. Then go with me to the dwelling of the poor man, who feels that he is but a tenant at will either of the Government or of a wealthy speculator. Observe that man toiling for years upon a rented farm; he pays one third of the proceeds of his labor to his landlord, and nine years out of ten he secures but a scanty subsistence for his family. His improvements, repairs, and cultivation of the soil, are carried on from year to year to meet present wants. Not knowing what a day may bring forth, his labors look not to the future for their fruition. But, sir, let some fortunate turn in his affairs occur, so that he is enabled to secure a freehold in his own right, and you will see him work with a new energy. His improvements are made with a view to permanence, knowing that he, and those who are most dear to him, will reap the benefits of his labors in years to come. His farm is enlarged, his property improves, he begins to count the years when his orchard will yield its various fruits, his garden blooms, his children are educated, he has artificial wants which he knew not before, he is able to purchase and pay for imported goods, and by these means the receipts in your Treasury are swelled far beyond his contribution of two hundred dollars for his one hundred and sixty acres of land, which when once paid, he never pays again.

As many of the Senators from the older States are not personally acquainted with the characters of those who are intended to be the beneficiaries of this bill, and with the privations they are compelled to endure, I shall be pardoned for adverting briefly to them. In the first place, your lands are absolutely worthless in the wilderness, until the pioneer prepares the way for others. By his enterprise and labor he makes the settlement attractive, and your contiguous lands [illegible] This [illegible] government. But when you add to this, that our complex yet model Government is maintained and supported by the confidence and affection of the people, we see that it is the highest duty of the Government, no less than its true policy, to afford every facility for its citizens to become freeholders, because by having an interest in the soil, you increase their interest in the Government.

I have witnessed scenes at land sales that convinced me of the love of the settler to his house. I have seen men attend such sales who had encountered all the toils, hardships, and privations of a frontier life; who, knowing the Government price, had managed, by pinching economy, to save barely enough to pay for the quarter section on which they had erected their humble hut, cleared and fenced a small field. If the speculator should bid one dollar above the Government price, their homestead was swept away, and their wives and children left without a shelter to protect them from the pelting storm. I have witnessed the settler as the crier, proceeding in numerical order, approached his tract; I have gazed upon his anxious countenance giving expression to alternate hopes and fears, while his heart beat responsively to his alarm and apprehension. And as his home was struck down to him, I have witnessed the glow of joy with which his countenance was lit up, as he turned from the stand and retraced his steps, to convey the good news to his expectant wife and children, that his improvement had become the family homestead. They only can appreciate such a picture and realize its truth, who have felt the sting of poverty, and witnessed the scenes I have attempted to describe.

And, sir, it is no fancy sketch that I have presented to your view, but one of the sober realities of everyday frontier life. Nay more, sir, the settler is honest, kind-hearted, and hospitable. If the stranger or weary traveler calls on him, he is "taken in," not in any doubtful sense, but with cheerfulness and a hearty welcome, which more than compensates for his homely fare. He never forgets a favor, either from an individual or the Government. I recollect an occasion at a land sale, of being requested by some settlers to bid off their lands for them. I did so. Some years afterwards I was canvassing for the office of circuit judge. On approaching a certain neighborhood, I met a man with whom I was unacquainted, but when I made myself and the object of my visit known, he remarked that I need not go into his neighborhood seeking votes; that they had learned that I was a candidate; that they remembered me as having aided some of the settlers in purchasing their homes, and that they all intended to vote for me. I did not lose a vote at that box. I allude to this incident, in passing, to prove the truth of my remark, that these people are never ungrateful.

Sir, I have not overstated the attachment of the settler to his homestead. If misfortune overtakes him, he will surrender all his other property before his homestead. A lady will yield to her husband's creditors her carriage, and other valuables almost without a murmur, but when you come to take the homestead, that spot which has become endeared to her by so many associations, the deep-drawn sigh and the unbidden tear attest the strong hold it has upon the human heart.

Mr. President, I cordially approve the object of this bill, and appreciate the anxiety of its friends for its passage, and I think I shall not fall behind them in any proper effort to make glad the hearts of the poor. But neither this, nor any other object good in itself, should be attained at the expense of justice. I have some objections to the bill, which I shall proceed to state. In the first place, it is not founded on the proper basis. I respectfully submit, that the correct principle for the disposition of this trust fund, is to sell it to actual settlers at cost. Let us so dispose of it as to provoke no complaints from the old States, that they have paid for these lands, and the new States have reaped the benefits of them. Graduate the price according to their value by such a scale as will restore to the Treasury every dollar of the cost of acquisition, survey, sale, and incidental expenses; but let not the Government turn land speculator. Every principle of good [illegible] generosity, as [illegible] your citizens, forbid it. I acknowledge the plausibility of the claim of the old States to a portion of the proceeds of sales of the public lands. But sir, it seems to me that if the people of those States will reflect upon the privations and toils of the early settlers in the new States in making the lands valuable—if they will recollect that these settlers are their children, (for the new States are composed of emigrants from the old,) they will come to the conclusion to which I have arrived, that the lands should not be sold on speculation. There is something abhorrent to every generous mind in the idea of this Federal Government speculating upon the homesteads of her citizens, and that class of her citizens, too, who have the strongest claim upon her paternal regard and fostering care.

My opinion upon this subject is formed upon the reflections and observations of my life, and I am confirmed in the correctness of them when I find that they are in accordance with the views and recommendations of President Jackson. That illustrious patriot, sagacious statesman, and just man, in his message of the 4th December, 1832, says:

"It seems to me to be our true policy that the public lands shall cease, as soon as practicable, to be a source of revenue, and that they be sold to settlers in limited parcels, at a price barely sufficient to reimburse to the United States the expense of the present system, and the cost arising under our Indian compacts."

* * * * * * * * * * *

"The adventurous and hardy population of the West, besides contributing their equal share of taxation under our impost system, have, in the progress of our Government, for the lands they occupy paid into the Treasury a large proportion of $40,000,000, and of the revenue received therefrom but a small part has been expended among them. When, to the disadvantage of their situation in this respect, we add the consideration that it is their labor alone which gives real value to the lands, and that the proceeds arising from their sale are distributed chiefly among States which had not originally any claim to them, and which have enjoyed the undivided emolument arising from the sale of their own lands, it cannot be expected that the new States will remain longer contented with the present policy after the payment of the public debt. To avert the consequences which may be apprehended from this cause, to put an end forever to all partial and interested legislation on this subject, and to afford to every American citizen of enterprise the opportunity of securing an independent freehold, it seems to me, therefore, best to abandon the idea of raising a future revenue out of the public lands."

This statement of facts made by President Jackson in his annual message is, to my mind, unanswerable, and I now propose to adopt his recommendation. Twenty years after its delivery I find it to be as true in fact and sound in principle as it was on the day it was read to the two Houses of Congress. I shall at the proper time move to strike out from the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following as a substitute:

That all of the public lands of the United States shall be subject to sale and entry at one dollar per acre, and any portion which shall have been in market for five years or upwards, prior to the time of application to enter the same under the provisions of this act, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale at the price of seventy five cents per acre; and all the lands of the United States that shall have been in market for ten years or upwards, as aforesaid, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale at fifty cents per acre; and all of the lands of the United States that shall have been in market for fifteen years or upwards, as aforesaid, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale at twenty-five cents per acre; and all of the lands of the United States that shall have been in market for twenty years and upwards, as aforesaid, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale at ten cents per acre; and all lands of the United States that shall have been in market for twenty-five years or more, shall be subject to sale at five cents per acre: Provided, This section shall not be so construed as to extend to lands reserved to the United States, in acts granting land to States for railroad or other internal improvements, or to mineral lands held at over one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That upon every reduction in price, under the provisions of this act, the occupant and settler upon the lands shall have the right of preemption at such graduated price, upon the same terms, conditions, restrictions, and limitations upon which the public lands of the United States are now subject to the right of preemption, until the next graduation or reduction shall take place; and if not so purchased, shall again be subject to right of preemption for twelve months as before, and so on from time to time, as reductions take place: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to interfere with any right which has or may accrue by virtue of any act granting preemption to actual settlers upon public lands.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That any person applying to enter any of the aforesaid lands under the provisions of the eighth and ninth sections of this act, shall be required to make affidavit before the register or receiver of the proper land office, that he or she enters the same for his or her own use, and for the purpose of actual settlement and cultivation, or for the use of an adjoining farm or plantation, owned or occupied by him or herself, and together with said entry, he or she has not acquired from the United States, under the provisions of this act, more than three hundred and twenty acres according to the established surveys; and if any person or persons taking such oath or affidavit shall swear falsely in the premises, he or she shall be subject to all the pains and penalties of perjury: Provided, That any person entitled to a preemption shall be authorized to enter forty acres of the public land, to include the dwelling-house, at ten cents per acre."

Mr. President, in the amendment which I shall propose, I have preserved the principle set forth in General Jackson's message. If it possesses any merit it is due to his memory, not to me. The graduation proposed will certainly reimburse the Treasury. I think it will rather exceed it. But it is impossible to arrive at any certainty either as to the amount of the expenditures or the receipts under a graduation system, such as I propose. We know, however, that the receipts into the Treasury from the sales of the public domain amounted to upwards of one hundred and thirty-one millions of dollars in 1847, and now amounts to near one hundred and forty millions. We know, too, that the sales of the lands ceded by the Chickasaws, where alone the graduation principle has been tested, and the price of the land reduced to twelve-and-a-half cents per acre, has resulted in bringing into the Treasury a larger sum than the sales in the same extent of territory anywhere else has done. Sir, the practical operations of the graduation system in the Chickasaw cession has often been the subject of discussion in both ends of this Capitol, and until the system becomes general, and its beneficent influence is made to spread over your whole public domain, it will continue to be adduced as triumphant proof that it is the true principle for the disposition of the public lands. It is owing to this system that the Chickasaw counties in Mississippi have become so densely populated. Thousands of men, poor, no doubt, but happy, contented, and prosperous, are now scattered over those counties, whose homestead have cost them but twenty dollars. For that sum of money they have been enabled to purchase one hundred and sixty acres of land—not rich land, it is true—but having ten or twenty acres of fair cultivable soil, on which they are now supporting their families. Search the habitable globe, and I defy you to find a country where a man is in the enjoyment of civil and religious liberty, that opens such facilities to your citizens for becoming freeholders, as the Chickasaw counties have for many years presented, in consequence of the system of graduation in the price of those lands.

Sir, I think my proposition has many advantages over the House bill. In the first place, it does no injustice to any State or individual in the United States. In the next, it does full justice to a meritorious class of our citizens, and I believe, if the sense of those who are intended to be benefited by the act were taken upon the subject, a large majority of them would prefer my amendment to the original bill. The bill gives to the man who has no land one hundred and sixty acres, while his neighbor, who by his industry may have secured a tract of forty acres, is excluded from its benefits because he is not a landless man in the common parlance of the day, and must pay $150 to increase his tract to the size of that of his more fortunate neighbor. It is only necessary to state the objection for every one to see its force. Again: the bill requires the party to reside on the land for five consecutive years before he can become entitled to his patent. This feature of the bill is very objectionable to many persons. While perhaps every man who settles a tract of new land, fully expects to occupy it continuously for five years, yet it is very repugnant to him to take it clogged with such a condition. He wishes to be at liberty to sell out and settle a new place, should his location prove unhealthy or the neighborhood not be agreeable to him, or for any other cause that suits his fancy. He would greatly prefer paying the price I propose, with the privilege of selling at pleasure, rather than have his land given to him embarrassed with the restrictions of the bill. And more especially is this true, when his homestead can only be obtained by the oath of insolvency. Sir, I have always had an unconquerable aversion to the insolvent debtor's oath. It is galling enough to the just pride of an unfortunate man to be compelled to admit his poverty to creditors, and those who are yet more keenly to suffer by it—wife and children; but it is cruel to compel or require him to go before an officer of the law and swear to it. Many proud-spirited men who would be entitled to the provisions of this act, would refuse it on such terms.

The graduation principle was recommended by President Polk, advocated by Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Walker, passed at different times by this body, and has been sustained by such unanswerable arguments in this and the other branch of Congress, to say nothing of its practical advantages where it has been tested, that I deem it useless to consume the time of the Senate in offering further arguments of my own, or in repeating those of others, in its support. Every Senator is aware of the fact, that when a new country is surveyed and brought into market, every tract worth the Government price is entered and paid for in less than five years, and the sales after that test of its value are owing to the improvements of the pioneer settlers, by which an enhanced value is imparted to the contiguous lands. In a vast number of instances, these contiguous lands become necessary to enlarge the farms of the settlers for stock ranges, &c., when, in fact, the lands are not worth, intrinsically, the money paid for them.

In this way, and for these reasons, the Government has extorted millions from her citizens. I trust no one desires to see it longer continued.

My proposition is a more liberal one to the settler than any that has been heretofore made. Since the origin of our land system, public sentiment has undergone a great change with regard to the true policy of disposing of the lands. The first plan was to sell the lands to the highest bidder, giving the occupant no preference by preemption or otherwise, and fixing the minimum price at two dollars per acre. This policy was pursued till 1820, when it yielded to a more just and liberal one, by which the price was reduced to $1 25 per acre, and secured a right of preëmption to the actual settler upon payment of that sum. Much of your lands have been in market at that price for thirty years, and remain unsold, for the obvious reason that it is not worth the price you ask for it, and I might safely add, never will be, unless in the progress of railroad improvements, a demand should arise in specially-favored districts of country. The man who would hold his rich and poor, valuable and valueless lands at the same inflexible price, would be considered a very unwise land operator. What would be unwise in an individual, seeking to increase his own gains, is surely still more so in the Government, which does not or should not seek to replenish its Treasury at the expense of the best class of its citizens.

As the price was reduced from $2 to $1 25 thirty-three years ago, it is quite time that it should be reduced to $1 per acre, and then graduated as proposed by my amendment. If you will adopt this amendment as a substitute for the original bill, and the House concurs, as I have no doubt it will, not a whisper of discontent will be heard throughout this broad land. Our people have never been known to complain of Congress for doing justice to her citizens. By the adoption of this amendment you will do not only an act of justice, but you place homesteads within the reach of thousands who cannot obtain them under the present law. And what is equally as important, you present him no temptation to forfeit his self-respect. Men do not like to become paupers upon the Government, unless I have utterly mistaken the characters of those with whom I have lived all my life. I firmly believe that this amendment would not only be more acceptable to the people generally, but would be hailed with more joy than any act of Congress that has passed within the last thirty years.

Mr. President, it must be obvious to all who have closely observed the indications of public opinion, that something must be done with the public lands; some radical change in our policy with regard to their disposition must be made. You have an overflowing Treasury, arising from duties on imports amply sufficient to meet the most extravagant wants of the Government. We have, therefore, no excuse for persevering in the policy of selling these lands at a profit; no just reason for refusing to act liberally with the settler. I am confident that if this subject could be fully understood, and fairly presented to the American people, and their wishes could be expressed thereon at the polls, that nine-tenths of them would say with General Jackson, sell for such sum as will reimbuse the Treasury, but not on speculation. And if the other sex, man's better half, were consulted, their vote would be unanimous. I have said, and repeat, that something must be done.

It will be recollected that we have on our calendar a bill passed by the House, known as the Bennett bill, which provides for a distribution of the lands among the States. There was a time in our political history when a great party in this country passed an act for the distribution of the proceeds of sales of the public lands among the States. Another party, greater in numbers, resisted the policy, and appealed to the people upon it. Their opposition to it was ingrafted upon their platform of principles, and was sustained by the popular verdict. There it stands yet, with the seal of the people reversing the policy of distribution. It cannot be denied that this bill just alluded to, violates the spirit and intent of that feature in the platform of principles to which I have referred. It is substantially the distribution system, but in a much more objectionable form. The Whig party proposed to divide the proceeds. The Bennett bill proposes a division of the lands, thereby making freeholders of the old States and tenants of the new. The soil of a sovereign State is proposed to be owned and controlled by thirty other States; the land to be leased, rented, or sold for the highest possible price, according to the whim or caprice of the proprietor. Perhaps the Senators from Maine could tell us something of the practical effects.

We have heard much said from time to time on the subject of State sovereignty and Federal encroachments; but, in my humble judgment, there never has been a proposition introduced into either branch of Congress since the adoption of the Constitution, which involves a more outrageous violation of the just rights of the States, than the bill to which I have alluded. I have ever been opposed to the doctrine of nullification; but, sir, if any law passed by Congress would justify such resistance, it would be this. For the same reason, I opposed another bill on your calendar, known as Miss Dix's bill. No one appreciates more highly than I do the motives of that most benevolent lady and public benefactress; but I can never consent to make a donation of lands within a sovereign State, to a corporation without its limits. When this is done, you retard the settlement of the country, corrupt the morals of the people, depress the energies, and violate the sovereignty of the State. Congress has in several instances donated alternate sections of the public land to aid in the construction of railroads. This was right and proper, because the lands penetrated by those improvements are thereby enhanced in value, sought after and sold, and the reserved lands sell for more than the whole would have done without the improvement. I am not informed how it is in other States, but the greater portion of the lands granted to the Mobile and Ohio railroad, as well as those reserved to the Government, were not worth one cent per acre, and never would have sold for even that, without the improvement; but with it, they will be valuable. Beside this, the State of Mississippi has already paid into your Treasury immense profits on the entire cost of the lands sold within that State.

If I have not greatly deceived myself, Mr. President, I have shown that if the amendment I propose should be adopted, strict justice will be done to every interest concerned, yet so tempered with mercy that it will be acceptable to this great nation; that it will reimburse the Treasury every dollar expended in the acquisition, survey, and sale of the lands; that it will relieve the Government from the odious character of land speculator upon its own citizens; that it will augment the revenues of the Government by the increased prosperity of our citizens, it being the consumer of goods who pays the duties; and that it will be really more acceptable to those who are intended to be its beneficiaries than the original bill. It will be carrying out the humane recommendation of President Jackson, made twenty years ago. It is substantially the homestead bill without its objectionable features. It will benefit a much larger class of citizens. It will preserve the self-respect of those who are to enjoy its benefits, and will not be opposed by the people of the old States or the new. These, in my judgment, are sufficient reasons for the adoption of my amendment.

Before concluding, I will invite the attention of the Senate to a significant fact connected with this question. Since this bill has been pending in this body, many petitions have been presented praying its passage; but, so far as I recollect, not one petition has been introduced here from any point south of Philadelphia or west of Cincinnati, except Arkansas. Why is this? How comes it, that the people from the land States as they are called, are not asking the passage of this bill?

The reason is to be found in the fact, that the people of those States do not desire the lands upon the terms proposed, and that these petitions originate in cities crowded to excess.

Mr. WALKER. I have introduced several petitions in favor of the passage of the bill—one from the Senator's own State.

Mr. ADAMS. I had not noticed the introduction of the petitions referred to by my friend from Wisconsin. So many were introduced from Boston and New York, the others escaped my notice.

Sir, we of the West and Southwest desire nothing by way of charity at the hands of the Government. We desire to purchase your public lands, but we want them at reasonable prices. Grant us this, and by our industry we will become independent, self-sustaining freeholders, and enrich the National Treasury.

THE HOMESTEAD BILL.

SPEECH OF HON. A. C. DODGE,

OF IOWA,

IN THE SENATE, February 24, 1853,

In favor of the principles of the Homestead bill.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, said: Mr. President, that a discussion upon the merits and principles of the homestead bill should have arisen to-day, and upon the amendment now before the Senate, was most unexpected to me; but the views and opinions I entertain of the measure which has been so bitterly assailed, forbid that I should sit by in silence and permit what has been said to go unanswered. Though unexpected, I am not unprepared, in my feeble way, to defend the bill. Sir, the principle upon which that bill, providing homes for the landless, is based, is one dear to my heart—it has grown with my growth, and strengthened with my strength. It was my fortune to have been born upon the west bank of the Mississippi river, and to have lived in Territories upon the extreme frontier, and next to the aboriginal inhabitants of the country, until the State of which I am now a resident became a member of the Union. I have thus been enabled to learn something personally of the dangers, hardships, and difficulties, which are incident to the settlement of the public domain of this country, and which every individual who undertakes it has to encounter before he reaches that spot called a homestead, and which I now call upon you, sir, [Mr. BADGER in the chair,] and others from the land of Macon, to help me to secure to the immigrant settler—not my constituent, but your own—who, impelled by all the higher and nobler impulses of our kind, is seeking to better his condition, and that of the wife and children dependent upon him. That eminently wise and practical statesman, (Mr. Macon,) once said that he never saw an emigrant wending his way over the hills of North Carolina towards the valley of the Mississippi, that he did not wish him "God speed;" that he knew the landless poor man, who thus quit the place in which his lot had been cast—your State, if you please, (respectable in everything, and in some respects advantageously situated)—and seeking a home in the rich and fertile West, was on the road which would probably lead to independence and prosperity for himself and his children.

Sir, let me tell you that the bill which has to-day met the taunts and jeers of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. CHARLTON,] who has ridiculed it in both poetry and prose, is a measure long held dear to the hearts of western people—to the tenant and poor man of every State in the Union, who is struggling to make a living by the sweat of his face. These, and such as these it is, who call for this measure. More than twenty-five years ago the Senate passed the bill of the late eminently distinguished Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton,) graduating the price of the public lands and making donations to actual settlers, and for that measure the Randolphs and Tazewells of Virginia, and the Macons of North Carolina voted. But, sir, by a resort to that system of legislative tactics and opposition, such as the enemies of this measure seem ever willing to have recourse to, it was defeated. The persons for whose benefit this bill is intended are not here. They have no lobby or special delegates to meet Senators and Representatives whenever they go without the bar of their respective Houses, to make interest for them. Several times during the last twenty-five or thirty years, their friends have succeeded in passing through one or the other House of Congress measures similar to this, but not receiving the sanction of both, they fell between them; and I say, with feelings of the deepest apprehension and regret, that I believe this, the best bill of the kind which has passed either branch of Congress, is in imminent peril from the inattention or indifference of some of those who ought to be its best friends. I repeat, that twenty-five or thirty years ago the Senate of the United States passed a bill to donate the refuse lands to such persons as would actually inhabit and cultivate the same for a period much shorter than that fixed in the bill spoken at. After a seven years' struggle of the people's Representatives in the other House, that bill, thus assailed in advance in this body, passed. And I now have in my eye its indefatigable and indomitable author, an esteemed friend and member of the House, [Hon. ANDREW JOHNSON, of Tennessee,] to whom, as one deeply sympathizing with him in sentiment, I return my thanks as an Iowa man. He is the type of the men for whom this bill is intended—now a most able and faithful member of Congress, once a mechanic struggling with poverty and working with the hands which God gave him, and expending that sweat by which it was the decree of the Almighty that man should obtain his bread. Cannot those who profess friendship for the people be willing to take his seven years' labor and exertion at least sufficiently long to try the practical operation of this bill?

Let me tell my friends, the Senators from Georgia, [Messrs. CHARLTON and DAWSON,] that I often meet Georgia emigrants in Iowa. His colleague will well remember a numerous family of emigrants, (of the name of Wooddy,) neighbors and friends of his, who moved from Dahlonega, in Georgia, and were among the very first settlers upon the lands acquired from the confederated tribe of Sacs and Foxes in 1842, in the then Territory of Iowa. The old gentleman was of revolutionary memory, and it was my great pleasure to succeed in getting him a pension for his services in the War of Independence. He had numerous descendants; and as an evidence of their deep attachment for the place whence they came, they named a little town which they laid off on the public lands, Dahlonega. Could those Georgians, male and female, be brought as witnesses to the bar of this Senate, they would testify that which I do now—that if there are any people on God's footstool who deserve the helping hand of their Government, it is those who go into the wilderness to reclaim it to the use of man, who fell the forest, erect the log cabin, and plow that earth in which has lain golden harvests ever since the flood. Let me tell the junior Senator from Georgia that that voice of his, musical with poetry as it is, would fall most unharmoniously upon the ears of those former neighbors and friends of his colleague.

Senators, when they speak of the gift made by the homestead bill, should be reminded that it is no gift at all. You, who claim the ownership of one billion four hundred millions of acres, stretching with slight exceptions from the Balize to the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, and to the Pacific ocean, are called upon—to do what? To settle those great forests and desert prairies in the West, by saying to the man who may be wearing out his body upon the poor hills of North Carolina, East Tennessee, or elsewhere, and who is obliged to give a large portion of his labor to some landlord, if you go to this distant domain, settle and improve it, you may, after five years' actual residence and cultivation, obtain a patent for the one hundred acres thus occupied and improved. Can that which is so well, so dearly earned, be called a gift? I think not.

The homestead bill is not now before us, but if it were, I would beg my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. ADAMS,] in all sincerity and earnestness, and with that perfect respect which I entertain for him as a man and for his motives, not to interpose any obstacle to its passage. I would say to him, Your friends and my friends in the House of Representatives, after a long and severe struggle, have succeeded in passing a bill, not in all its features such as we could wish—for it contains hateful restrictions coupled with onerous conditions—but yet much that is good, and above all, an acknowledgment of the homestead principle. Therefore I hope the honorable Senator will not interpose objection to the bill, but rather aid its passage through the Senate.

Mr. President, there are few subjects—I think no other—of more interest to our nation and people than that introduced incidentally by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. WALKER,] and discussed at length by the Senators from Mississippi and Georgia, [Messrs. ADAMS and CHARLTON]—the best disposition of the public lands. I had hoped, but it seems from the course of argument of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CHARLTON] vainly hoped, that the day had passed by when it was necessary to enter into any formal argument to establish the generally-conceded fact, that the independence, comfort, and wealth of a nation depend more upon its success in agriculture than in any other branch of human industry. It is the farmer who feeds the manufacturer, the artisan, the ship-builder, the beggar, and the king; and yet how little of protection, much less aid, has he ever received from our Government! The despotisms of the Old World, in this respect, contrast most favorably with our Government, considering the day and generation for which they acted. From the discovery of the continent of America they adopted a policy of bountiful munificence in the bestowment of their domains by gratuitous donations of land to those who would settle upon and improve them. It was not on the strength of their armies or navies; not in the rigor or lenity of the administration of their governors-general, intendents, or military commandants; nor in their ability to overcome and subdue the aboriginal inhabitants of the New World, that the European potentates expected to establish their power on this continent. It was a wiser system which governed the policy of the statesmen of England, Spain, and France, beginning on the part of Great Britain, with her commission at the close of the fifteenth century to Cabot, the discoverer of North America, and prosecuted in spirit from that time until now as her provincial policy—pursued also in principle by the other two great Powers since the foundation of their respective land systems on this continent. What were those systems? They were certainly not, in many of their provisions, such as we would adopt at this day. But I think that they were eminently wise and judicious in this, that their tendency was to encourage the settlement of the country by every means which could induce emigration; by gratuitous concessions of immense bodies of the richest lands upon chosen spots, in anticipation that these would be future cities, great commercial points, villages, and the homes of thriving farmers, and of an active and busy population. These grants were not merely restricted to small parcels for individual accommodation, but frequently of immense extent, designed for the reception of hundreds of families, to whom it could be subdivided in small allodial allotments. It has become a fixed principle of the public law, conceded and established by the civilized Powers of the world, that the possessory claims of wandering tribes must yield to the natural and revealed rights of man, which confers on him the privilege of reducing the earth into possession, and of gaining from it his subsistence by the sweat of his brow.

I have said that on the part of Great Britain this principle was recognized in the commission to Cabot, conferring the right of discovery and possession, notwithstanding the occupancy of the Indians, and asserting the superiority and priority of absolute right over them of every Christian people. The British charter, in the last quarter of the sixteenth century, to Sir Humphrey Gilbert, affirmed the same right; and the first permanent English settlement was under a charter at the beginning of the seventeenth century from the British King to Sir Thomas Gates and his associates, of the sea-coast lands, from the thirty-fourth to the forty-fifth degrees of north latitude, which was shortly afterward followed by an enlarged charter to the adventurers of the city of London for colonizing in Virginia, giving them an absolute proprietary right of several hundred miles of sea-coast, and from sea to sea. The title to these lands having been subsequently re-vested in the Crown, a new and more enlarged charter was granted in the year 1620 to the Plymouth company, giving them an absolute right in all the lands between the fortieth and forty-eighth degrees of north latitude. The New England States in a great measure have been settled under this charter, and in like manner might be traced the progress of British policy, by which other English colonies, now integral parts of our Union, were traced out and established—the Crown exercising the granting power in all cases where the proprietary interest had not been conceded.

And so, if we glance at the administration of the authorities of France and Spain in Louisiana—notwithstanding that Province was settled by emigration from Canada, where the feudal principles and the ancient French noblesse existed, yet the settlers there held their lands, both under the French and Spanish regime, by allodial tenures, or, in our parlance, by absolute fee-simple right. The spirit of the royal authorities was a liberal and magnanimous one to the feeble colonist seeking a home upon a far-distant territory, and excluded from the comforts and luxuries of the parent land. Hence we find that Louis XIV., in whose reign the Province of Louisiana was first settled, exhibited the utmost liberality to those engaged in colonizing the country; and, departing from the feudal exactions and restraints, he fully recognized, first in his charter to Crozat, in 1712, and afterwards in his grant to the Indian Company of the West, in 1717, the principles of allodium, or absolute proprietary rights in the grantees.

It might be both interesting and instructive, did the occasion permit, to give the details, and to trace out the practice and progress of the great European colonizing powers on this continent; but suffice it to say, that the history of the past fully establishes the fact, that their policy was conceived and administered in an enlarged and magnanimous spirit. A review, however, of the history of our own system will be more to the point, and will furnish, it seems to me, a strong argument in favor of what is sometimes sneeringly called in this body "progress." It is curious to look back at the earliest law passed by Congress for the sale of the lands of the United States. It provided for their sale in tracts of four thousand acres each; and did not allow the selling of a smaller quantity, except in cases of fractions created by the angles and sinuosities of the rivers. This law, in effect, was a prohibition to the poor man from even purchasing a freehold, and enabled capitalists to become the exclusive proprietors, and to sell the land to the cultivator at exorbitant prices, or else force the latter to be tenants under the former.

The views and opinions of many of our statesmen, derived from Great Britain, and which, at that day, were impressed upon them with all the force of education and association, make it not surprising that they should have deemed it advantageous to create a landed aristocracy; but their error may have arisen from accident, or circumstances of which we have not now a just appreciation. It is not, however, uninteresting to take a retrospect of the first awkward attempts at Republican legislation, and to observe how gradually we have shaken off the habits of thought in which we were trained, and how slowly the shackles of prejudice have fallen from around us.

The first progressive movement from the original system of selling large tracts, and on credit, was the passage of the act of the 10th of May, 1800, which provided for sales in sections and half sections. This law was certainly one of a most beneficial tendency, and its passage forms an era in the history of this Republic of perhaps greater magnitude and interest than any other in our annals. No other act of the Government has ever borne so immediately upon the settlement, the rapid improvement, and permanent prosperity of the western States. Previous to the year 1820, the United States required two dollars per acre—one fourth of which was paid at the time of purchase, and the remainder in three equal annual installments. This mode of selling did not, however, work well, and was abandoned in the year last named for the present system and price of $1 25 per acre. Since then, Congress has, from time to time, modified the system, and reduced, with conditions and restrictions, the salable quantity as low as forty acres.

Almost every one within the sound of my voice knows how bitterly and vehemently some of the ablest and most patriotic statesmen, during nearly the whole of the last quarter of a century, have opposed and fought the passage of laws granting the right of preëmption to the pioneer in the purchase of his home.

Now, what is the attitude in which our own Government stands to the subject? Why, we hold as a Government to the people the position of a great monopolist land-holder, with an absolute proprietary right in fourteen hundred millions of acres! This magnificent estate is parsimoniously doled out at a fixed price per acre to its own people. By this system, and through the medium of land warrants with which you have so bountifully furnished him, the wealthy speculator is enabled to seize upon immense tracts of country as they are brought into market, whole counties perhaps, and hold them until the stern necessities of an advancing population, and a resistless tide of settlement, enable him to command his own price. Look at the ruinous effects of this, growing out of the monopolist speculations of 1836, when the sales under a bloated paper currency rose up to more than twenty-five millions in a single year, and was followed by disastrous results. The settler became tributary to the capitalist, money was unnaturally diverted from its legitimate channels, individual and public prosperity was checked, and, indeed, for the time, almost hopelessly prostrated. In the commercial changes and revolutions to which, at times, every nation becomes subject, there is nothing so certainly calculated to increase the elements of distress and public and private mischief, as a system having the authority of law, which could countenance such speculation.

The whole cost of the public lands to the 1st January, 1850, including their purchase, survey, sale and management, was $74,957,879 38.

The aggregate receipts from their sale to the year and month named, was $135,339,093 17.

This estimate does not embrace California, Oregon, New Mexico, or Utah. Deduct the aggregate cost from the aggregate receipts, and we have a net balance in favor of the United States of $60,381,213 79.

Twenty millions of dollars were paid for Louisiana and Florida. These acquisitions would have been worth more than that amount for their commercial and maritime capacities and advantages, and not including the fee-simple of the soil—they, if you please, retaining it as TEXAS has. Deduct the amount of their cost, ($20,000,000,) and the actual profit to the Government from the sale of its domain is eighty million dollars and upwards, ($80,381,213 79.) It is proper to make this deduction, for the value of the land in Louisiana and Florida was not the consideration which induced their purchase. The United States, for great national purposes, needed the control of the mouth of the Mississippi and the Gulf of Mexico. The same high considerations and wise policy dictated the expediency of our acquiring California, with her unrivaled bay and harbor of San Francisco. As a mere question, then, of dollars and cents, the Government might here be willing to stop, for it has been more than reimbursed.

Our prosperity and growth as a nation will, in my opinion, be greatly accelerated by the adoption of a different principle: one that will repudiate the system of doling out the public lands at a certain number of shillings per acre, as a source of revenue and Treasury profit. The new States and the Territories will suffer most by continuing this system, and especially by the passage of measures tending to excite and aggravate it, such as I have before adverted to. The mania of speculation will soon sweep over them like the Sirocco blast, prostrating all within the range of its poisonous and desolating career. These embryo States, so far as regards the public domain, will cease to be the territories of the Union, and become the property of monopolists, possessing their soil, delaying their admission into the Union, and thus shaping their destiny for half a century. Witness the deplorable condition of Ireland; the sad evils of anti-rentism in New York; of non-resident proprietorship of the Half-breed lands—so called—in Iowa; Lord Murray's possessions in western Wisconsin, and numerous other instances of absentee landlordism in other western States and Territories.

The settler, only when his necessities demand it, appears at the door of the Government official seeking to purchase a home. He finds that immense tracts, nay whole counties, and almost whole Territories, are thus excluded from actual settlement for an ordinary lifetime, and he is driven further in his pursuit of land, or is forced to become a tenant. Could any system be devised more destructive of equal rights and Republican principles? In vain will we have eschewed the feudal system, with its relation of lord and vassal, if we defeat the homestead bill, and create and continue to issue, as is proposed by numerous mammoth schemes now before us, this paper currency, called land warrants, to be used as it is, to absorb the public domain and regulate the terms of its sale and settlement.

Excluding the years 1835 and 1836, the average sales of the public lands from 1796 down to 1847, is about one million and a half of acres per annum. Owing to an increase in the circulating medium, but more especially to the enormous issue of land warrants, the sales amounted to $4,870,067 during the last fiscal year. Of these sales nearly three and a half millions of acres were for bounty land warrants; being an increase over the previous years of nearly a million of acres thus absorbed by these warrants, which I greatly fear are being most extensively used to pass the title from the Government to the speculator. The following letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, bears upon this point.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, February 12, 1853.

SIR: In answer to your inquiry, I have the honor to state:

That the whole amount of lands sold during the years 1844, 1845, 1846, and 1847, was.....8,383,326.66 acres.
Making a yearly average of.....2,095,831.66 acres.
The whole number of entries during said period was.....155,130
Or a yearly average of..... 38,782

This makes an average of 54 4-100 acres to each entry, showing that a large majority of the entries were in 80 and 40-acre tracts.

In the year 1846, there were sold in the Fairfield district, in Iowa, 180 tracts of 160 acres each, equal to..28,800 acres
1,028 " " 80 " " " 82,240 "
967 " " 40 " " " 38,680 "
Total. 2,175 149,720 acres
Making an average for each sale of 68 8-10 acres.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

Hon. A. C. DODGE, Senate.

This shows the average of sales for the four years therein named to be about two millions of acres as the maximum quantity required for annual settlement and cultivation. The absence of all artificial causes exciting speculation in the four years enumerated, and the preponderance of forty and eighty-acre entries, show that the great body of the land sold was purchased by those who desired it for homes and improvement.

Now, if the Government of the United States really consulted its own interests in a pecuniary point of view, would it not, instead of making the public lands a source of direct annual profit by the sales producing a revenue now of some two or three millions a year, discard that system and throw open this estate to an industrious and energetic population, which would give back in exchange a rich and perpetual stream of wealth, fed by all the elements of a nation's prosperity? But not only in this respect should we consider our duties and obligations. This Government stands in the position of a political parent, whose duty it is to watch over, guard, and protect the interests of every citizen. That duty requires that we should enable every one within the limits washed by the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, to secure a farm or homestead for himself and family. That is a generous, nay, just and noble system, which would repudiate this selfish policy of shillings, and look to one which is more in accordance with the genius of our institutions. Let this Congress of the United States come up to the important subject under a proper sense of what is due to our people and our country, and by adopting a measure like this they will rescue from a state wholly unproductive, thousands of square miles; will convert them to the great purposes of life—thus subserving the ends of our being; and will add new stars of equal brilliancy to those now constituting the galaxy of the American Union.

Mr. President, the homestead bill, so called, comes to us with a strong indorsement from the people's Representatives. It passed the House, after having been before that body for nearly seven years, during which time it was considered and discussed in nearly all its aspects and bearings. It is emphatically a measure of progress, and one which I think, if enacted into a law, is destined to produce benefits to our whole country. In examining the objections which have been urged against this measure, I am astonished to perceive that they are but a repetition of those which were made against every preëmption and graduation bill that has ever been brought before Congress since the commencement of our land system; and yet, at this day, so great has been the triumph of correct principles, that few, if any, can be found who will raise their voices against preëmption or graduation. Try this measure in its practical workings for but a few years, and like results, I venture to predict, will be produced. This homestead bill is but a just tribute to agriculture—that first, noblest, and God-favored calling of man. It is the only measure at all likely to come before Congress for the benefit of those who till the earth for a support; and this consideration, of itself, is sufficient to commend it to my support. It will not only be an evidence of the favor with which Congress views the cultivation of the soil, but it will tend greatly to increase the number of those engaged in that pursuit, thus augmenting the productions of our country, and the comfort, independence, and happiness of our people. Some think that it will destroy the receipt of all revenues from the public domain. In this opinion I do not concur. Indeed, I may say, I fear they are mistaken; for I have long been of the opinion that the best interest of the Republic demand an abolition of the auction or private sales of the public domain, and that it should be conveyed only to those who design to settle upon and improve it. The gigantic and ruinous speculations in the public lands in 1835-'36, to which I have before alluded, can never be forgotten in the history of this country. It was in the year last named that the late distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, R. J. Walker—then a Senator from Mississippi—brought forward a bill in this body to put an end to all speculation in the public domain, and to restrict its sale to actual settlers and cultivators. It was the measure of a statesman, and, if it had been adopted, would, I humbly conceive, have wrought great benefits to our whole country.

The fact, so often mentioned, that a poor man can now buy one hundred and sixty acres of land for $200, is, according to the conceptions of my mind, no objection to this bill. There are many thousands of families in this country—good and deserving people—who never saw the day, and never will see it, when they will have that sum, or the half, or the fourth of it, ready to pay down for a quarter section, an eighty acre, or a forty acre tract. I further give it as my earnest belief, that no one hundred and sixty acres, in a state of nature, on the extreme verge of civilization, is worth $200 to him who buys for no other purpose than settlement and improvement. I think the policy of holding on to the public domain, with a view to extorting the last dollar from the cultivator, unwise and impolitic. I can quote eminent authority to show that it is so. Hear the great Edmund Burke, who said, in the British Parliament:

"A landed estate is certainly the very worst which the Crown can possess." * * * "All minute and dispersed possessions—possessions that are often of indeterminate value, and which require a continued personal attendance—are of a nature more proper for private management than for public administration. They are fitter for the care of a frugal land steward than of an office in the State." * * * "If it be objected that these lands, at present, will sell at a low market, this is answered by showing that money is at a high price. The one balances the other. Lands sell at the current rate, and nothing can sell for more. But be the price what it may, a great object is always answered, whenever any property is transferred from hands which are not fit for that property to those that are. The buyer and the seller must mutually profit by such a bargain; and, what rarely happens in matters of revenue, the relief of the subject will go hand in hand with the profit of the Exchequer." * * * "The revenue to be derived from the sale of the forest lands will not be considerable as many have imagined; and I conceive it would be unwise to screw it up to the utmost, or even to suffer bidders to enhance, according to their eagerness, the purchase of objects wherein the expense of that purchase may weaken the capital to be employed in their cultivation. The principal revenue which I propose to draw from these uncultivated wastes, is to spring from the improvement and population of the kingdom; events infinitely more advantageous to the revenues of the Crown than the rents of the best landed estate which it can hold." * * * "It is thus I would dispose of the unprofitable landed estates of the Crown: throw them into the mass of private property; by which they will come, through the course of circulation, and through the political secretions of the State, into well regulated revenue." * * * "Thus would fall an expensive agency, with all the influence which attends it."

But I have higher authority than even that of England's great statesman. We are commanded in that book which should be the rule of life for all, not to glean either the "sheaf," the "grape," the "olive," or the "corners of the land." The soil of a country is the gift of the Creator to his creatures, and in a government of the people, that gift should not become the object of speculation and monopoly. I am strongly of the belief that these donations will work great good both to the Government and the people. All other Governments have made them. The domain of the United States is the only one, I believe, for which pay was ever demanded in gold and silver, before it could be settled and cultivated. Different was the conduct of other Governments, and even that of the States owning land: Kentucky, Tennessee, and one third of Ohio, and a considerable portion of Georgia—if my information be correct—were settled by free grants of land. Upper and Lower Louisiana, and the two Floridas, as I have before remarked, were settled by gratuitous donations from the Kings of Spain. Since those countries have become ours, the early settlers, to whom these grants were made, have been harassed and annoyed by having their titles contested by the United States officers in the courts, and in every other conceivable manner. Very different has been the policy of the conterminous and other Governments on this continent. Are not the British lands in Canada given at this day to all who will come and take them? In 1825, the British Parliament, with a view to the strengthening of a remote province, appropriated £30,000 sterling (nearly $135,000) to pay the expenses of emigrants moving to Canada. Look at what Mexico and Texas have done. They have given land in immense quantities to any one who would go and take it within their limits. It is a well-known historical fact, that a large number of our citizens abandoned this, the land of their nativity, and the freest Government on earth, many years since, about the time that Austin went to Texas, and accepted the landed bounty of foreign, and at that time despotic Governments—their own offering none.

In the West Indies, and all over South America, the same liberal system of disposing of the public domain has prevailed. I read from a decree of the Republic of Colombia, dated June, 1823:

"The Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Colombia, united in Congress, considering: 1st. That a population, numerous and proportionate to the territory of a State is the basis of its prosperity and true greatness; 2nd. That the fertility of the soil, the salubrity of the climate, the extensive unappropriated lands, and the free institutions of the Republic, permit and require a numerous emigration of useful and laboring strangers, who, by improving their own fortunes, may augment the revenues of the nation, have decreed:

"That foreigners emigrating to Colombia shall receive gratuitous donations of land, in parcels of two hundred fanegas (about four hundred acres) to each family. That it may be chosen in the middle or the mountainous districts, in the regions favorable to the production of sugar, coffee, cocoa, indigo, rice, cotton, wheat, barley, rye, and all the varieties of fruits, both of tropical and high latitudes. That five years' cultivation shall entitle a foreigner to naturalization. That $1,000,000 be appropriated in aid of agriculture, to be distributed in loans to industrious farmers."

Such was the conduct of the free Republics of South America. All of them did the same;—but it is unnecessary to cite their numerous laws to that effect. Throughout the New World, from Hudson's Bay to Cape Horn, (with the single exception of these United States,) land, the gift of God to man, is also the gift of the Government to those who will improve it. This wise policy has not been circumscribed to the New World—it has even prevailed in Asia.

The King of Persia published, in the London newspapers in 1823, a proclamation, from which I read:

"Mirza Mahomed Saul, Embassador to England, in the name, and by the authority of Abbys Mirza, King of Persia, offers to those who shall emigrate to Persia, gratuitous grants of land, good for the production of wheat, barley, rice, cotton, and fruits, free from taxes or contributions of any kind, and with the free enjoyment of their religion, the King's object being to improve his country."

The object here stated by the Persian King, to improve his country, is one worthy to be observed and imitated. Shall this Government, the creature of the people, and made for their benefit, be less wise in its policy, and less generous to its citizens than the despotisms of the Old World, or the Republics of the New? I trust not! Land was given, not sold, in that country which was the peculiar care of God. "God gave the earth to the inhabitants thereof." The promised land was a gift to the children of Israel; one dollar and twenty-five cents the acre was not demanded for it; nor the actual cultivator expelled from his home, if he possessed not the two hundred dollars to pay down for the one hundred and sixty acres, and his home sold, under the hammer, to the highest bidder; land was then the gift of God to man, and to woman also; for the daughters of Manasseh were permitted to inherit and partake of the bounty of the Giver of all good.

Mr. President, to show the evils of the present land system, I call your attention to a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office respecting the State of Missouri. From this letter it is seen that that State contains a superficial area of about 65,037 square miles, or 41,623,680 acres; of this quantity 17,125,174 acres have been sold, and 188,901 acres absorbed by Spanish and French grants, leaving 24,309,605 acres unsold upon the 30th day of June last, according to the Commissioner's statement now before me.

Under the present wretched system of disposing of the public lands, the first sales in Missouri took place in 1818. Thus, if it has taken thirty-four years for the Federal Government to sell 17,125,174 acres, by the same ratio, estimating by the rule of proportion, it will take forty-eight years to dispose of the remaining lands in that State. The 24,309,635 acres, divided by 160, the quantity given to each settler under this bill, would add to the population of the State 151,935 land-owning and tax-paying inhabitants.

In Michigan the state of things is even worse, as is seen from the following letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, February 25, 1853.

SIR: In reply to your inquiries of this date, I have the honor to inform you that the first public sale of lands in Michigan was made in the year 1818. From that date to the 30th June last, a period of thirty-four years, there was sold and located by land warrants 9,858,670 acres. On the 30th June last there remained undisposed of the quantity of 19,679,811 acres. Estimating the future by the past, it will require, to dispose of this remaining land, a period of about sixty-eight years.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

Hon. A. C. DODGE, U. S. Senate.

These are but fair samples of the injury inflicted upon the West by the present system. Is there any Senator so dead to the interests of Missouri and Michigan as to wish to prolong this state of things?

To show how much the advantages of this bill are overrated, I call attention to the fact, that a few years since we passed a law granting to settlers in Oregon, free of cost, and on condition of settlement and five years' occupancy, much larger quantities of land than are proposed to be given by this bill; and yet you find the people, owing to the abundance of money, caused by the discovery of gold in California, asking a repeal of the restriction, and that they be permitted to pay for their lands. Such a law has been passed during the present session, and those settlers now have their option of purchase or conditional gift. I only refer to this circumstance to show that the conditions imposed by the homestead bill are rigorous, and are so regarded by its beneficiaries—those at least of them who are so fortunate as to accumulate the means necessary to pay for their claims before the expiration of the five years.

The constitutional power to pass the homestead bill I regard as clearly conferred. Its language is:

"Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

What more needful rule and regulation could be established than settlement and cultivation? And considering the sources whence our governmental revenues are raised, what more beneficial one could be devised?

Acting under this power, Congress has recently made donations to an enormous amount to the soldiers of the Mexican war; to those of the war of 1812, the war of the Revolution, Bonaparte's exiled marshals and soldiers, to General Lafayette—to say nothing of the sixteenth and alternate-section grants to States and companies.

Of a population of over twenty-three millions of inhabitants in the United States, the head of the Census Bureau, in reply to a request of mine, has furnished me with an esimate approximating accuracy of the number of real-estate owners in the United States, which he fixes at two millions three hundred and thirty-two thousand nine hundred and nineteen; and this, I presume, is about the number.

Mr. President, there never was a measure so abused, so misrepresented, so vilified, as has been the homestead bill. In the first place, a large portion of the country has been made erroneously to believe that its grants are made to foreigners, and we of the new States have been told that its enactment would bring hordes of foreign paupers upon us. Like every measure of progress and reform, it is fought with all sorts of rawhead and bloody-bones argument which can be invented. Is there any public man who has the courage to dare to propose a repeal of the naturalization laws of this country? I opine not. I take it that Native Americanism is so dead that it will never kick again. Then, if that be true, and these foreigners come to us in the numbers in which they do, I ask you, in the name of God, what will you do with them? Will you keep them in your cities?—will you keep them where they are denied the opportunity of cultivating the soil of the country?—or will you hold out to them a generous inducement, such as the homestead bill does, and such as all Governments on this continent have held out? The British on the north, and the Mexican and South American Republics on the south, have invited and attracted foreigners. Will you not rather choose to elevate their condition by inviting them to the magnificent and fertile plains of the West, upon which they can settle, and their daughters and sons grow up and be useful and respectable? It is within the range of human probability that under the spirit and genius of our institutions and the glorious provisions of our Constitution, some of the descendants of these much-abused and hated foreigners may attain even the Presidency of these United States. In your legislation touching the public lands, you seem to have forgotten that population as well as soil is necessary. You forget the lesson taught by a Greek, and elegantly paraphrased by a British, poet:

"What constitutes a State?
Not high-raised battlement nor labored mound—
Thick wall nor moated gate;
Nor cities fair, with spires and turrets crowned;
Not bays and broad-armed ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride!
Not starred and spangled courts,
Where low-bowed baseness wafts perfume to pride.
No! men! high-minded men!—
Men who their duties know,
But know their rights, and knowing dare maintain,
Prevent the long-aimed blow,
And crush the tyrant when they burst the chain.—
These constitute a State."

THE HOMESTEAD BILL.

SPEECH OF HON. R. M. CHARLTON,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE SENATE, February 24, 2853,

Against the principles of the Homestead bill.

Mr. CHARLTON said: Mr. President, I had proposed to address the Senate upon what is often called the homestead bill; and as I understand that the amendment now pending before this body has been made to come as near to that as it is practicable, under the existing rules of the Senate; and as I understand that this is to be but the entering wedge, but the beginning of a system which will end in the homestead bill, I will take the liberty of attacking the true system, and not the false one that is apparently presented before us. I think it is a good rule, in civil as well as in military warfare, to attack the vedettes before you come to the main guard; and I do this the more readily, as, doubtless, we shall have the homestead bill before us at the close of the session, when it will be too late to debate it.

I cannot yield my assent to the principles involved in this bill. I do not think that sound policy, true political economy, or the great interests of our country are at all protected or preserved by it. Not questioning for a moment the motives of those who advocate it, I consider that its passage is well calculated to demoralize the very class whose benefit seems to be its main object. I believe that it will lend a helping hand to idleness, profligacy, and vice, and that it will throw a temptation in the way of honest industry, which may turn its feet aside from the path of usefulness and success in order that it may obtain a gift that will be worthless when it is procured. If I am right in these opinions, it is the duty of us all to defeat the measure before us. If I am wrong in my conclusions, I have the satisfaction of knowing that nothing that I can say can pervert the judgment of the "older and better" legislators around me.

I propose to state, very briefly, the reasons for my convictions; and my first objection to it is, that whilst it seems to be founded upon the agrarian principle, that each man shall share equally in the public lands, and that this Government is but the trustee for its citizens, yet it does not carry out the very idea that is its basis; it is unequal in its operation; it gives the public domain only to those who have no land at all at the time of such application, and who will swear that they have not disposed of any land to obtain the benefits of this act. Why these provisions? Why exclude the honest laborer, who, by the sweat of his brow, had purchased his farm and erected his homestead? Why, in the division of the spoil amongst the cestui que trusts, thrust aside the successful tiller of the ground—the experienced cultivator? Why give the common property only to him who, by his idleness had never obtained his tract of land, or by his extravagance, or folly, or inexperience had wasted it? Is this to encourage agriculture and other branches of industry, which the title of this act declares to be its object?—or is it not to waste the country's treasures upon those who had hitherto been too idle to acquire property, or too unskillful to make it useful? It seems to me that the proper course, if any such distribution must take place, (which I exceedingly deprecate,) would be to give equally to all. The indigent man may have become so without his own crime or folly; but what have these done—the successful, the industrious, the honest, that they should be excluded? Why should you put a penalty on thrift, and reward only the man who has had neither the industry nor skill, in this favored land, to shelter his "landless head" from the storm? No successful answer can be given to these questions, unless we are advancing to the opinion that all property in land is a robbery, and that he who has already obtained a portion, though it may be by honest industry, shall have no more,—an opinion which I trust no one here entertains, and no one here will advance.

But it will be said, he that has already an estate in land needs no more; we wish to supply him who has none; we wish the soil to be cultivated; we wish agriculture to be improved; we want to give a start to the poor man, and to throw around him the comforts of a home. We want to convert this barren domain into a beautiful garden spot, and to change, by the magic power of the spade, the hoe, and the plow, the noxious weed into the life-sustaining plant. We want to make the desert blossom like the rose, and to make the untrodden path of the prairie the highway for vast multitudes of freemen. All this sounds well; but if it is said that this act is going to accomplish all or any of these things, I am afraid that, like most such romantic and poetic sentiments, there is more beauty of diction than there will be truth in fulfillment. Let us take them up in their order, and hold them up to the candle of reason.

You begin, as I have already said, by excluding the man, whatever his ability, whatever his industry, whatever his honesty and experience, who owns a single acre of land—a single acre will exclude him. No matter how poor he may be, if he has either the misfortune or crime to own a rood of land, his unhallowed foot shall never tread this sacred soil. His land may be barren, it matters not; his children may be starving, it is of no consequence; he may, by his experience and knowledge of agriculture, be the very person for the cultivation of this rich soil—all this cannot be listened to. He may be a native born, whose father's blood helped to purchase the freedom of our country; he may be a naturalized citizen, who has proved his devotion to our free institutions by daring valor or indomitable energy; still the answer that will meet his ear will be, You have already land; you can have no more. He offers to sell his parental homestead, even which, to advance his childen's interests, he may be willing to abandon;—this act still declares he shall not participate in its benefits, while it gives no other reason for the exclusion than the single and unmeaning one that he has land already.

Now, if the true motive of this bill were to cultivate the soil, and to promote agriculture, one would think that these objects would be obtained by allowing this class of men, who had shown their energy and success, to participate in the benefits, and to extend the circle of their usefulness. Certainly some limit might be made, so as not to thrust aside the mere nominal holder of a few feet of soil. But let us proceed. This act is intended, say some of its advocates, for the aid of the poor man—to give him a start, and to throw around him the comforts of a home. But how does this appear? This act includes only those who have no land. There are hundreds of thousands in this Republic who, while they own no soil, have their gold and silver and jewels, their bank stock, their notes of hand, and other personal estate. They are wealthy and prosperous; they may nevertheless come and take their quarter section. How is this act, then, only meant for the poor man? It will be said, that no man of wealth will come; but that is no answer. He may if he will—the law does not exclude him; but the law does exclude the poor man who has no personal property, but a little soil of his own—it matters not how little. Poverty is not the test—ownership of land is.

But, sir, if this objection were out of the way, it would not change my views. I do not like this bait that is thrown out. I do not like this beginning of a system that seeks to array one class of our country against the other—that suggests to the poor man that he alone is the owner of the soil. I do not like the under current that steals under the apparent tide of sympathy. Let me not be misunderstood, sir. I am not one of those who look upon penury as a crime. In many cases it is the decree of Providence: "The poor ye have with you always," was as well the assertion of a truth as the announcement of a prophecy. So it has ever been, and so will it ever be; and he is but a traitor to the best interests of humanity and his country who does not do what he reasonably can to alleviate the sufferings of those less fortunate than himself; and poverty and suffering are appeals that this Republic of ours has always answered to. Witness its hospitals, its asylums, its charitable institutions. Witness its succor to Greece and to Ireland. Witness its outstretched arms to receive every one upon whose neck the iron heel had pressed.

But there are lawful ways of showing sympathy, and there are unlawful ones—and this system is an instance of the latter. Besides, sir, you encourage poverty by this plan. You reward it, in the first instance, though it may have been the result of vice or sloth; you protect it, you perpetuate it, by making the property you thus bestow, not liable for any debt which may be incurred for five years; and whilst you leave the fruits of the ground subject to legal process, you take away the inducement to produce more than is barely sufficient for sustenance. You encourage recklessness and idleness; you stereotype the indolence and want of foresight which you found in a more imperfect state. Mr. President, I know that poverty is no crime, not always; but I know that idleness is, and ever has been; and I know that poverty which is the result of idleness, is something worse than a misfortune. "He that will not work, neither should he eat," is the language of inspiration. In this free country, where honest effort and brawny arms always meet encouragement and reward, there are few healthy "heads of families" who cannot earn the support of themselves and children; and if they are not healthy, believe me, sir, the great interests of agriculture will not be promoted by giving them in charge to the puny strength of the diseased frame. Human nature is sufficiently prone to inertness. You do not do your duty to your country by encouraging it. Industry has its own reward; stimulate it, do not retard it. Let the young man feel and know that with it the highest honors of his country are within the range of his effort, and let him feel and know that it is his duty to himself and to his country to march forward with untiring energy to the attainment of honor and of usefulness. The walls of this Chamber have often echoed to the eloquent words of those who have worked their way up from honest poverty by their energy and industry, who might this day have been the miserable tillers of a "quarter section," if such a bait had been held out to them; if such a miserable cheat had deluded their minds.

But still, it may be said that this bill, although highly objectionable in many other respects, has a good principle within it, which should silence all cavils. It is intended to encourage agriculture—that great measure so important to the best interests of our country; and not only that, but it is to encourage commerce, next in importance to this our land; the grain, the fruit, the cotton, the tobacco, the whisky, (last not least,) will be borne beneath our country's flag to all parts of the world, through the means of this bill. Nor these alone: manufactures will be improved by it. The skillful artisan will become more skillful by its influence—how, nobody knows. We must take that on trust; but still, in some way, this will be the result, and the benign blessings of this act will be the medium. These are certainly great objects; no one can deny that. But, say the advocates of this measure, none of your faint praise, none of your garbled laudation; look again at the title of the bill; it does not confine itself to the encouragement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, but also to "all other branches of industry." That is true; true so far as the title is concerned. Wonderful act! a kind of physical vice versa Pandora's box, that is to let loose upon this regenerated earth such a multitude of blessings! Do not be skeptical, Mr. President. Do not fall back upon the incredulous query of old—How can these things be? Do not talk about the exploded maxims of political economy. Do not ask how the encouragement of agriculture necessarily includes the encouragement of "all other branches of industry." These things can be done—so they are done—by this bill. I beg pardon—by the title of this bill; for there is nothing in the body of it that either declares or promotes any such universal benefit. And how, do you ask? Why by the simplest method in the world. And what is it? The title describes the process, viz: "by granting to every man who is the head of a family a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain." This is the short, the sure, the glorious way "to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry." It is true, as I have said, the body of the act does not state, much less prove, how these benefits, great and gigantic as they are, will accrue; but then we know that the body of the act is never intended to express the intention of the lawgiver; it is the title, and the title alone, to which you are to refer to ascertain all the objects, and benefits, and "the ways and means" of accomplishing them. When Mathews, the celebrated wag, was here, he told a story of a Yankee, whom, on his first landing, he encountered, and who, with characteristic frankness, informed him that he was about compiling an American jest-book. Mathews met with him some two years afterwards, and asked him how he progressed with his great work, and he answered, "Gloriously; it is almost done. I have got the index and the title-page, and only want the body of the work." And Mathews tells this as a joke. A joke indeed! Look at the title of this act; magnificent in its views, overwhelming with its prophecies, and then tell me if the title be not the best, the greatest part of it: whether, when we once have given our high legislative sanction to it, we have not done all that our country can require of us; whether the title, glorious as it is—liberal in its promises, beautiful in its hopes—will not be better without the incumbrance of the body that is tacked to it, and whether we had not better strike out all that comes after its enacting clause, leaving that and its title to stand, monumentum perenius ære, of human wisdom and human genius?

But now, seriously, let us look this title in the face. Apart from its dogmatical assertion, where is the proof that by passing this act you will encourage agriculture alone, much less all other branches of industry? The idea is, that by making every man a farmer, you improve the condition of your whole country; and by improving the condition of the whole country, you necessarily will improve all branches of industry, as the welfare of the whole embraces the welfare of all its parts. Now, I deny both the premises and the conclusions. I deny that it will improve agriculture; and I deny that by improving agriculture, you must necessarily, or even naturally, improve all other branches of industry.

I suppose I must not say that agriculture is a science, although in a subordinate sense it is certainly so. No one can be a successful tiller of the ground without a thorough training, and an enlarged experience. He must know the climate, the seasons, the nature of the soil, the influence of the weather, the seed, the plow, and the sickle; and this knowledge cannot be obtained intuitively, nor got by becoming the owner of a "quarter section" gratuitously. In my part of the country there is a large class of men who earn an ample livelihood by becoming superintendents of large planting interests. They devote their whole lives to acquiring and increasing their knowledge on this subject. No one is rash enough to believe that by buying, or owning, or inheriting a tract of land, he acquires an appendant knowledge of the mode of cultivating it. But this act proceeds upon an assumption that the land and the science of agriculture go together; that as soon as you make your "entry" you are equipped "as the law directs," with all the necessary qualifications "to encourage agriculture;" and so you are, so far as the law directs, but not as common sense directs. By some mental, electrical, governmental power, the moment "the head of a family" "enters free of cost one quarter section of vacant and unappropriated public lands," the whole science of agriculture is flashed into his brain, and he becomes a fit and proper person "to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry." What though such person be an aged widow, with maiden daughters; a rheumatic man, with neither children, friends, or money; a blacksmith, who has never seen a field of corn; a seaman, who could not tell cotton from tobacco, (I mean in the growth;) a politician, whose only knowledge of rye is derived from the whisky distilled from it;—it is all the same—the whole science, with its concomitant blessings and benefits, is conferred upon him instanter; and the only condition imposed is, that he must not hire or sell the land to any other person, who has acquired the science by the slow and regular way, but he must reside on it and cultivate it himself, for the "encouragement of agriculture." Truly, (to speak sarcastically,) this is a wonderful law; truly, (to speak seriously,) it is a ridiculous one. Test it by another way: As this law, by the benefits it is said to promote, encourages all species of industry, suppose we try the same experiment with one of these branches of industry; suppose we enact a law with a magnificent title, declaring it to be an act to encourage the successful and safe working of steam-engines, "agriculture, manufactures, and all other branches of industry," by granting to every head of a family a forty-horse steam-engine at the public expense, upon condition of personally working and managing the same for a certain period. We claim to be intelligent men here—doubtless most here are; how long do you think, Mr. President, your lengine would be in successful operation? How ong do you think that mine would encourage manufactures and all other branches of industry? How would you like to trust yourself on a voyage with any one of the learned Senators around you? You can answer that question at your leisure. For myself, I answer that the encouragement I should give to all branches of industry by my engine would be exceedingly brief. The story of the wise men of Gotham, who went to sea in a bowl, would be reënacted in its brevity and its catastrophe—the difference being, that whilst they went down, myself and crew would go up—a distinction without any very solid difference. And I think, so far as moral effect is concerned, a similar fate would await me in the management of my "quarter section;" my doom would be more protracted and more painful, but just as certain. For I believe myself, and the rest of mankind who are professional men, know about as much of the management of steam-engines as of quarter sections, and that we are about as fit in the one as in the other to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry. I do not think, therefore, that you encourage agriculture by this bill; but if you do, you certainly do not encourage all other branches of industry. It is true, to a certain degree, that agriculture, when kept within its legitimate limits, has a tendency to improve the commerce of a nation; whether it improves its manufactures is a more disputed point. So far is it from being necessarily so, that we find the agricultural and the manufacturing interests constantly arrayed against each other in this country,—one asks for free trade and the other for a protective tariff.

But be that as it may, you certainly do not increase or encourage all other branches of industry, if you lure away from their successful pursuit the skillful and energetic men who have hitherto adopted them. Our country needs the practical and competent mechanic, as well as the agriculturist. What will we do, without the shoemaker, the carpenter, the tailor, the blacksmith, &c.? Will it improve all these branches of industry to take away from them those who follow them for a livelihood, and send them to cultivate land? Plenty of these will remain, you answer. But it is not the policy of this law that they should remain. All that you could do to get them away, you have done, not only by your free gift of land, but by the argument you have addressed to them in the title of this act, by the assurance you have given to them, that by turning their attention to this new field of labor, they will encourage all other branches of industry. I ask you, therefore, if the policy—if the bearing of the law is the true one? And the only way you can answer me is by the assurance that the law will not have the effect it professes to have; that though it invites all, it courts all to come without any exceptions—that although it holds out brilliant promises of wealth and usefulness to all who do come, yet that very few will come in point of fact, and only those who are skillful agriculturists. Well, why not give it, then, to skillful agriculturists? What kind of law is it that says one thing and means another?

Mr. President, I do not know whether you have noticed it, but as I have no doubt you are a keen observer of human nature, I think you must have noticed, as I have, when walking the principal avenue of our metropolis, a man with a magnificent head upon his shoulders and a very decrepit body. If you have extended your researches as far as I have, you have noticed the reverse of this; you have seen a man with a magnificently-framed body and with a very ricketty head. I do not know how it has struck you, but I have always been irresistibly inclined to take a sharp cimetar and clip both heads off, and put the good head on the good body, so as to make one perfect man of the two, and throw away the balance to be dealt with as the law directs. That, to be sure, would be murder, and I do not suppose that either you or I would be inclined to indulge in such an innocent amusement, considering the consequences which might result, although we might think we had benefited mankind by taking away two decrepit species of humanity, and in their places getting a perfect one. We cannot, however, indulge this propensity, because the law suspends a penalty over us; but without any bloodshed, I think we might do that in reference to the project before us—I mean the homestead bill.

The honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLEMENS] has submitted informally an amendment, which is to come in at the end of the homestead bill, which is a proposition for a graduation law. What I want to do is not to cut off this magnificent head from this bill, but to put the proposition of the Senator from Alabama, not at the end of it, but just immediately after the title. I would not disturb that title for the world. I do not think that in the next century there will be found any combination of talent that will put, in the six lines composing this title, such an amount of magnificent promises and such a speedy electrical result as follows immediately afterwards. I think it is unique, and ought not to be disturbed. That is the magnificent head. The body I look upon as exceedingly decrepit, and I think if the graduation system of my friend from Alabama could be adopted, it would come in admirably after this head. If the bill were legitimately before us, that would be the amendment which I would propose to make.

This graduation system was commented on and advocated by Mr. Calhoun and other wise legislators and eminent statesmen, and I do not think there can be any reasonable objection to it. I do not think any man can object if he can purchase by his own industry, at a merely nominal sum, the public land of the country. It is the duty and the policy of the Government to dispose of the public land as soon as practicable. If it cannot receive $1 25 per acre, after the lapse of so many years, it should fall in price so much per cent. and so on, until it gets down to twelve-and-a-half cents per acre. If I were a poor man I would rather own an acre of land by the payment of twelve-and-a-half cents, and would feel myself more independent and more of a man than I would by taking a quarter section of land from the public for nothing, clogged with the restriction that I could not sell, but that I must live upon it and cultivate it myself. I think the true policy of this Government is to dispose of the public land as soon as it can, at the prices which it can get for it, falling gradually as the lapse of time admonishes us that the lands are not wanted, or are not rich in their character.

I had intended to go into the constitutional argument on the subject, but I do not wish to delay the Senate any longer, particularly as the Senator from Mississippi has paid particular attention to that branch of it, and I will therefore not trespass further upon the Senate at this time.

THE FEE BILL.

SPEECH OF HON. J. W. BRADBURY,

OF MAINE,

IN THE SENATE, February 12, 1853,

On the bill to regulate the Fees and Costs in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States.

Mr. BRADBURY said: Mr. President, this bill is designed to accomplish an important object, and I hope it will not be defeated, or its efficiency destroyed by amendments. It seeks reform where reform is very much needed; and while I ask the friends of the measure not to allow its defeat by amendments, I will avoid bringing about the same result by too much speaking on my part. A few remarks may be necessary, and I will be as brief as possible. This bill comes to us from the House; and having been confided to my charge by the committee of the Senate to whom it was referred, I have felt it to be my duty to urge its consideration upon the Senate. Beyond this, I have no other solicitude than that which should be common to every Senator.

The bill is designed to regulate the fees and compensation of district attorneys, marshals, clerks, commissioners, jurors, and witnesses in the circuit and district courts of the United States, and to prescribe the costs which shall be taxed and recovered in these courts against the losing party in civil suits. The bill has, then, two objects in view; and a brief reference to the existing state of things, and the flagrant abuses that have grown up under the present system, will demonstrate the necessity of some measure of the kind.

There is now no uniform rule either for compensating the ministerial officers of the courts, or for the regulation of the costs in actions between private suitors. One system prevails in one district, and a totally different one in another; and in some cases it would be difficult to ascertain that any attention had been paid to any law whatever designed to regulate such proceedings. The act of February 28, 1799, which is the basis of the present system, contains but a partial and imperfect fee bill. For attorneys, it prescribes the fees in admiralty cases only, with a per diem for attending court, and a small annual salary; and for services not specially provided for, it allows the same compensation to attorneys and marshals as is allowed by the State statutes to attorneys and sheriffs for similar services rendered in the supreme court of the respective States. For clerks, in addition to the per diem of five dollars for attending court, it adopts the same rule, with one third added to the amount. It will hence be seen that the compensation of the officers, and the costs taxed in civil suits, is made to depend in a great degree on that allowed in the State courts. There are no two States where the allowance is the same.

When this system was adopted, it had the semblance of equality, which does not now exist. There were then but sixteen States, in all of which the laws prescribed certain taxable costs to attorneys for the prosecution and defense of suits. In several of the States which have since been added to the Union, no such cost is allowed; and in others the amount is inconsiderable. As the State fee bills are made so far the rule of compensation in the Federal courts, the Senate will perceive that totally different systems of taxation prevail in the different districts. In some, the district attorney receives no compensation beyond his small salary and per diem for a large portion of his most important services; while in others his fees are enormous, and the amount of cost which the losing party is made to pay to the attorney on the other side in civil suits, is so large as to be flagrantly oppressive. It is not only the officers of the courts, but the suitors also, that are affected by the present unequal, extravagant, and often oppressive system.

Take, for example, the case of the district attorneys. In some of the States, where no taxable costs are allowed to attorneys, a large amount of business has been thrown upon the district attorneys, in the settlement of land titles in which the United States were interested, and no compensation whatever can be allowed to these officers for their services in such cases. In other States, where a different system prevails in the State courts, adequate, and even extravagant fees are allowed for the same services. So, too, in criminal cases, great inequality prevails. In Georgia, for instance, the district attorney's fees for attending to a criminal prosecution are five dollars; in Pennsylvania they are six dollars; in New York, charges have been made to the amount of three, four, and five hundred dollars for precisely the same services. In Virginia a still different rule prevails, and twenty dollars are usually allowed for an indictment, and from fifty to one hundred dollars for attending to a criminal prosecution, under a discretionary authority given to the court to determine the compensation in the districts in that State.

The abuses that have grown up in the taxation of attorneys' fees which the losing party has been compelled to pay in civil suits, have been a matter of serious complaint. The papers before the committee show that in some cases those costs have been swelled to an amount exceedingly oppressive to suitors, and altogether disproportionate to the magnitude and importance of the causes in which they are taxed, or the labor bestowed. I have a bill before me where, upon a recovery of some $36 damages in a case of no complicated or expensive litigation, the attorney's fees are swelled with motions, orders, briefs, and attendances, &c., to more than $240, and the clerk's and commissioner's fees are nearly $100 more. This was all taxed against the losing party, who was thus compelled to pay for the services of the attorney employed against him. This was in the southern district of New York; and I notice it to illustrate the fault of the system, and not as matter of censure of the court for administering the law under such a system. Jurists of great eminence have made these abuses the subject of complaint, and they urge upon us the importance of providing a remedy. I have another bill of costs before me, allowed in an admiralty case in Florida, some years ago, in which there is taxed against the libellant, who failed to sustain his libel, more than $5,000; of this sum $2,500 is for the counsel fees of the prevailing party! Comment on such proceedings is unnecessary.

I have not the time to allude now to all the abuses that prevail in other respects. I hold in my hand an official report from the First Comptroller's Office, which shows that a clerk in Mississippi charged more than $3,000 for his per diem in attending court in three old bankrupt cases, from February, 1846, to November, 1849; an amount that is greater than the whole average annual expenditures for the United States judiciary in the great State of Georgia. In another district, a clerk charged his per diem for some ninety-two days more than the whole time the court could have been held.

It is to correct the evils and remedy the defects of the present system, that the bill has been prepared and passed by the House of Representatives. It attempts to simplify the taxation of fees, by prescribing a limited number of definite items to be allowed. It is not in all respects such a bill as I would have preferred, but it is believed to be an improvement upon the present system. I think it would be a still greater improvement to substitute for district attorneys fixed salaries, proportionate to their services in the different districts, in place of the fees now received. There would be no difficulty in ascertaining such an amount as would be a fair and adequate compensation in the respective districts, and the advantage to the Government of having officers to look after its interests, not dependent upon the multiplication of processes and suits to secure a fair compensation for their services, must be obvious to every one.

The amendments recommended by the Senate committee are, with one exception, designed to remedy defects in the bill where fees were omitted, or placed too low to be compensatory for the service rendered. Experience will undoubtedly prove the necessity of further amendments. It is believed, however, that the bill will remedy the enormous abuses to which I have referred, that have grown out of the indefinite and unequal system that now prevails. The increased and increasing expenses of the courts of the United States may be accounted for, in some degree, by the growth of these abuses, as well as by the natural increase of business before the courts. These abuses attach to the system, and not generally to the courts. I will refer the Senate on this subject, to a statement furnished by the First Comptroller of the Treasury, in a communication to the Secretary of the Interior, under date of November 21, 1851. Here it is:

* Though the expenses of the courts are nearly all paid by the marshals, there are some exceptions to the general rule. There have been some bills for counsel fees and other extra services, and some for the ordinary services of clerks and district attorneys, every year audited in the name of the claimants, and paid to them directly, in addition to the sums advanced and paid to the marshals, the principal and largest of which are the following, allowed by my predecessor, and paid during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1849, to wit:

To Thomas J. Durant, district attorney of Louisiana, for professional services rendered by him, from July 1, 1846, to June 30, 1848.....$13,605 20
To S. W. Downs, for professional services in the same district..... 1,632 04
To Bailie Peyton, for services in the same district, from 1841 to 1845..... 12,834 56
The amount of all such payments appears annually in the published accounts of the expenditures of the Government, to which reference can be made.

To illustrate the mode in which costs are taxed in some of the districts, and to account in some degree perhaps for this increase of expenditures for the judiciary, I will refer to one or two cases which I find in the letter of the First Comptroller of the 26th of November, 1851, to the Secretary of the Interior:

Statement of the bills and items of costs charged by Prescott Hall, district attorney of the United States, and taxed by Judge Betts, in the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, in the causes and at the terms herein stated, to wit:

	Drawing costs, copying, and attorney's taxes	1 75	1 75	1 75
	One term fee	62½	62½	62½
	Attorney and colleague, on motion to extend recognizance, (forfeited)	3 00	3 00	-
	Other items	6 50	25	-
	Total	35 25	29 00	25 75

For May and June terms, as above..... 61 25
July term, ret'g $8 37½; for 3 items above, $9 00—total..... 29 25
September term, 1st, 2d, and 3d items, same as April term—total..... 35 00
October term, 1st, 2d, and 3d items, same as April term—total..... 32 00
November term, 1st, 2d, and 3d items, same as April term—total..... 26 00
December term, 1st, 2d, and 3d items, same as April term—total..... 36 25
1850—January term, 1st, 2d, and 3d items, same as April term—total..... 35 00
Mr. Hall's charges at nine terms of court..$280 50

The charges of Lorenzo B. Shepherd, the predecessor of Mr. Hall in the same cause, are as follows:

Date.	Items.	April.
1849—	February term, Shepherd's charges, (which include 1st and 3d items, $3 00 for motion to postpone trial; $50 00 for drawing indictment of 200 folios; $50 00 for engrossing and copying; and $25 00 for copies for the grand jury)	$178 25
	March term, 1st, 2d, and 3d items, same as April term above	29 87½
	April term, 1st, 2d, and 3d items, same as allowed by Mr. Hall, charged	29 00
	Total charge taxed and paid to Shepherd for three terms	237 12½

Total attorneys' fees taxed and paid for eleven terms of court..... 517 62½

Mr. Shepherd and Mr. Hall both charged for the April term, 1849—the former $29, and the latter $25 75.

In taxing these bills, the act of Congress of 1842, which confines the taxation in criminal cases to that of the criminal fee bill of the State, is wholly disregarded. The latter allows no retaining fees, and no term fees for attending to try a cause unless it is actually tried, and yet not less than eight or nine retaining fees are charged in a single cause. To show the different practice under the same law in the State courts, one of the accounts of a district attorney for one of the counties of the State of New York, is furnished by the Comptroller. This account includes all the ordinary services of a term, including the drawing three indictments, five trials, and preparation for the trial of thirteen causes; and yet the aggregate amount for the term is $62 06.

I refer to another table furnished from the same source, to exhibit the mode of charging adopted in some cases by the clerks:

Clerk's fees for attending district court for the southern district of Mississippi in bankruptcy:

Accounts of William Burns, clerk, for his per diem from May 19, 1845, to November 18, 1848, for 890 days' sitting in bankruptcy, at $5 per day.....$4,450 00
Four days on other business..... 20 00
$4,470 00
The whole number of days within that period was 1,280
Number of Sabbaths..... 182
Number of days charged for attendance..... 894
Number of days other than Sabbaths not charged.. 204
1,280

On the 7th February, 1846, the clerk reported to the Secretary of State of the United States that the number of applicants for relief under the bankrupt act was, cases.... 872
Number discharged..... 861
Proceedings withdrawn in cases..... 6
Abated by death of party..... 2
Number of cases then pending..... 3

Mr. Burns charged from February 7, 1846, (the date of that report,) to November 18, 1848, for his attendance on the court in bankruptcy to dispose of those three cases, 662 days, at $5 per day.....$3,310 00

S. J. Gholson, judge of that district, certified to the account, and "that the attendance upon said court sitting in 'bankruptcy of William Burns, clerk thereof, as specified 'in the foregoing abstract, was expressly required by me, 'and said clerk did actually so attend for the performance 'of the duties of his office."

"Given under my hand and seal," &c.

I now refer to an account for services rendered by the marshal of the district of Massachusetts, in order that I may correct an erroneous impression that prevails in some quarters in regard to it. The Comptroller gives the account in the communication to which I have already referred under the following caption:

Abstract of costs taxed and certified by the district judge and clerk in the district of Massachusetts.

Judge Sprague, the judge of the district court for the district of Massachusetts, upon being informed of this communication of the Comptroller, immediately denied having certified and allowed the account as there presented. He alleges that he certified and allowed but one of the accounts, under one of the indictments; and that when he certified it, it was not connected with the other accounts, which were upon separate sheets. It appears that they were subsequently put together and paged, with the certified sheet placed last in order, and thus presented to the Comptroller, who was thereby erroneously but naturally led to suppose, that all had been certified and allowed by the court. It is difficult to perceive, in a proceeding of this kind, where there would seem to be substantially but one offense charged, and but one trial in progress, any apparent object for bringing up each witness on six different writs of habeas corpus, and committing him on six different warrants, daily, week after week, except that of increasing the emoluments of the officers of the court. I shall here dismiss this subject with the remarks of the Comptroller on this point:

"The names of the witnesses are not given, but the facts and all the accounts indicate that there was but one set of witnesses in all the six causes, and but one examination, which was continued from day to day through a part of the month of April, and part of the month of May; that six of the eight witnesses committed to prison were all brought out of prison daily on six writs of habeas corpus—one in each cause—committed at night on six warrants—one in each cause; that this proceeding was repeated on twenty-eight different days; and although only one of the ninety-two witnesses sworn could be examined at a time, yet all the six witnesses must be brought up daily on six different writs of habeas corpus, to be present on the examination of each of the ninety-two witnesses. The charges of the district attorney were but $13 25 in each of these causes, amounting in the six causes to only $79 50."

SUGAR INTERESTS OF LOUISIANA.

REMARKS OF HON. JOHN MOORE,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1853.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. MOORE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I do not wish to consume the time of the committee at this late stage of the session, yet not having had an opportunity previously, I feel impelled by a sense of duty towards a large portion of the people of Louisiana, a State that I have the honor in part to represent, to ask permission to reply to some very erroneous opinions expressed by my friend from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] in debate in the early part of the session in relation to the sugar planters of Louisiana, by holding them up as "millionaire capitalists, whose interest is opposed to the interest of the laboring classes."

I was surprised that he, being a southern man, one of the favored classes, and having near relations and friends engaged in that culture, should have singled out a southern agricultural interest as a theme for an obnoxious method of attempting to array the poor against the rich—a method, in my opinion, not warranted in a country and Government like ours, where the poor have as much political power as the rich, and where the relative positions of men in this respect are daily changing.

I beg leave to express my dissent both from the premises and conclusions of that gentleman.

1st. There are no millionaires and few capitalists among sugar planters; the latter generally understand their own interest too well to embark in so uncertain and precarious a business.

2d. The interest of the sugar planter is not opposed to the interest of the laboring classes; on the contrary, as I shall, I think, be able to demonstrate.

When I speak of capitalists, I mean men who wield cash capital. I do not pretend to say that there is no capital invested in sugar plantations. The aggregate capital is very large, consisting, first, of the plantations previously employed in the cultivation of rice and cotton changed to the culture of sugar-cane for reasons hereinafter stated; second, of the steam-engines, sugar-mills, kettles, &c., &c., necessary to manufacture the cane into sugar, chiefly obtained from Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, and New York, which, at a fair estimate, must have cost at least $16,500,000, nearly all originally borrowed, and a considerable portion of which yet remains unpaid.

My friend [Mr. MEADE] said that "in his opinion, for every dollar pocketed by the capitalist about one cent goes into that of the laborer." Now, I beg leave to assure the gentleman and the House, that whatever may be the case in other branches of business, it will not apply to sugar planters in Louisiana; almost the very reverse is the fact, as I will show by a simple statement of facts.

I am guardian to a minor who owns part of a sugar plantation in partnership with others. One of the owners, who manages the concerns of the partnership, is a capable, attentive, and discreet person. The accounts are settled annually, and dividends of the profits, if any, made on making the settlement. For the crop of 1851, it was found that nearly the whole net proceeds of the crop had been expended in procuring the necessary supplies for the plantation, leaving but about five cents in the dollar to the proprietors for their own attention, industry, and interest on the capital invested. The balance went to labor, about in the following proportion, viz: Twenty per cent. to the manager, sugar-boiler, engineer, carpenters, bricklayers, coopers, and other laborers; five per cent. to physicians and others; twenty per cent. for pork, flour, and other provisions, principally from the State of Ohio. The balance was paid for clothing, hats, shoes, axes, hoes, plows, &c., principally from the eastern States; sugar-kettles, gratebars, &c., as repairs, from Tennessee; hoop-poles from Kentucky; horses and mules from Missouri; wagons and carts from Wheeling, Virginia, &c.; together with the cost of transporting those supplies to the plantation. This, too, was exclusive of the freight, insurance, and charges on the sugar and molasses to market, deducted from the sales by the factors before rendering the accounts on which our settlement was made. The freight alone amounted to about $2,300, paid principally to vessels owned in the New England States.

It will be perceived by this statement that about twenty-five per cent. went to labor in Louisiana, and about seventy per cent. to labor in other States, over and above the freight and charges of the crop to market.

It is true, that the season of 1851-'52 was rather unprofitable; for, although the production was an average crop, the quality was inferior, and the prices low. Better results are anticipated from the crop of 1852.

I can assure all who take an interest in the matter, that in order to succeed well in sugar planting, a knowledge of the business, together with close attention and strict economy, are required. I would not advise persons entertaining the opinion expressed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] to engage in sugar planting; they would most assuredly deceive themselves, and fail, as I have known many to do.

I have shown, from facts, that the interest of the sugar planters is not opposed to labor, but is in reality an auxiliary to, and rewards labor. It increases the internal carrying-trade to a great extent. Two hundred and thirty thousand hogsheads of sugar, with the molasses therefrom, (being about the average crop of Louisiana,) gives a carrying-trade about equal to 1,000,000 bales of cotton, although the net proceeds will not exceed the net proceeds of 230,000 bales of cotton.

There is another view of the subject that may be fairly taken; it is this: there are now from sixty thousand to seventy thousand hands employed in the cultivation of sugar in Louisiana. Destroy that cultivation, and those hands will be employed, most probably, in the cultivation of cotton; if not on the same lands, they will be removed to better cotton lands—say to Texas, the fairest portion of these United States for planting. That number of hands will produce 400,000 bales of cotton, on an average, on good cotton lands. There is already a sufficient quantity, if not too much cotton produced, and it is a well-known axiom in trade, that an over supply reduces prices more than the proportion of the excess.

Our wisest men have over again and often recommended that a portion of the labor now employed in the cultivation of cotton be diverted to some other branch of industry, in order to prevent an over supply. Then, if this view be correct, the cotton planters, not only in Louisiana, but in the whole cotton-growing region of the United States, have a direct interest in maintaining the cultivation of sugar—not by any unreasonable protection, (it is not asked,) but by extending to that branch of industry the same incidental encouragement that may be extended to others, in any adjustment of the tariff that may be required to fix the revenues to the standard necessary to carry on the Government under an economical administration, being the point promised to and expected by the people.

The culture of sugar in the United States did not take its rise under any tariff intended to protect that interest. I find that, in 1789, the first Congress under the present Constitution imposed specific duties on sugar, molasses, tea, and coffee.

In 1800, the duties on sugar were fixed at two and a half cents per pound on brown, three cents on clayed, five cents on loaf, five cents per gallon on molasses, and four cents per pound on coffee. This was some years before the acquisition of Louisiana.

During the war with Great Britain, the duties on all articles were doubled, to defray the expenses of the war. After the expiration of the war, in 1816, the duty on brown sugar was fixed at three cents per pound.

Very little sugar cane was grown in Louisiana previous to the war of 1812. It began to be cultivated as a crop during that war, because of the difficulty of its importation and high price, and because there was no demand for cotton, then the principal production of Louisiana.

In 1816, the amount of sugar produced in Louisiana did not exceed 16,000 hogsheads. The cultivation then declined until about the year 1820, when a disease in the cotton plant called the rot, induced many planters to turn their attention to sugar.

In 1828, the crop of sugar in Louisiana had increased to 88,000 hogsheads. It again fell off to 30,000 hogsheads in 1835. That short crop increased the price to double previous rates, which gave a stimulus to its further and more successful cultivation.

In 1849, the crop in Louisiana amounted to 247,000 hogsheads. It again fell off to 211,000 hogsheads in 1850.

I have made some investigations in relation to the imports of foreign sugar, and the foreign prices as compared with the home, and the probable quantity consumed in the United States, that are both curious and instructive, and which, in my opinion, prove conclusively, that the incidental encouragement given to that branch of industry by the duties on imports, intended entirely as revenue measures, have tended to reduce the price to the consumers very considerably.

In 1815, Louisiana sugar sold on the levee in New Orleans, at fifteen cents per pound. The quantity then produced did not exceed 15,000 hogsheads. In 1831 the sugar crop in Louisiana was estimated at about 70,000 hogsheads. Prices in New Orleans ranged at from four to five cents per pound. In 1835, the crop fell off to 30,000 hogsheads. In the early part of 1836, prices went up to ten and twelve cents per pound.

The imports of brown sugars in 1847–'48 were 248,000,000 pounds. The average foreign value was three and sixty-one hundredths cents per pound. The crop of Louisiana that year was 240,000 hogsheads. The average prices of homemade sugar in New Orleans, during the season, were from two and three quarters to four cents per pound, and sold as low as two and a quarter in April, one and three quarters in May, and one and a half cents per pound in June.

In 1849–'50 the imports of brown sugars were 198,000,000 pounds. The average foreign value was three and forty-two one hundredths cents per pound. The crop of Louisiana was 247,000 hogsheads. The average prices of homemade sugar in New Orleans, during the twelve months, were three and one twelfth to four and one third cents per pound; and during five months, from January to May, inclusive, it sold as low as two and a half cents per pound.

In 1850–'51 the imports of brown sugars were 363,537,861 pounds; the average foreign value three and fifty-four one hundredths cents; the crop of Louisiana was 211,000 hogsheads, a considerable portion of which sold on the levee in New Orleans as low as one and a half, one and three quarters, and two cents per pound.

According to a document published by Congress in 1830, the consumption of sugar in the United States in the year 1829, was estimated at 136,000,000 pounds; and it was estimated that in twenty-five years it would be increased to 300,000,000 pounds, and that probably by that time Louisiana would produce nearly that quantity. The result, however, has been widely different. From the best authority, the quantity consumed in the United States in the year ending 30th of June, 1851, is estimated to have exceeded 640,000,000 pounds, and the amount produced in Louisiana was about 230,000,000 pounds.

These facts and figures, taken from the best authorities, the reports of commerce and navigation, De Bow's Review, Champonier's Reports, the prices-current of New Orleans, &c., sustain the position that I have taken, that the cultivation of sugar to its present extent in the United States has reduced the prices to the consumers to a very considerable extent; they show, too, that if the freight and charges on the foreign brown sugar be added to the cost, that the Louisiana sugar uniformly sells in New Orleans at a lower rate, except when there is a considerable falling off in the Louisiana crop; and yet the best Louisiana brown sugar is a cleaner and more desirable article for family use than the foreign brown sugars. It will no doubt be asked why it is? The only reasons obvious to me are, that the production falls short of the necessary quantity for the consumption of the country, and that a large quantity must be imported, and that the West India sugar, being made from a more matured plant, is dryer, less liable to lose in weight, and therefore better as an article of commerce for speculation, as it can be kept on hand a longer time to wait a favorable market.

In the course of the discussion, several gentlemen favorable to free trade advocated direct taxation for the support of the General Government as the true policy. That will do to talk about—to demagogue a little. I am old enough to know something about direct taxation for that purpose. I lived during the embargo and war of 1812, when resort was had to that means, and am therefore privileged to give an opinion. Put it in practice, and you will throw the whole burden on the industrial classes, principally the agricultural. The politicians, office-holders, moneyed men, and popinjays about towns and cities, that wear foreign finery and consume foreign luxuries, will contribute nothing. The industrial classes now pay town, city, county, and State direct taxes. Add direct taxes for the support of the Federal Government, send your Federal tax-collector down among the people, and let him begin to seize the cattle, horses, agricultural implements, &c., for the payment of taxes. I would not like to be in the place of that officer, nor of the party that imposed the tax. That party, sir, would be hurled from power like a trap-ball; it would vanish, as the old Federal party did more than half a century ago, when it imposed the excise law, the stamp act, the alien and sedition law, and others of like nature.

RECIPROCAL TRADE.

REMARKS OF MR. TOWNSHEND,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1853,

On the "Bill establishing Reciprocal Trade with the British North American Provinces on certain conditions."

Mr. TOWNSHEND said:

Mr. SPEAKER: At this late day of the session I would not tax the patience of the House by any further discussion of this question, were it not that no gentleman representing any part of the valley of the St. Lawrence—the region especially interested in some of the most important provisions of this bill—has yet been heard upon the subject.

AGRICULTURAL INTEREST.

And in the first place I beg to offer a remark or two for the purpose of quieting the fears of some gentlemen here—opponents of the measure—who seem to imagine that reciprocal free trade with Canada is likely to be prejudicial to the agricultural interest of the country, and especially to that of the Northwest. Perhaps I may venture to speak for this interest. I am myself a farmer, and I represent, in part, one of the best agricultural regions of the whole country.

The Canadas annually produce some fifteen millions of bushels of wheat, not more than one third of which can be spared for exportation. This surplus, it is supposed, may come into competition with the wheat grown in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan. But when it is recollected that the price of wheat in those States, and also in Canada, is governed by the European, and particularly the English market, to which our surplus, together with that of Canada, is sent, it is easily seen that it cannot be possible for Canadian producers to undersell us in our own market. But all these fears are utterly groundless in view of the fact that the production of wheat in the British American Provinces is necessarily limited by the rigors of the climate, a part of Canada only being adapted for wheat culture, while the amount that may be produced in our northwestern States is almost illimitable. Why, sir, one of the counties of the Congressional district in which I reside, the county of Wayne, had, last year, seventy thousand acres of wheat, the crop of which averaged thirty bushels an acre, or in the aggregate, amounting to over two millions of bushels. In Ohio there are eighty-five counties, each one of which could readily produce one million of bushels a year, without interfering in any inconvenient degree with other agricultural products. Under these circumstances, does any one fear the competition of the Canadas? The idea is absurd.

All that the agricultural interest of the Northwest demands is, the removal of the obstacles thrown in the way of trade by a high and unequal tariff, and to secure the free navigation of the river St. Lawrence. Only permit us to sell where we can sell dearest, and to buy where we can buy cheapest—permit us to avail ourselves of any market we can find for our wheat and pork, beef, cheese, and other articles—permit us to buy lumber, fish, and whatever else we need without restrictions, and we ask no favors of this Government or of the rest of mankind. We have no conscious weakness to excite our fears of competition; we are not contending against the economy and laws of nature, and therefore we ask for no artificial protection. This point settled, I come now to consider briefly the bearings of reciprocity on the coal trade.

COAL INTEREST.

It is to be regretted that the bill reported by the committee does not provide for the free exportation and importation of coal. I sincerely hope it will be amended in this particular. My anxiety for this amendment does not arise simply from the fact that the shipping interest of the lakes desires the profits of the trade, nor merely from my conviction that it will directly promote the general interests of the country; but also from the fact which is, or which ought to be, perfectly understood, that without this provision for free trade in coal, our proposed reciprocity will not be accepted by the Provincial Parliament. To obtain a market for this coal is the principal object with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and the only consideration that will induce them to concede to us the benefits of their coast fisheries.

At present, Pennsylvania almost monopolizes the coal trade of the country. That State sells some five millions of tons annually, at a cost to consumers of $20,000,000. It is not, therefore, surprising that the coal interest there should resist the free importation of coals from Nova Scotia, where they are found in great abundance and of excellent quality. It may, however, be seriously doubted whether the coal interest of Pennsylvania has anything to fear from free trade in this article, though if it has it is just as certain that other important interests of that great State would be proportionately promoted.

The coal imported from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick is highly bituminous, some of it containing as much as sixty per cent. of volatile matter. Such coal as this can never come into competition with the anthracite of Pennsylvania. The latter will always be preferred for domestic and some other purposes; and in confirmation of this, I may refer to the fact, that the British Cunard steamers, which stop at Halifax, do not and cannot use the Nova Scotia coal, but obtain the coal they use from Pennsylvania, though at a much higher price. It is also equally notorious, that all the anthracite in Pennsylvania would not make gas enough to supply the city of Philadelphia for a single evening; nor from the Cumberland coal can gas be made without the admixturé of some more bituminous variety. Free trade in coal will therefore result in the exportation of Pennsylvania coals to be used for purposes to which they are best adapted, and in the importation of coals from the Provinces to be used for the special purposes to which they are suited. It is also true that an increased consumption of anthracite will, to some extent, take place, for it is known that some factories in the East are now lying idle, because they cannot, without paying a high duty, obtain a certain amount of Pictou coal, which they find it beneficial to use in connection with that from Pennsylvania. Such is the difference in the qualities of these coals, and so different the purposes for which each is especially adapted, that Pennsylvania and Nova Scotia can scarcely come into direct competition. But the Liverpool coal, which more closely resembles that from Nova Scotia, will suffer more by this competition, and must ultimately be driven from our market.

The importance of the western coal trade can scarcely have been taken into consideration by those representing the coal interest here. This is already of great consequence, but it is speedily destined to be immensely increased. Our lake trade now employs about seventy-four thousand tons of steam-vessels mostly using coal, and the whole of the Canadas are entirely destitute of the article, so that Toronto and other growing cities will be compelled to obtain their supplies from the western part of Pennsylvania and from Ohio. The demand in this direction will be an equivalent for any competition or diminution of demand in the eastern cities.

Pennsylvania is also largely engaged in the manufacture of iron; this is, in fact, her especial manufacturing interest. The iron manufacturers are now compelled to compete with those of England at a great disadvantage, not only on account of the difference in the price of labor, but also on account of the difference in the price of coal. In England, iron can be afforded cheap, mainly because in many localities the iron and coal and a clay suitable for fire bricks, and of which furnaces can be built, are found in alternate layers; it therefore costs nothing to bring the iron and coal together. Should, therefore, the introduction of coal from the British Provinces have the effect to reduce the price of coals, as some suppose, it will in the same ratio increase the profits of the iron-masters. The manufacturers of the East are also equally interested with the iron men in obtaining cheap fuel.

But there is another consideration which, of itself, ought to be conclusive in favor of free trade in this article. Fuel is about as much a necessary of life as food; and for those that live in the great Atlantic cities, coal is fast becoming the only fuel. Now, the question is, shall we, by legislation preventing competition, compel the millions who want coal and must have it to pay an extra and exorbitant price in order that a few brokers, owning coal stocks, may realize enormous profits? At this age of the world, will a monopoly which bears with such crushing weight on the working classes, longer be tolerated? I think not. And I believe I may safely leave this matter and proceed to speak of the lumber interest.

LUMBER TRADE.

The British Provinces have almost inexhaustible supplies of pine lumber. This is greatly needed for building purposes in most of the western cities, and through the prairie country of the West immense quantities would be used could it be freely imported. It is needed, also, in the eastern States by those of our manufacturers whose wares are made wholly or in part of this material; and in all the eastern cities it is as absolutely needed as in the West for building purposes; in fact, it is there a necessary of life; house and home, which cannot be built without lumber, are just as necessary as food and fire.

Maine and North Carolina have pine lumber for exportation. The lumber from these States, and particularly that from North Carolina, finds a market in our Atlantic cities, and also in the British West India islands, where it is received without any discrimination being made in favor of Canadian lumber. This West India market is so valuable that North Carolina makes little or no objection to the free admission of Canadian lumber into those sections of the Union that could not, from their geographical position and the want of water communication, be supplied from that State, the West India market being an equivalent for, and better than that of the western States. But Maine, from which a large share of the best timber is already cut, wants to exclude the lumber of the Canadas, and to force her spruce and inferior pine on the market at high prices. It is asserted, that unless competition from the Provinces is prevented, and the absolute monopoly of the trade be secured to Maine, her hardy lumbermen cannot make fair wages, because, as they express it, "stumpage is so high." This stumpage is the price paid by the lumbermen to the landed proprietors for the privilege of cutting the timber, and varies, as I am told, according to quality and location, from two dollars up to eight dollars a thousand feet. It is the monopoly of the trade excluding foreign lumber that enables the Maine landholders to charge so much for stumpage. Increase the duty on imported lumber, and stumpage will rise still higher; reduce the duties, and then stumpage will be lower. Prices regulate stumpage, and the lumbermen will not be affected, whether stumpage be high or low. The hardy lumbermen, over whom tears are almost shed, are not benefited in the least, but rather injured by those high duties, and all this humbug of protection is not designed for their benefit, but for the benefit of the wealthy few.

The Provinces are ready to concede to the United States the free navigation of the St. John; but with this bonus Maine is not satisfied. She demands, in addition, not only the West India market, which is already granted, but also that all the ports of the British islands shall be open to her lumber. Of course, we do not object to the opening of the ports of Great Britain. We do not in the least object to Maine getting a good bargain. On the contrary, we would be glad to see it; but we protest against loading down this bill with provisions which are probably designed, and certainly calculated, to defeat the whole measure by making it impossible for the Provinces to agree. Shall the St. Lawrence remain closed to our commerce, and the interests of the whole North be sacrificed? Shall the whole country be taxed, and its progress arrested for the sake of this monopoly, when the whole value of the entire lumber trade of Maine bears such an insignificant proportion to the interests to be promoted by a liberal reciprocity? Assuredly not. And now a word or two in reference to manufactures.

MANUFACTURING INTEREST.

I am happy to see that but little opposition to this measure comes from the representatives of the manufacturing interest. The manufactures of Canada are not in a condition to compete with ours, and of course ours do not need to be protected against them. On the other hand, many of our wares will find in Canada an excellent market, and eastern manufacturers are, some of them, already becoming convinced that the Canadian market is worth more to them than any protective duty they will be likely to obtain. Our manufacturers will also be benefited by the free introduction of various kinds of raw material. To cheapen these is to increase the manufacturer's profits, or what is the same thing, it enables him to enter into competition more successfully with the foreign article. And further, by establishing an extensive free list of Canadian unmanufactured articles, the more tariff must be raised from those articles which come more into competition with our own. The manufacturing interest, in fact, loses nothing by reciprocity with Canada, but gains much. Having said thus much in reply to some of the objections to this measure, let us now consider some of its advantages.

TRADE WITH CANADA.

Some idea of the beneficial character of our Canadian trade, and the still greater benefits to be derived from a liberal reciprocity, may be obtained by a view of the extent to which this trade has already reached, in spite of all obstacles and restrictions. I will not consume the time of the House by reading tabular statements, but content myself with giving amounts in round numbers, securing, however, substantial accuracy. Our registered exports to the British North American Provinces for the last year exceed $13,000,000, and the registered imports from the same quarter exceed $6,000,000. But inasmuch as it is impossible to watch thoroughly by Government officials a border of two thousand miles in extent, it is certain that the actual trade is much greater. We may safely set down the aggregate at $20,000,000. This trade has all sprung up within a few years. It is now rapidly increasing, and would continue to increase beyond any previous ratio, were it not for the obstacles interposed by unwise legislation. The average rate of duties levied by Canada on goods imported from the United States is twelve-and-a-half per cent., while the average of duties levied by the United States on goods imported from the Canadas is twenty-three per cent. This inequality of duties accounts in part for the difference between our exports and imports, which in a great measure destroys the mutual advantage of the trade. But the worst effect of such high duties is to stop trade in many articles altogether. Our merchants cannot now import an article, however much it may be needed, unless it will pay a sufficient profit over and above the twenty-three per cent., nor can they carry there the productions of our skill and industry unless they can make on them a living profit over and above the twelve per cent. duty charged in Canada, and consequently the exchange of many articles is entirely prevented which else might be exchanged with great mutual benefit. These restrictions on our trade are of course highly injurious to our shipping interest. Freights have to be increased, as the certainty of return cargoes is lessened. But let trade be free and the number of articles of exchange increased, and freights might be greatly reduced, and yet larger profits be made.

And when these restrictions are removed, other sections of the Union will share with the lake country in the benefits of the Canadian trade. Kentucky will find a new market for her tobacco and hemp. Louisiana secures a market for her raw sugar. South Carolina gains admission for her rice; and in addition to these products from opposite sides of the Union, our manufacturing States will find a new and profitable market for their wares.

FREE NAVIGATION OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

But the principal obstacle in the way of the commerce of the lakes will only be removed when Great Britain shall be induced to concede to us the free navigation of the river St. Lawrence. What are these great lakes but expansions of this magnificent river? It is the natural outlet to the ocean, and not less is it the natural highway for our commerce with the world. But because this river has been closed against us, other and artificial channels of communication between the lakes and the sea-board have been constructed at enormous expense, which has been justified by the incalculable benefit some of these, as the Erie canal, have been to the country and to the West. But besides the expensiveness of using these artificial channels—and that is no trifle, for the Erie canal levied $3,000,000 last year in tolls on produce going east and on merchandise going west—there is another and still more serious objection: they are inadequate to our wants; not all the railroads and canals that have been constructed since the Erie canal, are able yet to meet the demands of our commerce.

The trade of the great lakes in 1851 was $326,000,000, or more by $40,000,000 than the exports of the whole country. This trade employs some two hundred and fifteen thousand tons of shipping, of which about two thirds are in sailing vessels, and about one third is propelled by steam. The sum invested in this shipping is over $8,000,000, and so long as we are not permitted to use the river St. Lawrence, this $8,000,000 is compelled to lie idle and unproductive for about one third of the year, while the interest on the capital thus invested is running up to $250,000. If the navigation of the St. Lawrence were secured to us, a large proportion of this shipping would load up in the fall with the produce of the West, and run down the St. Lawrence and out to sea before the ice had closed the river. During the winter, voyages would be made to England, to the Mediterranean, to the West Indies, or to South America. In the spring they would return, bringing cargoes from the countries they had visited, or they would bring fish from the Provinces, pass up the river again, and be on the lakes in time for the summer trade.

A gentleman near me remarks "that the lake craft dare not venture upon a navigation so dangerous as that of the Gulf of St. Lawrence." To that I reply, that the men who dare to sail on Lake Erie, where there is neither depth of water nor sea-room, will not be afraid of that gulf, nor of any other place where money is to be made. A few years since, a vessel started from Cleveland, loaded with western produce, and carrying some of my neighbors as passengers; she went down the St. Lawrence, by special permission, then out to sea, and round by Cape Horn to San Francisco, in safety—thus practically solving this problem; and it was not inappropriate, therefore, that she was named the Eureka. Make the river free to us, and thousands of vessels will follow in the same course.

The people living in the valley of the St. Lawrence are of the opinion that the Government of the United States ought to make an effort in reference to this river as decided as that which was so successfully and properly made in 1803, to secure the freedom of the Mississippi. The St. Lawrence is to the North and West what the Mississippi is to the West and South. The valley of the St. Lawrence is not less important to the country than the valley of the Mississippi. It contains half a million of square miles, embracing, on our side of the line, western Vermont, northern and western New York, northwestern Pennsylvania, the northern portions of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, the whole of Michigan, and part of Wisconsin and Minnesota. It already has a population exceeding four millions, and it is not unworthy of note in estimating its future, that it lies within those latitudes where the densest population of the Old World is to be found. With the exception of the agricultural, the most important resources of this great valley are almost entirely undeveloped. Scarcely anything has yet been done to open to the world the immense mineral resources of the Lake Superior region. Around that vast inland sea the whole country almost seems to be but a succession of rich ore beds; copper, iron, and lead are found there in greater abundance than elsewhere in the world. When the ship canal around the Falls of the St. Mary's river, now about being commenced, shall have been completed, the whole mineral wealth of this region will be made available. Millions of tons of coal from Ohio and from Pennsylvania will be carried thither, and copper and iron brought back in return. But besides the agricultural and mineral resources of the St. Lawrence valley, it is possessed of unequaled hydraulic power, which is to be applied, and at no distant day, to manufacturing purposes. To say nothing of the various rapids between the head waters of the St. Lawrence and its mouth, there is Niagara, where alone seems to be power enough to turn all the wheels in the world. Hitherto this prodigious accumulation of power has run to waste. This cannot be suffered longer. The people who tame the lightning, and compel it to run on errands, will soon put bands on this old giant, and compel him to grind in the prison-house. There is, therefore, in nature nothing wanting to make this valley the great manufacturing region of the country but the removal of those commercial restrictions which alone prevent the development of its immense resources.

COAST FISHERIES, ETC.

We have still another inducement to adopt a liberal measure of reciprocity, inasmuch as on this is likely to depend a satisfactory adjustment of the difficulties growing out of the coast fisheries. By an existing convention, as we all understand, our vessels are not permitted to fish within a marine league of the shores of the British Provinces, nor have they the privilege of drying and packing on shore. By the first of these prohibitions they are excluded from the best fishing-grounds; by the second, they are prevented from securing properly what they do take. From both these restrictions they would gladly escape, and it is not surprising that both are often disregarded; and hence Great Britain has to send ships-of-war to secure to the fishermen of the Provinces the enjoyment of their monopoly. Our vessels are often seized, and much irritation and some danger grows out of it. If we can offer to the British Provinces a liberal scheme of reciprocal free trade, it is understood they will surrender all exclusive right to take fish upon their coasts, and our fishermen will have free access to the best fishing-grounds in the world. Should this arrangement be made, every family in the Union may be benefited, because fish may then be obtained at lower rates and of better quality. In its national bearings, this free access to the provincial fishing-grounds is universally conceded to be of vast importance. The fishing trade thus opened will give employment to tens of thousands of men and boys, and so become the great nursery for seamen, from which our naval and mercantile marine may always be supplied. The importance of this consideration cannot easily be overestimated.

We come, then, to the conclusion that this measure of reciprocal free trade with Canada will not injure any section of this Union, nor scarcely any of its particular interests, even temporarily, while it is of vital importance to a large portion of the country, and will, by its direct effects, or by the collateral advantages secured in connection with it, be highly beneficial to the whole. So far as this measure goes, it is a step in the right direction; it knocks off some of the fetters with which commerce has too long been bound. I believe that "sound policy requires a system of free trade with all nations that will trade free with the United States." We think this especially true in reference to these neighboring Provinces, settled, as they are to a great extent, by a people having the same origin, language, and pursuits; being, in fact, in many instances our relatives or friends, and often separated from us merely by an imaginary line. It is for the interest of these neighbors to trade and make exchanges, and they will do it. Then, why not openly permit what you cannot and ought not to prevent?

I know that some of the friends of this measure have doubts of its success at the present session. We are now near its close, and perhaps attention has not been sufficiently turned to this subject. Lest these fears should prove to be well founded, which, however, I am not willing to believe, I take this occasion to say that this beneficial measure can certainly be secured if those interested in the commerce of the valley of the St. Lawrence will bestir themselves. The subject is but imperfectly understood even by those most immediately interested. The press must do its work, and the public mind must be informed and aroused. Let the Representatives to Congress from this noble valley come thoroughly posted up on this question, and prepared at the outset to insist that the most efficient man from the whole lake region be placed on the Committee on Commerce. Finally, let them act in concert, and whatever is not obtained at this session will be secured at the next.

Before taking my seat, Mr. Speaker, I would move an amendment to the bill by inserting the word "coal" among the articles enumerated in the first section. I desire also to move an amendment in reference to lumber, but as there is now pending a motion to commit, these amendments, I know, would not be in order. I hope to have an opportunity to propose them at the proper time. There is, however, another change which I very much desire, and as I cannot move it as an amendment, I ask that by general consent it may be made as a correction. The bill provides for the free exchange of undried fruit, while dried fruit is not embraced within its provisions. The south shore of Lake Erie is a beautiful fruit region; our peaches are equal to those of New Jersey, and our apples I think the best in the country. These apples in the undried state are barreled up for exportation, and this trade is of some consequence to us, but our trade in dried apples and peaches is, I believe, much more important, and restrictions on it would operate severely on the fairest portion of our constituents. Sir, the pretty daughters of our western farmers have a commendable way of making their pin-money by drying this fruit. I trust, therefore, that no gentleman will think of raising an objection to a correction, so that the bill instead of "undried fruits," may read "fruits dried and undried."

The SPEAKER. No objection is made. The Clerk will make the correction.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I conclude, sir, by expressing the hope, that when the bill comes up for final action, it will first be amended, and then passed.

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

SPEECH OF HON. TRUMAN SMITH,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE SENATE, February 17, 1853,

On the bill for the protection of the Emigrant Route and a Telegraphic line, and for an Overland Mail between the Missouri River and the settlements in California and Oregon.

Mr. SMITH said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I do not know but that this subject has already been sufficiently discussed to enlighten the deliberations of the Senate, and to conduct us to such results as shall accord with the public interest. I am a strong friend of this measure, and do not intend it shall be killed off by unnecessary or protracted debate. If, therefore, the Senate will indicate a desire to bring the question at once to the test of a vote, I will resume my seat.

Mr. GWIN. Agreed! let us have a vote.

Mr. COOPER. I desire to address the Senate on the subject, and cannot consent to forego the privileges of the floor.

Several SENATORS, to Mr. SMITH. Go on! Go on!

Mr. SMITH. I must, then, throw myself on the indulgence of the Senate in submitting a few remarks, which I trust will be accorded to me, if for no other reason, in consideration of the fact that I seldom obtrude myself on the notice of this body, and never except to discuss some matter of practical importance. I have taken no part in the discussion of a variety of questions which have been raised here touching our foreign relations, and which have occupied a large portion of our time during the present session, to the exclusion of this and other matters deeply concerning the welfare of the American people. But though we are brought very late to an examination of this bill, I hope enough of time and opportunity remains to enable us to make an enlightened and proper disposition of the question before us. And what, sir, is that question? It is whether we shall now adopt a measure commended to our confidence by the deliberations of some of the ablest and most experienced members of this body.

I confess, Mr. President, I have concluded, contrary to my first impression, that it is my duty to acquiesce in the result of those deliberations, and to give the bill before us, with slight exceptions, my cordial support. It is true I did, very early in the debate, express the opinion that it would be impracticable, during the present short session, so to arrange and settle the general plan and details of a bill as that it would command the support of the two Houses of Congress. I therefore insisted that nothing more could be done than to make provision for such surveys and explorations as would be required for a proper and just appreciation of the subject by the next Congress. But the Select Committee, at the head of which my honorable and excellent friend, the Senator from TEXAS, [Mr. RUSK,] has been placed, has satisfied me that I was mistaken. They have brought before us a bill which seems to me to have been well considered, and to be substantially right, both in its general plan and details. I am, therefore, for pressing this bill to a vote; I am for taking the judgment of the Senate on the subject, and let those incur the responsibility who would defeat the measure and postpone even the commencement of this work for two years longer. Be it remembered, if we do not act now, no bill can be got through the next Congress until July or August, 1854, and that little or nothing can be done to advance the measure until the spring of 1855. Hence, sir, I rejoice at the success of the committee, and I desire to proffer to them my cordial thanks for their indefatigable labors. If nothing is now done on this important subject, no one can think of laying the blame at their door.

I repeat, Mr. President, I consider this bill substantially right. I do not mean that either the general plan or details are such as I would have proposed. I suppose if every honorable member were to be charged with a subject like this, susceptible of an infinite variety of plans and details, each would adopt a measure having a specific character, and differing from that of every other member. If we are to wait until every member has before him exactly the scheme he would prefer, we should wait until the end of time. I feel myself under an obligation to lay aside my preferences and my notions of what would be best in dealing with such a subject. If I can find in the bill a plan that is practicable, and which does not compromit any great public interest, or violate any fundamental principle, it will be enough for me. I shall feel it to be my duty to accord to it my support.

And what, Mr. President, is the object contemplated by this bill, and what is the scheme by which that object is to be reached? The former is one of the most magnificent which could be proposed to an American Senate, being no less than the establishment of a railroad and telegraphic communication between the navigable waters of the Mississippi river, or one of its tributaries, and those of the Pacific coast, and this, too, wholly within our own territory—an enterprise of vast magnitude, which, when accomplished, cannot fail to produce results of infinite consequence to ourselves, and to the world. The scheme is a moderate one. It does not involve an appropriation of any considerable amount of the public treasure, and certainly no part of the public domain now of much value, and yet it holds out such encouragements for the investment of private capital, and the enlistment of private enterprise, as to make the execution of the work, within a reasonable period, morally certain. The bill sets aside $20,000,000 for this work, to be advanced as it progresses, and grants in the States alternate sections of the public lands, on each side of the road, for six miles in width, and in the Territories, for twelve miles in width. It makes it the duty of the President, after obtaining the requisite information, to fix the termini and general course of the road, and then directs him to enter into a contract, after public notice, with the lowest bidders, for the construction of the road and telegraphic line, with regulations and details which need not be specified. The contractors are to own the road and line, and to levy tolls subject to the supervision and control of Congress to a certain extent, and are to surrender them up to the United States at the end of thirty years, should Congress so elect on terms which would seem to be equitable and just. In the mean time, they are to be subjected to such burdens by the free transportation of the mails, and the officers, troops, and property of the United States, as are likely, in course of thirty years, to be more than an equivalent for the money advanced and the land granted. The bill also confers on the contractors corporate powers, which would seem to be quite important, if not indispensable, to a proper execution of the contract, the convenience of the parties, and the safety of the capital to be advanced by them.

To this bill the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD] has proposed an amendment, the only effect of which will be to adjourn over the whole project for an indefinite period. He moves to strike out the enacting clause, and to substitute a provision for such explorations and surveys, by and under the direction of the Secretary of War, as he may deem advisable to ascertain the most practicable and economical route, for a railroad from the Mississippi to the Pacific; and also a further provision authorizing and requiring the Secretary to receive proposals from individuals or associations, for the construction of the road, to be laid before Congress at its next session.

This amendment, Mr. President, will, if adopted, be in substance a rejection of the bill, and a repudiation of the labors of the committee. It is certain, that if we are to have a thorough exploration and survey of all the various routes, and the costs of each precisely ascertained so that we may determine which is the most practicable and economical, as an indispensable preliminary to the action of Congress, the work cannot be commenced in many years.

The honorable Senator would seem to contemplate a survey of all possible routes, and of all possible modifications of each route, for in no other way can the question of comparative practicability and economy be settled. Of course he must cause a survey to be made by way of the South Pass to the navigable waters of the Columbia, if not to Puget's Sound, and then, also, by the same pass, to San Francisco. He must cause a survey to be made by way of New Mexico and Walker's Pass, to the Pacific; and then he must take up each of these general routes, and examine all the various modifications which may be suggested. He must also ascertain what is the number of square yards of embankments, excavations, and masonry, which would be required on each route, together with the cost of viaducts, depôts, and other structures, indispensable to the proper working of a railroad. He would be obliged to organize several corps of engineers, and employ them on different parts of the work, and each would have to be protected by detachments from the Army. How long would it take to execute such a work, and what amount of expenditure would be required?

Fortunately, we have the lights of experience to guide us. On the 30th of May next it will be four years since we commenced running the boundary between the United States and Mexico, in conformity with the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. The work has not been finished to this day, and has cost us half a million of dollars; and yet at least one half of that boundary consisted of rivers; and with respect to the other half we had nothing to do but to draw a line from point to point on the surface of the earth, and mark it by suitable monuments. How infinitely more vast is the undertaking proposed by the honorable Senator! Estimates of embankments, excavations, masonry, and other matters appertaining to a railroad, would be found to be quite a different affair from merely settling a line, as in the case of the United States and Mexico. I verily believe the surveys that would be necessary to enable Congress to determine which is the most practicable and most economical route would require more time and a larger expenditure of money than the construction of the road itself.

But the honorable Senator [Mr. BRODHEAD] requires the Secretary of War to receive proposals for the construction of a road from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean, and to lay them before Congress at the next session. How can proposals be made when the honorable Senator does not condescend to inform us how, when, or where this road is to be constructed? He does not say whether it is to be a road to the Columbia river or to San Francisco, or if to the latter point, whether it shall have its course through the South Pass or by New Mexico;—whether its eastern terminus shall be on the Mississippi or at some point in the western boundary of Arkansas, Missouri, or Iowa;—whether it is to be a road with a single or double track, nor whether it shall be finished in five years or twenty-five. The idea of getting any valuable information for the guidance of Congress in this strange way, cannot of course be seriously entertained by one so eminently practical as the honorable mover. Without intending any disrespect to the Senator, I have to say I consider his proposition a mere evasion of the question before us. I think it would be better to reject the bill at once, than to adopt a measure so utterly futile and impracticable. I understood him to avow, with a commendable frankness, that his object is to defeat the bill; but I think it would be more manly and more statesmanlike to defeat it by a direct and positive negation, rather than by a substitution which on its face amounts to nothing and can come to nothing.

Without dwelling any further on the substitute which has been offered by the honorable and very worthy Senator from Pennsylvania, I proceed to say that there are three different methods which can be adopted, to provide for the construction of this work. The first is to make it exclusively a Government work, to be executed by the national Executive, in conformity with the directions of Congress, and at the proper cost of the national Treasury. It is believed that great advantages would attend this plan, provided the contract system be adopted, and the contractors be compensated in part out of the public domain. The contract system would, in my judgment, be indispensable to a proper economy. If it were executed after the fashion of the Cumberland road, I do not hesitate to say it would cost three or four times as much as it ought to cost. But by letting the road out in sections to the lowest bidders, I suppose the outlay could be brought within reasonable limits, and would not greatly exceed the cost of roads constructed by private enterprise and capital in various parts of the country. If, then, we were to add compensation in part from the public domain, in the usual manner, the requisitions on the Treasury would be reduced so low that they could be promptly met without serious inconvenience to any branch of the public service. But this scheme is not now before us, and therefore I need not dwell on it further.

A second method would be to make the construction of the road exclusively a private undertaking, and to put the work into the hands of such citizens as may be disposed to furnish the requisite capital, and would execute the work on the most favorable terms for the public; leaving it to their own sagacity and sense of interest to fix its termini and general course, together with all the details of location, making them such compensation in land, or money, or both, as may be deemed adequate, just, and equitable. It is safe to say that whatever would be best for the stockholders in respect to the location and general course of the road, would be quite likely, nay, morally certain, to accord with the public interests. The sagacity and shrewdness of private enterprise would be no unsafe arbiter of questions which it might be difficult to settle in the two Houses of Congress.

The third method is the one which we have before us; it is the intermediate method, where governmental control and capital is combined to some extent with individual control and capital. The Government is to fix the termini of the road, and its general course throughout, and the details of location and execution of the work is to be confided to such citizens as may be disposed to furnish the capital requisite for the consummation of this great enterprise. I need not, Mr. President, enter into a comparison of these three methods. The honorable committee have seen fit to adopt the last, and I can see no superior advantages in either of the two former to induce me to reject the latter. I therefore have made up my mind to support it.

But there are some objections which have been made to this plan, which I wish to notice briefly. They have been examined, and as I humbly conceive, refuted with signal ability by my honorable and excellent friend, the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] who has just resumed his seat.

It has been asserted by honorable Senators, and among others the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] to whose opinions I have ever been disposed to listen with deference and respect, that this bill proposes to confer on the Executive, or the chief of the incoming Administration, a power which is unprecedented in the history of the country. I fully admit the extent and magnitude of the power proposed to be conferred. To fix the termini of this road, and to lay down or establish its general course, is to decide questions which deeply concern the welfare of the whole country; and yet I cannot see how we can do better than to place the disposition of these questions in the hands of the Executive. I think we can do so, under the circumstances of the case, with safety and propriety.

I am apprehensive, Mr. President, that I shall be obliged to pay a poor compliment to the two Houses of Congress, for I am constrained to say, as the result of many years' observation, that I have as much confidence in the impartiality, sound discretion, and high sense of patriotism and duty, of the President elect—nay, a good deal more—than I have in the collective judgment and wisdom of the two Houses of Congress. I am not among those who share the responsibility of his elevation to the Presidency. I supported, with whatever of effort I was capable, another citizen, who had rendered his country services such as no man now living can boast of, and who, I thought, by his great experience, his generous and patriotic course, his unspotted life, and his transcendent abilities, was entitled to fill the chief executive office. But my wishes, my opinions, and my efforts, were overruled, and, like a good citizen, I cheerfully acquiesce in the result. The President elect has received a high expression of the confidence of his countrymen. The North and the South, the East and the West, supported him with unexampled unanimity, and it is my sincere desire that his Administration may be successful—may conduce to the prosperity of the American people, and to the success of our free system of government. I shall oppose to that Administration no factious opposition, and shall be governed, on all occasions, by a proper sense of right and of duty.

And what, after all, is this power to be vested in the hands of the Executive, which some honorable Senators seem to suppose so tremendous? Why may we not confide it to the Executive, and where is the hazard? Do we not at every session appropriate from forty to fifty millions of dollars for various branches of the public service, and is not the expenditure of these vast sums confided, in a great degree, to Executive discretion and Executive agency?

In the present instance he will have only to fix the termini and general course of the proposed road; and coming, as he does, from New England, from the remote East, his mind will be free from all bias, and in a condition to dispose of the question on its true merits. It seems to be an assumption here that the President is to settle this matter by his own unaided judgment; but it is not so. He will, in the first place, have the counsel and assistance of his Cabinet, composed of no less than seven citizens of the country (I shall venture to presume) of high ability and standing. He will also have the power to organize a board of officers, if he shall be pleased to do so. It will be his duty to cause the surveys to be made in advance, and to obtain all the requisite information to enable him and those whom he may call to his assistance, to determine what should be done. I desire to know whether results, such as the President would be likely to arrive at, with all the surveys and explorations before him, and with the assistance of his Cabinet, and, as the case may be, of a board of officers of distinguished ability, would not be quite as likely to accord with the public interests as any judgment we shall get from the two Houses of Congress? I hope I shall not be considered out of order when I say that the two Houses have reduced themselves to such a state, that they are competent to do little more than pass the general appropriation bills, and that they do after a sad fashion. In the House of Representatives I believe it is seldom in order to do what should be done, and nearly the whole of the public business there has to be transacted in violation of the rules, or, in other words, by suspending them. Here we have no previous question, no means of closing a debate. Hence nearly the whole of every session is occupied in discussing a few topics, and those, too frequently, of no practical importance, and much the larger proportion of the business before us we are obliged to act on without debate, or not act on it at all. We have so much liberty of debate, that we really have none at all as to most of the matters calling for the action of Congress. Hence, after many weary months in listening, with what patience we can muster, to never-ending disquisitions, relating to anything else than legitimate subjects of legislation, we find the moment at hand when the session must be closed. We then snatch up the appropriation bills and hurl them through the two Houses, much as shot may be thrown out of a shovel. Nobody knows what they are, or what they provide for, unless the honorable members of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, and on Ways and Means of the House, be exceptions. What a rush do we witness, of secretaries, clerks, and messengers, to and from the two Houses, and to and from each and the Executive, all in hot haste, lest this or that appropriation should be lost by the advent of the inexorable hour.

Now, suppose all the surveys and explorations contemplated by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania should be made, and all the different routes estimated, planned, and laid down on maps, (the world would hardly contain the books which would be written,) and the whole of this vast amount of information should be pitched into the two Houses of Congress, what would become of it? What chance would there be that the subject would receive a dispassionate and a proper examination? Should we not have interminable debates, and either no result or a very unfortunate one, rushed through on the very heel of the session? And, then, what heart-burnings, what jealousies, what sectional dissensions should we not have! Would not the opponents of this policy, reinforced by those who are dissatisfied with this or that location, be sure to defeat the whole scheme? Indeed, on the question whether the fixing of the termini and the general course of the road shall or shall not be referred to the Executive Departments, depends, in my judgment, the question whether we shall or shall not have a railroad to the Pacific. The committee have hit on the only practicable scheme. With the President, there will be a proper sense of responsibility, high intelligence, and a just appreciation of the true interests of the country. I am satisfied there will be no want of either inclination, ability, or effort, on the part of the incoming Executive, to make a wise and safe disposition of this entire matter. It is possible that a reference to the President may cause a location contrary to my present impressions of expediency. I prefer the route by the South Pass, if practicable, because from thence we can branch to Oregon; whereas, if the southern route be taken that will be impossible. But I am for a road anyhow, whether North or South. Besides, I believe we shall have a railroad within twenty-five years, between the Mississippi and the Columbia or Puget's Sound. I believe it with almost as much confidence as I do in my personal identity; and I do not concur at all in the opinion expressed by my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COOPER,] the other day, that the snows would render a railroad impracticable at the South Pass. If such roads can be worked to advantage in New England, Canada, and even in Russia, in the winter season, I am quite sure there can be no barrier to their use at all times at the point mentioned, and even at a much higher latitude.

It is also insisted that it is improper to pass this bill for the reason that the surveys and explorations have not been had which have usually been deemed an important, if not an indispensable, preliminary to legislative action on such a subject. If we were about to fix the termini and general course of the road, this objection would have great weight; but when these points are to be referred to the Executive, and when the bill directs these very surveys and explorations to be made as a basis for his decision, it obviously has no force. I have already, in opposing the amendment of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRODHEAD,] stated fully my objections to surveys and estimates in detail of all the various routes, and of the modifications of each route with a view to comparison, and an accurate and precise calculation on their economy or cheapness. I say, if this is to be done, there is not a Senator in this Chamber who will live to see the day when the work is commenced. I maintain, moreover, that such fullness and precision of survey and of estimates is wholly unnecessary. In such a vast undertaking, one or two millions the one way or the other is of no importance, and it would be folly in the extreme to waste ten millions in order to save one or two. With respect to the practicability of the work, much is already known. We need, for example, no survey, to satisfy us that we can construct a road to the South Pass, and from thence to the eastern base of the Sierra Nevada. The ascent from the Missouri to the pass is so very gradual as not to be perceptible to the traveler; but when he comes to test the elevation by the barometer, he finds himself, if I do not misrecollect the figures, from six to seven thousand feet above tide water.

Every one admits we can build a railroad from the Missouri to the Sierra Nevada, but whether we can get over that mountain is a matter of doubt. The Sierra would have to be explored through several degrees of latitude and all the passes carefully examined. This would be the only point on that route of serious difficulty. On the southern route several points would require examination. It would be necessary to examine the ridge between the waters of the Mississippi or its tributaries and those of the Rio Grande; also the ridge between the waters of the Rio Grande and those of the Colorado, and also the ridge between the waters of the Colorado and those of the San Joaquin. This would involve an exploration of all the mountain passes. Probably the grades would have to be ascertained at all the difficult points on each route, and then the question, whether of practicability or economy, must be decided either by Congress, or, as proposed in this bill, by the Executive. I believe all the information requisite to a proper disposition of the subject could be obtained in a single season, and then we can commence the construction of the road at an early day. Having determined on the point of departure and the general course of the road, the surveys and estimates in detail can then be made with safety, economy, and dispatch. You will need no detachments of the Army to protect your surveyors. Large bodies of men will be employed on the road, who will hold in check and probably keep at a distance the savages of those regions. It will be necessary ordinarily to survey only one or two hundred miles in advance of the road as it progresses, and then the road itself will facilitate the passage of the surveyors to and fro, and the transportation of their supplies, and this will greatly reduce the expenses of the operation. Indeed it is, in my judgment, indispensable that surveys and construction should go forward at the same time, and in no other way could the former be accomplished without an enormous outlay. Every one must see at a glance that the construction of the road in part will greatly facilitate surveys in advance.

If, for example, the President were to decide that the point of departure should be at or near Independence, Missouri, and if we commence the construction, and carry the road forward, say four hundred miles, it is obvious that this would aid essentially surveys for the next one hundred miles. Probably the cost of such survey would not be one tenth part what it would be were the work undertaken without the aid of the road. The combination, therefore, of the two operations to some extent, is indispensable to economy if not practicability. And what is more, on the plan here advocated, the parties who make the contract will have to be at all the expense of these surveys and estimates in detail. They need not cost this Government one penny. All, therefore, we should provide for, are such explorations and surveys as would enable the Executive to fix the termini and general course of the road, and precise estimates and calculations, such as are ordinarily laid before our State Legislatures in cases of this sort, are impracticable and unattainable. The case is a peculiar one; the object is to connect the two sides of a vast continent, and the intermediate space is a wilderness thronged with savages. Explorations and surveys are alike difficult and dangerous, and to apply to such a case the rules ordinarily observed by our State Legislatures, is absurd and ridiculous. The necessities of an undertaking so novel and unexampled, will furnish laws by which we should regulate our conduct.

I wish now, Mr. President, to assign briefly the reasons by which, as I conceive, the policy of this bill can be vindicated. It is not pretended that either private citizens, or the authorities of the States through which the road must run in part, can undertake its construction. The States have no power to act in the Territories, and have not, moreover, resources adequate to an enterprise of such vast magnitude. The work, therefore, must be executed by the authority of Congress, and at the expense of the National Treasury, at least in part, if it is to be executed at all.

I have then to say, Mr. President, in the first place, that the construction of this road will tend powerfully to develop the internal resources of the country. It will open a vast breadth of the public lands, now inaccessible, to speedy settlement. It will also bring within our grasp the mineral wealth of the remote interior, particularly in copper, and other metals of great economic value, to say nothing of gold and silver. It is well known that there are in New Mexico, on the Gila river, extensive and very productive copper mines; and I was informed, not long since, by an intelligent officer of the United States Army, that there are similar mines in northern Texas. Whether the road will, if constructed, take the direction of these mines I cannot, of course, say, but in any event it is highly probable that much would be gained to the country by the mineral developments which it would occasion wherever located. I say nothing of the addition which may possibly be made to the inexhaustible supplies of the precious metals which we already enjoy. I have, I confess, some serious misgivings in regard to this business of gold hunting. I fear it is an avocation not exactly calculated to induce those habits of steadiness, sobriety, economy, and self-denial, which are important to the well-being of society. What our people want is steady employment, and moderate gains. I indulge, however, no inconsiderable hopes that the experience of the world will be reversed in California, and that our citizens there will prove all that the friends of free institutions could desire.

I insist, Mr. President, in the next place, that this road will promote our internal trade and commerce. Much of the surplus products of the agriculture of the country will be turned over this road to California, and thus the eastern markets will be relieved, and agriculture everywhere benefited. If we could find on the shores of the Pacific a market for the products of even a few of the western States, it would be an immense benefit to all sections. The great difficulty with our agriculture is over production. Any considerable surplus of any crop, will frequently cast down its aggregate value a hundredfold more than the value of the surplus itself; hence by taking off from our eastern markets some portion of the pressure from the West, by opening a vent in the direction of the Pacific, we shall confer an incalculable benefit on agriculture in every part of the Union. The good effect will be as sensibly felt in Virginia and North Carolina as in Illinois and Missouri. It is believed, also, that the manufacturers of the eastern and middle States will find a market for their fabrics over this road. This will certainly be true of the lighter articles, as in trade and business, speed and time are often the great elements, and will overrule all other considerations.

The construction of this road will facilitate in a high degree intercommunication between the eastern and western sides of the continent, and will save to our people much of time, money, and life. A journey to and from California, by way of the Isthmus, cannot now be performed much, if any short of two months, and the expenses amount to $500 at least. The hazards to life by that route are considerable, but nothing in comparison with those of the route direct across the continent. Thousands of our citizens have been committed to premature graves, in seeking new homes on the shores of the Pacific, and evidences of mortality everywhere attend the footsteps of the traveler from the eastern to the western side of the Rocky mountains. No doubt the saving to the country by means of this road would in all these forms be immense. The lives of virtuous, intelligent, and upright citizens are inappreciable, but we can form some idea of how much would be saved of money and of time, (which is said to be money,) when this road shall be constructed and the transit from the Mississippi to the Pacific can be effected in a single week. It is not too much to say that the aggregate would amount annually to six per cent. interest on the whole capital required to build the road.

This measure, I again remark, will contribute powerfully to the extension of our external trade and commerce. It is difficult to form now an adequate conception of the effect which a well-constructed, well-appointed, and well-managed railroad, connecting the waters of the Mississippi with those of the Pacific, would have on the business relations of the world. It would probably ere long result in a great commercial revolution, and make the United States the thoroughfare of Europe in going to and from China, and other Oriental countries. Its tendency to build up our commercial emporium, and to advance it towards a supremacy even in competition with London, would be great, and might prove decisive.

The road, when constructed, will enable us to bring into subjection the wild Indian tribes roaming over the interior of this continent, who have been for years harassing the frontiers, particularly those of Texas, and doing infinite mischief there and elsewhere. We shall also by such means find ourselves in a condition to fulfill our treaty obligations to Mexico in respect to these Indians, to which we have hitherto paid little attention. By the eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, we have bound ourselves in the most positive and peremptory manner, to restrain forcibly the incursions of the savages from the United States into Mexico. I have before me that article, and it was my purpose to read it to the Senate, and comment on it, as I do not believe honorable Senators are aware how stringent its terms are, and how high the obligations which we have assumed, to keep those Indians within our own borders; but I will not do so, as I wish to bring my remarks to a conclusion as soon as possible.

This measure will greatly economize the administration of the Departments of War and General Post Office. It will reduce the expenses of our Army, particularly in the Quartermaster and Commissary's Departments. The costs of transportation are now enormous. The troops are largely employed far in the interior of the continent, many hundred miles beyond any railroad or water communication, and all their supplies have to be dragged after them at a frightful expense. This cause has contributed more than any other to swell the appropriations for the Army to such an enormous amount. I intended to have looked into the particulars, but I have not had time to do so. No doubt the additions amount to several millions annually, much, if not all of which, will be saved by the construction of this road; besides, there will be a great saving in the transportation of the mail. A semi-monthly mail to and from California now costs us about one million of dollars per annum, which alone will pay the interest on the $20,000,000 to be advanced to promote the road. And then we are to have soon a weekly mail, and it is not too much to say that the expenditure for the mail service will for the next two years run up to $1,500,000 per annum, not over one third of which will be reimbursed in the form of postages. Besides, the road will economize the mail service in California itself, and it will expedite transportation both for the Army and General Post Office vastly, and thus much will be gained to both branches of the public service. Be it remembered that the bill provides in express terms that the company who may construct the road, "shall at 'all times, and as often as required, transport on 'said road, and every part of the same, the mails, 'troops, seamen, officers of the Army and Navy, 'officers and agents of the Government and of the 'Post Office Department while on duty, arms, 'ammunition, munitions of war, Army and Navy 'stores, funds, or property belonging to the United 'States free from all charges to the Government, 'giving the United States at all times the prefer-'ence;" and it provides also for the free use of the telegraphic line by the United States. I do not hesitate then to conclude, that in the Post Office Department we will save enough to pay the interest on the amount to be advanced by the Government, and more than enough in the Quartermaster's and Commissary's Departments to reimburse the principal long before the bonds for $20,000,000 will become due, if issued in conformity with this bill. Nothing is more certain than that this road and telegraph line need not cost the Government one cent, while blessings and benefits will result from their construction in every way.

But there are other advantages which will accrue from this great enterprise: Should the road take its course by the South Pass and Salt Lake, it will give a permanent supremacy to our laws and Constitution in that part of the continent. Some have apprehended (I trust without any sufficient reason) that a turbulent and insurrectionary power is about to spring up there, which would ere long become troublesome to the country and dangerous to its peace. It is certain that a few thousand resolute men, well armed, and planted in the very recesses of the Rocky Mountains, could not be reduced to subjection without enormous sacrifices both of life and money. The necessity of any such sacrifices will be obviated by the construction of this road. Indeed its effect will be to establish such intimate relations between the Salt Lake district and other parts of the country as to obviate all danger of disloyal movements in that quarter, if any such exist.

If, on the other hand, the road should pass through New Mexico, other advantages will result, of little if any less importance. It would in a short time work a great moral, intellectual, and political revolution in that unfortunate country; or, in other words, it would Americanize New Mexico. It appears from the report of Colonel Sumner, of the United States Army, communicated to Congress by the Secretary of War at the present session, that the people there are by idleness, ignorance, and vice reduced to the lowest stage of degradation and infamy. He says:

"There is no probability of any change for the better. Twenty—fifty years hence, this Territory will be precisely the same it is now. There never can be any inducement for any class of our people to come here whose example would improve this people. Speculators, adventurers, and the like, are all that will come, and their example are rather pernicious than beneficial.

"No civil government emanating from the Government of the United States can be maintained here without the aid of a military force—in fact, without its being virtually a military government. I do not believe there is an intelligent man in the Territory who is not at the present time fully sensible of this truth. All branches of this civil government have equally failed—the executive for want of power, the judiciary from the total incapacity and want of principle in juries, and the legislative from want of knowledge, a want of identity with our institutions, and an extreme reluctance to impose taxes; so much so that they have never even provided the means to subsist prisoners, and consequently felons of all kinds are running at large.

"The New Mexicans are thoroughly debased, and totally incapable of self-government, and there is no latent quality about them that can ever make them respectable citizens. They have more Indian blood than Spanish, and are in some respects below the Pueblo Indians, for they are not as honest or industrious. In this remark I allude to the lower classes—there are some educated gentlemen with respectable families; about enough for magistrates and other official persons. There is not much increase in the population, owing to their gross depravity. I doubt if there is a tribe of Indians on this continent who are more abandoned in their commerce between the sexes than the great majority of this people."

This is certainly a very dismal account of the state of things in New Mexico, but not more dismal than I believe it to be truthful. A state of things which will continue to the end of time, unless we make the country accessible to our people by a railroad. This would work a speedy and a highly salutary revolution. But so long as New Mexico remains in her present situation, we shall have a standing commentary on the folly of acquiring so remote a country, and of bringing under our jurisdiction a people so truly wretched.

But, Mr. President, I now come to a consideration which I deem of high importance, and which I would urge on the particular attention of the Senate. I maintain that the construction of this road is not only important, but indispensable to the defense of our Pacific possessions. It is, I believe, within the constitutional competency of Congress to carry a road through even a State for this purpose. When the case is as urgent as the present, we can vindicate the work precisely for the reasons which would justify the erection of a fortress to bar the entrance into the Bay of San Francisco. It is not only the most effectual, but the cheapest measure of defense which could be adopted. What is the condition of the Pacific coast now, and what will it continue to be without a railroad?

Defenseless, perfectly defenseless. And if a war were to break out with any leading European Power, how long could we hold those possessions? Honorable gentlemen seem to be disposed to assert here what they denominate the Monroe doctrine, in such a manner as would be very likely to lead to a war. If you thus bring on a collision with Great Britain or France, what would become of San Francisco and the other towns situated on the bay of that name? What would become of your Mint and your navy-yard? Sir, that bay is left in such a situation that a miserable privateer, with half a dozen guns, could enter it and lay the city of San Francisco under contribution; an inconsiderable force could ravage the whole coast of California. I do not say they could conquer the State, but I do say they could do infinite mischief. I want, therefore, to hear no more of your Monroe doctrine until you have made some provision for the defense of the Pacific coast. I am for adjourning over the doctrine—Tehuantepec and all other topics of excitation—until this railroad can be constructed. The latter would seem to me an indispensable preliminary to the former. Place us in such a situation that we can in one month throw fifty thousand men on that coast, and you may explode your Monroe doctrine in face of all Europe, for aught I care. We shall then be in a much better situation to defend than any enemy can be to assail. If we have underrated the assailing force, the telegraph will flash the intelligence to Washington, and in ten days we could repair the error by reinforcement. Indeed the mere existence of the road would obviate all danger of attack by any other than a naval force. What European Power would think of sending an army to the Pacific, when they knew that we could meet them with a force of tenfold power by the agency of the proposed railroad? To say that it is inexpedient or unconstitutional to provide for the emergencies of war by the means proposed, is the same thing as to assert that the defense of the country is no part of the duty of this Government. Congress a few sessions since directed a dock, basin and railway to be constructed at the navy-yard in California. So that it seems we have a right to get our ships on to railways. Why not our Army?

But there are difficulties likely to result from a war with one of the leading Powers of Europe, other than those already alluded to. If we suppose that we could defend the city of San Francisco, and protect our navy-yard and Mint, it would undoubtedly be in the power of the public enemy to blockade the whole coast, and cut off the transmission of gold from the Pacific to the Atlantic. A good deal has been said in the debates which we have had during the session on our foreign relations—about our having Great Britain under bonds to keep the peace, by means of our cotton bales; but I would ask honorable Senators to look at our own condition. Are there not bonds for good behavior resting upon us, and that too of a pretty serious character? What if your Monroe doctrine should involve us in a war with Great Britain, and she should, by a blockade of the coast, interrupt the communication between California and the Isthmus, how should we get our regular supply of gold? Or if we should escape that difficulty, and be able to land the precious metal on the Isthmus, how could we get it forward to New York? Honorable Senators have expressed a great deal of alarm in regard to what Great Britain has done and may do at the Bay Islands, but in my judgment, it is a question of little importance. With her ascendency on the ocean, she could, whether she does or does not hold those islands, cut off all intercourse between the Pacific and Atlantic coasts, by stationing a superior force on this or the other side, or on both; the result will be the same, whether you have a route by the Isthmus, Nicaragua, or Tehuantepec. Your communications will be interrupted in the event of a war with a superior naval Power, and then what will be the condition of the country, and what will become of our national and commercial credit? The whole of our currency and all of our business engagements and relations are being constituted on the basis of a regular supply of at least five millions of gold per month from California. Indeed, the supply is believed to be much larger, as the gold sent on freight is understood to amount to five millions, and it is known that a large amount reaches New York and other important points by the hands of passengers. What would become of your banks if this supply should be suddenly cut off? They would, every one of them, be blown into the air, and commercial credit would receive such a shock as has never been witnessed in this country. The very moment the war broke out, our national finances would be thrown into disorder and confusion, and the credit of the Government would sink with that of the commercial classes. This monthly supply of gold has got to be just as necessary to us as the cotton bales are to England. A fleet of steamers stationed at Jamaica would effectually arrest the transmission of gold by the Isthmus. The mere apprehension of danger would be enough. Suppose you were to drive Great Britain out of Roatan and the rest of the Bay Islands, will that make your freights of gold safe? Would it do to provoke her to a contest by exploding in her face a half dozen pieces of ordnance, well charged with the "Monroe doctrine?" Something was said here, on a former occasion, about the Gulf of Mexico being a "mare clausum"—an American sea. It is a curious sort of "closed sea," with Great Britain in possession of Jamaica and other islands on one side of it.

I maintain that an effectual interruption of this supply of gold, even for a few months, would be almost fatal to currency and credit. The time is near at hand when California will send us $10,000,000 per month, and perhaps even more; and the loss of this supply, even for three months, would be most seriously felt. The Government would be crippled at the very outset of any war in which we might be involved, and incapacitated in some degree for sacrifices and efforts such as our national honor and interests might require. We should be obliged to have the gold any how, and this could only be done by the inland route. You would be obliged to organize caravans for its transmission, which you would have to protect by detachments from the Army. An escort of at least five hundred men would be required to each caravan, as fifteen or twenty millions in gold would hold out temptations which might lead to combinations and aggressions of a dangerous character. And, then, only think of such a caravan "dragging its slow length along," over mountains and deserts, and reaching the city of New York in about six months. In the mean time, and at the very outset of the war, all your banks will have been exploded, your merchants bankrupted, commercial credit broken down, and alarm and distrust spread through all departments of business, and all the ramifications of society. Probably your Government would be placed in such a situation that it could not borrow a dollar. But, whether this would be so or not, it is certain that the interruption of the supply at the outset of a war, even for three months, would occasion disasters and losses to the Government and people more than equal to the whole cost of this road. The regular transmission of this gold is just as necessary for the national safety and defense as a good supply of powder and ball; and yet honorable Senators tell us we have no right to construct this road. One Senator has a stitch in his conscience on the score of constitutionality. He denies our power to adopt this measure, and insists it is violative of the Constitution. Another Senator has a stitch on the score of expediency, or rather he is for the measure as highly wise and proper, but not now; only adjourn it over to the next Congress, and let us have the surveys. O! the surveys! let us have the surveys! But now is the hour, in my judgment, for taking the initiative in respect to this great enterprise, and I ask it in the name of preparation for war which may come, for which we should be prepared. I ask it as a measure having an important bearing on credit and currency, and as indispensable to both in case of a war with a superior naval power; and I ask it that we may be well prepared on both coasts to repel aggression, and to assert the rights and maintain the honor and the dignity of the American people.

But it must not be inferred from these remarks that I view war with approbation. I can hardly conceive of a war short of one strictly defensive, which I should look upon with complacency. I think men die fast enough anyhow. There is no necessity of calling into requisition gunpowder to hasten them into eternity. I am for peace and for cultivating the arts of peace. I am for constructing this railroad in order that we may have peace. I verily believe that the consummation of this vast enterprise would do more to cause us to be respected, nay, to be feared by the nations of the earth, than the erection of twenty fortresses, or the construction of forty ships-of-the-line.

There is another consideration to which I would refer, and which, I doubt not, will be properly appreciated by the Senate. The construction of this road is indispensable to the consolidation of our Union, and to bind the two sides of the continent together by the strong ties of mutual dependence and reciprocal interests. Without the means of prompt and easy communication, it would be better not to have a country on the other side of the Rocky Mountains. The existing state of things is utterly objectionable. I was, in the first instance, strongly opposed to the acquisition of California; but as she has been admitted into the family circle, and now constitutes one of the brightest stars of our national galaxy, I am for holding on to her. I have no idea that her people are or will be disloyal to our Union, but I wish to establish more intimate relations between her and her sister States—those of immediate vicinage, and that a railroad will do. When this is done, no centrifugal force can throw her out of her orbit, but she will maintain her proper place in our system, and will revolve around the common center to the end of all time. Besides, how is this General Government to exercise its functions in California without this railroad, whether in war or peace? Suppose there is an incursion of savages upon the people of some part of that State, and it becomes necessary to repel them. Suppose the officers of the Army or Indian agents need instructions from the Executive at Washington, how are they to obtain them? Why, it requires two sea-voyages to get the information to Washington, and two more to get the instructions back, taking up, I suppose, from two to three months.

Again: suppose there is an insurrection in California, or a sudden attack by some foreign foe, would there not be a necessity for means of immediate communication with the General Government? Suppose some doubt should arise at San Francisco in respect to the construction of your revenue laws. A cargo of goods arrives, and the collector is of the opinion it should pay one rate of duty, and the owner insists on a lower rate, and the collector desires the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject, would not the delay of two voyages by sea to reach Washington, and two to get back, be intolerable? Would it not be ruinous to all concerned? How are your post office laws to be administered in California? How are you to administer this Government there at all, without this railroad? If the collector of San Francisco should die, how long must business be interrupted before his place can be filled? If a judge should die, how long must the court be closed and justice delayed? Nothing can be more embarrassing than the dispensation of patronage in California on account of the distance. It is almost impossible to get reliable information, and this the present Administration have experienced to their sorrow. If the distinguished gentleman who is coming here soon to stand at the head of the Government does not encounter similar difficulties, I shall be greatly disappointed. I maintain that such a state of things is intolerable, and I think we should not occupy ourselves with any miserable controversy about the Bay Islands or Tehuantepec, but should at once take hold and construct this railroad as a sovereign remedy for all the evils here adverted to. I want no railroad over foreign countries, unless it be for temporary purposes. I am for an American railroad, to be constructed on American soil, by the enterprise and capital of the American people.

Sir, I have occupied more of the time of the Senate than I intended, but have abbreviated my remarks as much as possible. I have given a mere outline of ideas, some of which may not have occurred to honorable Senators. I now leave the subject in the hands of the Senate. I hope we shall have a vote on it speedily. I hope the bill will pass the Senate, even if it does not pass the House. Should it fail to become a law at this session, I hope the subject will be resumed at the next, at the earliest practicable day. I have two years more, if my life is spared, to remain a member of this body, and if this measure is not now consummated, I will consecrate whatever energies I may have, and whatever ability I can command, to its prosecution at the next Congress. I have also to say to the honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. RUSK,] who has so intelligently, patriotically, and ably advocated this bill, that I will then stand by him, and go with him, hand to hand and shoulder to shoulder, in efforts to carry through the Senate the proper legislation on this subject. I demand the construction of this railroad as a great American measure—as one which is called for by many weighty considerations—as necessary to enable this Government to exercise its proper functions in time of peace and indispensable to both sides of the continent in time of war, and as adapted in a high degree to promote the stability of our glorious Union, and the prosperity of the whole people.

THE GALPHIN CLAIM.

SPEECH OF HON. A. H. STEPHENS,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 13, 1853,

On the bill to prevent Frauds upon the Treasury of the United States—in defense of Mr. Corwin—and the Galphin Claim.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, said:

The bill under consideration, Mr. Speaker, is reported by the Select Committee of this House appointed to investigate the Gardiner claim. I do not see any connection which it has with the business submitted to that committee. It seems to be before the House anomalously. I suppose it must have got here by unanimous consent. The committee certainly had no authority from this House to report it. So far as the bill, therefore, is concerned, I shall treat it as an independent measure before this House, as if reported by any individual, and I shall not connect its merits with the investigation of the Gardiner claim, for I see no legitimate connection between it and the subject referred to that committee for investigation. The bill, I believe, is in substance the same as one introduced into the Senate by a Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER.] In the remarks which I shall make upon its merits, I shall necessarily, in noticing the topics of discussion which it has given rise to, introduce some of the subjects which the gentlemen have alluded to in the progress of the debate. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS,] for instance, who, I believe, addressed the committee first upon this subject, and whose speech is reported for the first time in the Globe of this morning, seems to consider the report of this bill by that committee as confirming his original remarks in relation to the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Corwin. I do not so consider it. I do not consider that there is anything in the report of the committee which can justify such an inference. I take this occasion to state to this House that I think the investigation and report of that committee fully and completely exonerates the Secretary of the Treasury from that improper connection with the Gardiner claim which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] seemed to entertain the opinion or suspicion that he held. I notice the following in the report of the gentleman's remarks, and I shall be brief upon this point:

"Mr. Speaker, I will not say that at the time I offered the resolution calling for this committee of investigation, that I had not a settled conviction upon my mind, that Corwin must have known, or at least have strongly suspected, the fraudulent character of this claim. That conviction has not been changed, but greatly confirmed, by the evidence reported by the committee. But, sir, notwithstanding these convictions, I had no purpose of making any such charge in the resolution, knowing the utter impossibility of proving a man's thoughts or impressions. Nothing in the language of the resolution, or in the remarks with which I accompanied the resolution, can be construed into such a charge."

Now, sir, I have the remarks of the gentleman as made before this House, in which he says:

"Through the investigation of Congress, their Galphinism has been exposed; and Crawford, loaded with the execrations of the American people, has received his passport to perpetual infamy. But Corwin still remains unwhipped of justice. True, sir, his catspaw and accomplice in the fraud is loaded with irons, and is branded by public sentiment as a perjurer and forger; but the master-moving spirit, the head and brains in the fraud, through the negligence of this House, is still permitted to control the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. OLDS. That is a quotation from a speech made in July upon entirely another question, in which I referred incidentally to the Galphinism of the country. It had no connection with this resolution whatever.

Mr. STEPHENS. These were remarks made by the gentleman in connection with this subject. Is he prepared now before the House to say that he takes this expression back?

Mr. OLDS. No, sir. I say that the remarks I made at the time I offered this resolution, show that I intended to make no such call upon the House for investigation.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then, if the gentleman does not take them back, or modify them, he should make them good. They were remarks made by him in this House and to the country before this committee was raised, as one of the reasons for raising the committee, though they may not have been made at the time the committee was ordered. Now, then, the gentleman ought either to sustain this charge before the House, or modify it. I must consider it as a part of the remarks made by him, which induced the House to raise the committee. This was the gist of the accusation. It is not my purpose at all to discuss the merits of the Gardiner claim; that is, whether it was founded in justice, or whether it was a fabricated fraud from beginning to end. That was not even before the investigating committee. I am free to state, however, from reading the report of this investigation carefully, I concur with the other gentlemen, that my impression is that it is fraudulent. But the subject referred to that committee to investigate, and which, so far as their report is concerned, is now before the House, is his (Mr. Corwin's) "improper" connection with the claim; because the very resolution offered by the gentleman, and passed by this House, stated that—

"Whereas a strong suspicion rests upon the public mind that fraudulent claims have been allowed by the late Mexican Claim Commission, with one of which it is suspected that Thomas Corwin, Secretary of the Treasury, has been improperly connected: Therefore,

"Resolved, That a committee, consisting of five members of this House, be appointed by the Speaker, to investigate all the facts touching the connection of the said Thomas Corwin, the present Secretary of the Treasury, with the said Gardiner claim; what fee, if any, he was to receive for his services as agent or counsel for said Gardiner; what interest, if any, other than his fee interest, he purchased and held, either directly or indirectly, in said claim, and the amount paid, or stipulated to be paid therefor, and condition of such purchase; at what time he ceased to act as the counsel or agent of said Gardiner; to whom and for what consideration he disposed of his fee interest; to whom and for what consideration he disposed of his one fourth interest in said claim."

The only question, therefore, so far as the report of that committee is concerned, is, whether the Secretary of the Treasury was improperly connected with the claim of which there was a suspicion of fraud attached to it. That is the only question. Well, sir, does not this report of the committee, raised at the instance of the gentleman from Ohio, sufficiently show to us and to the country that there was no improper connection at all on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury with the claim? The gentleman from Ohio attempts to argue not; and the whole of his speech seems to be a sort of censure upon the committee that was raised at his own instance; at least it so struck me. He seemed to be grumbling at their conclusion. What is that conclusion of the committee on the real point in issue? Here is their language:

"No testimony has been adduced before the committee proving, or tending to prove, that the Hon. Thomas Corwin had any knowledge that the claim of the said Gardiner was fraudulent, or that false testimony or forged papers had been or were to be procured to sustain the same."

The testimony before the committee shows conclusively that Mr. Corwin had no interest whatever in this claim after he became Secretary of the Treasury; and the committee say that there is no evidence showing, "or tending to show," that even as a private citizen, in his vocation as an attorney, he knew anything at all of the fraud. There is nothing, then, connecting Mr. Corwin improperly with the claim. But, says the gentleman, the committee have reported this bill. Now it is to that point that I wish to speak briefly, because this bill was not reported by any authority conferred on the committee, nor does it touch the case before them. I do not intend to let the gentleman escape in this way. I call the attention of the House to this fact, that if Mr. Corwin, as Secretary of the Treasury, had been improperly connected with this claim—as was intimated in the original charge—there would have been no necessity at all for any special bill to reach his delinquency.

Sir, the founders of our Government, in one of the first acts passed by Congress, after the organization of the Government, sufficiently protected the Treasury of the United States in this particular. If Mr. Corwin acted improperly, you need pass no new law for others; you can now prosecute him, and visit upon him the punishment he deserves; you need not let him pass from defect of the law. I call the attention of the House to the act creating the Treasury Department in 1789, to show that there is no necessity for this bill to meet any future case similar to that then before the committee. I read the eighth section of that act:

"SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That no person appointed to any office instituted by this act shall, directly or indirectly, be concerned or interested in carrying on the business of trade or commerce, or be owner, in whole or in part, of any sea-vessel, or purchase, by himself or another in trust for him, any public lands or other public property, or be concerned in the purchase or disposal of any public securities of any State or of the United States, or take or apply to his own use or emolument or gain, for negotiating or transacting any business in the said Department other than what shall be allowed by law; and if any person shall offend against any of the prohibitions of this act, he shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and forfeit to the United States the penalty of $3,000, and shall, upon conviction, be removed from office, and forever thereafter incapable of holding any office under the United States," &c.

Sir, if Mr. Corwin, as Secretary of the Treasury, was "improperly connected" with this claim against the Treasury, as charged, here is a law of the country that has been in existence since 1789, under which you can proceed against him, and by which you can not only displace him, but disgrace him forever. If, therefore, the committee undertook to recommend this bill to meet Mr. Corwin's case, I beg to inform them, and the gentlemas from Ohio, that their work is but an act of supererogation. Here is a law quite sufficient for them or him to act upon. My object, sir, is to disconnect this bill, upon which I intend to speak hereafter, entirely from the matter and case referred to that committee. But I wish to premise a few remarks upon the facts reported by that committee, and which have been commented on in the debate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these facts are, that Mr. Corwin, while he was a Senator of the United States, was employed as an attorney before the Board of Commissioners to adjudicate claims against Mexico in behalf of Gardiner, a claimant, and that he also took an interest by assignment in his claim. These facts are admitted. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] argued yesterday that it was malum in se; that it was wrong in itself for a member of Congress to appear as an attorney for fee or reward before any such tribunal. Is that gentleman right in that position? If he is, Mr. Corwin did something wrong in itself, and deserves censure. If not, he is certainly above the reproach of even the most fastidious in what he did. Let us refer to our history on this subject. Every gentleman who hears me knows that it is usual, and has been from the beginning of this Government, for Senators and members of the House to appear as counsel for fee and reward or compensation before the Supreme Court of the United States, to appear before any of the courts of the Union, and before commissioners appointed to adjudicate claims similar to these—before just such tribunals as this was. Nay, more; I believe that even anterior to our Revolution, Dr. Franklin did not consider it malum in se to receive fees and act as agent for several of the colonies before the proper departments of the Government of the mother country—Great Britain. He was the regular agent, first of Pennsylvania, then of Massachusetts, and of Georgia, perhaps others of the colonies. I maintain, therefore, that there is nothing in the thing itself which, by the general consent of our countrymen, even the wisest and the best, is, or has been considered, wrong in acting as counsel or attorney, or agent for proper compensation in such a capacity. I believe it is a historical fact, that after the Jay treaty, there was a commission instituted for the adjudication and settlement of claims provided for in that treaty, and that the ablest attorneys in the country at that time, appeared before the board thus constituted—amongst them members of Congress.

Again, at the close of the last war with England, under a convention, a similar board was constituted. The celebrated Mr. Pinkney, of the State of Maryland, a distinguished member of this body—an honor to his State, an honor to his country—a man whose eloquence was perhaps never surpassed—a man whose integrity never was questioned, so far as I know,—he, sir, appeared, as I am informed, before that commission and argued important cases as attorney for parties in interest. Who ever heard his conduct questioned? Who ever heard an imputation cast upon his character, for thus advocating the rights of those who sought the aid of his legal counsel? I give him as one instance amongst others. But further still. I have a paper before me from which it appears that the Hon. George M. Dallas, while he was Vice President of the United States, received fees for prosecuting, with others, a claim before one of the Departments,—others were engaged with him in the same case, members of Congress of the highest character and the strictest purity. How can men thus employed be said to be employed against the Treasury of the United States? In most instances, the only question is, who among several claimants shall receive a particular fund?

But, sir, I come down even to this very tribunal before which Senator Corwin agreed to appear as counsel. He was not the only member of Congress who appeared or agreed to appear there as counsel. And if there was anything improper in his connection with it, was it not so with other members of Congress? Mark you, I do not allude to these facts by way of casting imputations upon any of the gentlemen whom I shall name, but I do not intend, sitting here in this Hall, to permit a false impression to go before this country, or that Mr. Corwin, who is a distinguished lawyer, shall be made a scape-goat of by any gentleman upon this floor. Mark you, that the whole charge sustained is, that Mr. Corwin, while a Senator, was employed by Dr. Gardiner to represent his claim as one amongst other lawyers before the Board of Commissioners. For the testimony is conclusive that, perhaps, knowing the statute of 1789, which I have read, if from no other consideration, he disconnected himself from that relation before he assumed the position of Secretary of the Treasury.

But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] says that the transfer of his interest was all a farce. Well, if so, the issue is between him and his committee. They do not report that it was a farce. that it was an unconditional transfer of all his interest in the claim. I am bound, therefore, so to consider it. Well, then, sir, was Mr. Corwin the only distinguished Senator who appeared as counsel before that Commission? I have not seen the docket, but I speak from information which has been communicated to me, and which I have no doubt is correct. I am informed that the honorable Senator from Missouri [Colonel BENTON] appeared in a case there. I am informed that the honorable Senator from Louisiana [Mr. SOULE] appeared in a case there. I believe that the honorable Daniel Webster appeared as counsel there in two cases. The honorable Mr. BRIGHT, a Senator from Indiana, appeared there also in four cases, as I am informed. Whether those gentlemen appeared for fee or reward, I do not know. I come now to this House; and mark me again, that I do not intend to cast any imputation upon any gentleman, because I do not consider myself that there was any wrong in it. There was no law against it, and it had been the custom of the country from the beginning for men holding such positions to act in such capacity. But I am informed that the honorable Mr. HOWARD, of Texas, appeared before that Commission in behalf of some claimants. The honorable Mr. EWING, of Tennessee, who was then, but not now, a member of this House, appeared there as counsel, or represented some party, as I am told. The honorable Mr. PHELPS, of this House, did the same thing.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman from Georgia is mistaken in relation to that matter.

Mr. STEPHENS. Well, sir, I shall be glad to be corrected. I only speak from information received from others, as I have stated.

Mr. PHELPS. Permit me, then, to make a brief statement. When the Mexican Commission assembled, one of my constituents handed me his memorial, with the request that I would send it to the Commission with the proofs accompanying it. I did so send it. My constituent then desired me to appear before the Commission, if necessary, and attend to the case. Action was had upon the case, but I never appeared before the Commission. I only inquired of one of the Commissioners what action had been had upon it. I received no compensation for it whatever. I attended to the business as I would attend to any other business of my constituents. But I did not appear as counsel in the case.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish to ask the gentleman from Missouri this question: Did you ever receive any compensation for your action before this Commission?

Mr. PHELPS. I did not appear before that Board at all, nor did I receive any compensation for filing the memorial.

Mr. HOWARD. As the gentleman from Georgia has mentioned my name in this connection, I desire to state that two constituent s of mine sent cases to me which I filed before the Board. I presented them, however, without having exacted or received any compensation.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then I understand the gentleman from Texas did appear before the Board, but received no compensation for it.

Mr. HOWARD. I will state that I received petitions and papers made out, some of which I corrected, and one petition I redrafted, signed them The witnesses are unimpeached, and they swear as counsel, and presented them before the Board, but I never received any compensation nor charged any. I have never charged or received any pay for business to which I here attend to before the Departments.

While I am up, however, I will state that I do not myself consider an appearance before such a board as anything improper in itself. I agreed to this report, however, because I think it is better for the representatives and the country that members of Congress should not appear before such commissions, and not because I considered such an appearance as anything improper in itself. I shall take occasion to state my reasons for this opinion before the debate closes.

Mr. STEPHENS. What I was informed, then, is true, that these gentlemen did act as counsel before this Board. Mr. PHELPS did not appear before the Board in person, because it was not necessary; but as the papers presented by them were for constituents, they did not charge or receive any compensation for their services. On that point, as I stated, I was not informed as to either or any of the gentlemen named by me.

Mr. PHELPS. I did not appear before the Board at all. I merely handed in the papers.

Mr. STEPHENS. The gentleman did not appear, because it was not necessary. I presume there is no question that neither of these gentlemen received any compensation for their services. But the gentleman from Texas very correctly states, in my opinion, that it was nothing unusual or improper in members of Congress in appearing before such a board as counsel for compensation.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement?

Mr. STEPHENS. Be brief.

Mr. STANTON. I do not know whether the gentleman from Georgia has my name as appearing before this Commission or not, but I did appear there, in one case for a constituent of mine, who employed me as his counsel, and paid me for it. I drew his memorial, and presented it before the Board. I did not think the Commission allowed him half as much as he was entitled to, but he paid me in accordance with his own proposition.

Mr. STEPHENS. I did not have the gentleman's name; and it is very possible other members of Congress appeared about whom I have no information.

Mr. STANTON. I will state further, Mr. Speaker, that I have attended to business for my constituents and others, a thousand times, and never received a cent for my services, and never would receive a cent, although money has been repeatedly offered me.

Mr. STEPHENS. It seems, then, that the two gentlemen, Mr. HOWARD and Mr. PHELPS, happened to have the papers of constituents, in consideration of which, they did not charge them for their services; but if the papers had been presented by others, according to the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. STANTON,] and of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HOWARD,] they would have considered it nothing improper to have appeared before that Commission, any more than to have appeared before the Supreme Court as counsel.

Now, my point was, to show from the whole legislative history of the country, that such a connection has never been deemed improper, that there is no legislation against it. This I think I have established. The only Department of the Government in relation to which such a connection is prohibited by law, is that of the Treasury. That is the only Department in which public officers are prohibited from holding such a relationship. In the War Department there is no law against either the head of it or any subordinate being interested in a claim, or prosecuting a claim pending before the Treasury. In the State Department there is no such prohibition, or in any other Department. Here, and in this connection, I beg to call the attention of the House to the investigation which was had in 1837, before the memorable committee of Mr. Wise. You recollect, perhaps, that amongst other charges of impropriety preferred by Mr. Wise, was, that the heads of some of the Departments were speculating in the public lands, and with having interest in, and with prosecuting claims against the Government. The position of General Jackson, and of the party then in power, of which he was emphatically the head, was, that there was no law against it, and that if the head of any of the Departments, except the Treasury, or any of the officers of the Government, had a claim against the Government, or was disposed to invest his money in speculating in the public lands, that it was no well-grounded charge against the integrity of such officer. I have the report of that committee before me, with the remarks of Mr. Wise upon it. These papers, I think, fully sustain this position.

The Secretary of State was charged at that time with being largely interested in a land company in the State of Alabama. Witnesses were put upon the stand and questioned as to that fact. The question was so modified and restricted as to make the witness answer whether the Secretary of State had been interested in any land speculations "contrary to law." There was no law against it, and the question was not permitted to be propounded touching the matter without this modification. The inference was clear that he was, or if he was, that it was his legal right to be so interested.

Well, sir, with this distinct allegation as to the Secretary of State, what said General Jackson to this committee? "If you are able to point to any 'case where there is the slightest reason to suspect 'corruption or abuse of trust, no obstacle which I 'can remove shall be interposed to prevent the 'fullest scrutiny by all legal means." This he said to Mr. Wise. He had specified the speculations of the Secretary of State in public lands. But that was no case of "corruption and abuse," in the opinion of General Jackson, because it was not against any law.

General Jackson held that there was no corruption in the charge, if true, because there was no law against it: and his friends in this House on the committee would not allow the question to be put.

And I say, sir, you must first define crime before you go hunting criminals. You must first proclaim by law what is wrong, and what you intend to hold up to public odium, before you can hold Mr. Corwin, or Mr. Anybody else, up as a public malefactor for breaking your law. Your law must first be made and published. Where there is no law, there is no transgression. Therefore you cannot rightfully charge the Secretary of the Treasury, as a Senator of the United States, with being "improperly" employed as counsel before the Board of Mexican Commissioners, which is the issue in this matter, until you declare by law that a Senator shall not be so employed, and until he then shall have rendered himself obnoxious to the provisions of your law. When all this takes place, his conduct will fall within the range of those acts which are called "mala prohibita," and not even then within that class denominated "mala in se," unless there be positive corruption.

But, sir, there is another matter brought into this discussion, to which I beg the indulgence of the House for a short reference to.

The investigations of Mr. Wise's committee were connected with other matters besides speculations in land, and one of which has been alluded to in this debate. It was freely admitted by the then Secretary of State—Mr. Forsyth—that he had been employed as attorney, and was so employed while Secretary of State, to prosecute against the Government what is well known as the Galphin claim. General Jackson knew, and the country knew, that Mr. Forsyth admitted this. It was not denied. He was Secretary of State, and admitted the fact before the committee. Here is his evidence. Yet no one censured Mr. Forsyth; and no one then dared to impugn his honor for it. That then and now stands above reproach—because it was his legal right to do so. The Secretary of the Treasury was by the law of 1789 prohibited from prosecuting or becoming interested in claims against the Government. But, as I have said, there is no law prohibiting this in the heads of the other Departments. Now, I beg the indulgence of the House, by way of digression, to allude somewhat to this claim, which others have associated with "Gardinerism," as they call it. I addressed a former House upon the same subject. But there are many here who I doubt not know but little of its merits. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS,] in his speech, alludes to "Galphinism," or the "Galphins." He says, that after the decease of the lamented Taylor, when Mr. Fillmore entered this Hall to take the oath of office, followed by the Cabinet of General Taylor, Corwin heard the murmur from the galleries, "There come the Galphins," which reached every part of the Hall.

Well, sir, the gentleman may have heard such a murmur, but I did not, and never heard of it until I saw it in his speech.

Now, sir, I intend to say something on this Galphin claim. Gentlemen may, if they choose, continue to cry out Galphin fraud; but they shall not do it without the exposure which is due to the truth, as well as right and justice.

Mr. Speaker, I am here to-day to defend that claim against any one who may be bold enough to assail it. I hold myself ready to say and maintain that there was no fraud in the Galphin claim. I saw this claim alluded to in a paper the other day as the "Galphin swindle." Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask this House to hear, not as partisans, what I have to assert in vindication of the truth in this matter. I feel it my duty to do it, in vindication of people whom I know, descendants of Galphin, and men who under him have received their just rights—rights which were long delayed at the door of public justice. Some of these gentlemen reside in the State of Georgia and some reside in the State of South Carolina—as high-minded, honorable and chivalrous men as ever trod the face of the earth; men who would scorn to take a dollar from the Government which was not justly their due. Some of these parties I know—and I will vindicate them, and I will vindicate the truth of history, whenever they or their conduct in this matter are assailed or maligned. There was, sir, no fraud in the Galphin claim. In the maintenance of what I say, I shall assert facts and nothing but facts, which are uncontroverted in the past and incontrovertible for all time to come. And when I am done, I want to see the man rise up here in the face of these facts and say that there was fraud in the payment of that just debt.

These are the facts: In 1773, the Cherokee Indians and the Creek Indians in the State of Georgia, were indebted to certain traders to a considerable amount of money. They had nothing to pay it with. This was while Georgia was a British colony. These Indians agreed to cede to the Crown of Great Britain a certain amount of land—two millions and a half of acres, or thereabouts—in consideration of which Great Britain was to take the lands and discharge their debts to these traders. The treaty was made in 1773. On the 2d May, 1775, a certificate was made out by commissioners appointed according to the treaty, to George Galphin for £9,791 15*s*. 5*d*. The war of the Revolution broke out in 1776. The land was not sold by Great Britain, nor the debt or any part of it paid; and in 1777, Georgia took possession of the lands. She gave them as bounty to the soldiers who would go and occupy them. She used them in our national defense in the war of the Revolution; and George Galphin in that day, did your country and the infant colony of Georgia most essential service in preventing the Indians from making inroads upon the defenseless inhabitants of that unprotected frontier.

I speak from history and the records of the country—Galphin was true to the cause of his country and her struggle for independence. And I state here, that the only section of our State which was not at some period of the war taken by the British, was where settlements were made on those lands, in the county of Wilkes. There the British flag has never waved since the declaration of independence. Nay, more; a fort erected by these settlers, bearing the name of Washington, on the site of the present town of Washington—the name continued from that day to this—was the first place, as I believe, on this whole continent, named in honor of the Father of his country. This, I say, I believe. I do not state this as a historic fact; for there may have been some place so called at an earlier date; I think not, however; and until the contrary be shown, I shall claim this honor for my State, and the people of the county of my birth.

But to proceed with my narrative. The State of Georgia, in 1780, passed an act binding and obligating herself to pay to any of those Indian claimants who were true to the country, the whole amount awarded to them by the commissioners under the treaty, and for which the lands were bound in equity and good faith, with interest at six per cent. George Galphin was one of them. By her act she assumed this debt of Galphin for £9,791 15*s*. 5*d*., with interest at six per cent. per annum. Did not this solemn act create a just debt? But Galphin died in 1780, very soon after the act passed.

Sir, George Walton, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, from the State of Georgia, testified himself, in 1800, that he knew George Galphin; that "he enjoyed his friendship in his lifetime;" that he was a patriot, and had rendered essential services to the country. Mr. Walton further stated that he was on the committee in the Georgia Legislature that framed the law of 1780, providing for the payment of these claims; that he was chairman of that committee; that he drew the act, and well recollected "its motives, its sincerity, and its intention of justice," and that it was an honest debt, due to that "venerable man." Did George Walton want to "swindle" anybody? Did George Walton plot fraud against your Treasury?—George Walton the man who risked his life for the liberties you enjoy? Was he sneaking about to get his arm into the Treasury? Sir, he was made of sterner stuff, and you may howl against the Galphins as long as you please, but while I stand upon the testimony of the man who stood by this country in its darkest hour, I shall feel no dishonor in defending the rights of that man whose friendship he enjoyed while living.

I say there never was a juster claim against the State of Georgia than this. She pledged to him the amount of his debt, which was £9,791 15*s*. 5*d*. in sterling money, and six per cent. interest. Well, the old man died a month or two after—the venerable old man, as the patriot Walton called him. I saw some time ago a toast given at a dinner, with this idea—that the history of this Administration would be written in the blood of the Galphins. And who, sir, was Galphin? He was one of the most distinguished men living on the frontiers of your country, a man who stood by the patriots who won your liberties and achieved the independence of your country. I state further that his daughter was married to John Milledge, of Georgia, a man whose name the capital of our State still bears in the city of Milledgeville, and we do not feel dishonored by this perpetuation of the name of a man who was thus connected and allied with George Galphin? And whoever wants the history of this Administration written in the blood of the Galphins, wants it written in the blood of some of the purest and noblest men who periled their all for the rights and liberties of their country.

Now, sir, this claim was presented to the Legislature of the State of Georgia in 1793 by his son. The committee to whom it was referred, reported in favor of it. And it was presented to several Legislatures after that up to 1826; but it was not paid, though almost every committee to whom it was referred reported in favor of it, as a just debt against Georgia. Do you ask why it was not paid? I will tell you, in my opinion, simply because they did not have the money. For the same reason, I fear that most of our States will fail to pay their debts when the question shall be between refusal and very high taxation.

Well, why was it presented here? I will tell you. In 1790, the General Government passed what is known as the assumption act. That is, the General Government brought into a general account the contributions of each State, either to the general defense, or the particular defense of the common country, during the common struggle of the war for our national independence. At this time Galphin was dead, and Georgia had not paid this £9,791 15*s*. 5*d*. She had pledged herself to pay for the lands she had taken possession of and disposed of, but she had not paid the debt, and did not bring it into the account on the settlement under the assumption act of 1790. The settlement under the assumption act was thought for a long time in Georgia to be a final settlement, and that she could not go behind it. Well, in 1832, the State of Virginia came before Congress, and presented claims to a large amount under these circumstances: She stated that during the war of the Revolution she had by law promised to pay to certain officers in her State line raised for her own particular defense, certain annuities for life, upon certain conditions set forth in an act of her General Assembly. A number of these officers insisted that they had complied with these conditions, and claimed their compensation according to contract. She had resisted these claims for a long time, but finally her courts, which were open against her, had decided in favor of the claimants, and judgments to a large amount were rendered against her, and the State then came and asked Congress to reopen the assumption act of 1790, or at least to pay these claims, upon the principles of that act; because she said that her liability to these officers was of the same nature as the advances for the particular defense that she had made, and which had been brought into the account under the assumption act of 1790. Congress, in 1832, assumed the liability and paid it; and in doing that, Congress did right; because Virginia, in 1790, did not know that she was liable, or would be liable for those claims. You paid under that act nearly a million of dollars, perhaps more.

Now, then, the representatives of Galphin came and asked the General Government to pay them £9,791 15*s*. 5*d*., with interest at six per cent.; which was the liability or debt of Georgia, incurred for the particular defense of that part of the common country not included in the act of 1790, just as they did the Virginia claims, and identically upon the same principles of equity and justice and right. In 1836, the Senate passed a resolution requesting the President of the United States (General Jackson) to write to the Governor of Georgia, to get all the information in his possession upon the subject. In January, 1837, General Jackson so wrote; and Governor Schley, of Georgia—a political friend of General Jackson—answered the inquiries soon after, and amongst other things, said, "that there is justly due to the 'heirs of George Galphin the sum of nine thousand 'seven hundred and ninety-one pounds fifteen shillings 'and five pence sterling money of Great Britain," &c., '&c.; "and the only question now is, whether Georgia 'or the United States ought to pay the money." The claim, like many others, remained for several years; but in August, 1848, Congress passed a law requiring the Secretary of the Treasury "to examine and adjust" it, and "to pay the amount 'which may be found due to Milledge Galphin,

'executor of George Galphin, out of any money 'in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated;" and in pursuance of that law the principal and interest of that debt were paid. That, sir, is Galphinism!—its height, its length, its breadth and depth. There it stands in all its naked deformity. Look upon it, examine it, scrutinize it, and tell me where is the "swindle," and who have been the "swindlers." When the case was last presented to Congress, whose hands was it put into? Into the hands of George McDuffie, of South Carolina. Who presented it? George McDuffie! Did he want to commit a fraud against your Treasury? Was he a swindler? It went before a committee, and who constituted that committee? Messrs. Ashley, Breese, Berrien, Westcott, and Webster. They made a report to the Senate, and spread it before the country in 1847. The bill passed the Senate. There was no formidable opposition, because the grounds upon which it was presented and sustained were too clear, as I believe, to be avoided. Here was the act of Georgia obliging her to pay that debt—as solemn a debt as ever was contracted. It was for particular defenses, and was put upon precisely the same grounds of assumption as the Virginia claims, and no one could escape the force of the reasons.

In 1848 it was before the same committee in the Senate. That committee was composed of the same gentlemen who constituted the former committee, with one or two exceptions—a committee of able and practical men. They reported again in favor of it. Were they the "Galphins" who perpetrated this monstrous fraud? The distinguished Senator from Michigan, [General CASS,] when Secretary of War, said that there was no doubt but that the claim was just, and the only question was, which should pay it, Georgia or the United States. Was he one of the swindlers?

Early in 1848, the bill came into this House, and was laid upon your table. The report was printed, and the case referred to a committee of this House. I have before me the names of that committee, and they are all honorable men, and unimpeachable. One of the gentlemen upon that committee (Mr. Pettit) is nominated by his party, I see, to be a Senator from the State of Indiana. Was he a swindler? Did he think it was a great fraud? Was he trying to cheat the public? Is he one of those with whose blood it is the desire of some to write the history of this Administration? Do you want to write the history of the Administration in the blood of General Cass, of Mr. Forsyth, of Governor Schley, the blood of the Judiciary Committee in the Senate, and in the blood of the distinguished individual to whom I have just alluded? Are all these men Galphins? I believe the gentleman from Ohio said that they, the "Galphins," were buried so deep, that the hand of resurrection would never raise them up. But the Democracy in Indiana, it seems, has imparted new life to one of them—has "galvanized" him, at least, by sending him to the Senate.

I heard a gentleman inquire how this Galphin claim passed through this House. I say it passed this House by the unanimous vote of every man in it, when any one man's voice could have prevented it. It stood upon its own merits. No speech was made in its behalf. It had no advocate but the plain, short, strong argument of the committee. Their printed report lay upon your desk for six months. It was taken up and acted upon at a time when no bill could pass, that did not receive the unanimous support of every man in the House. Your Journal shows this fact. It passed in August, 1848. Were all in this House then Galphins? It was passed, and carried to Mr. Polk for his signature. Did not he understand all about Galphin? Was not Mr. Forsyth a feed attorney, and did he not prosecute it while Secretary of State under Jackson? Did not Mr. Wise report then, that this Galphin claim was about $150,000? Was not Mr. Polk, as Speaker of this House at that time, conversant with all these facts? It is to be presumed that he was. At any event, he signed the bill two days after it passed. Is he, too, one of this famous family of the Galphins? Mr. Walker, his Secretary of the Treasury, paid the principal, but did not pay the interest, because, as he stated in his testimony, he did not have time to investigate that point. But he said—and mark it—that whatever Galphin's debt was, this Government, by the act of 1848, had assumed it fully. The act of Georgia of 1780, pledging to Galphin £9,791 15*s.* 5*d.*, with interest at six per cent. per annum, was not before him. But who can say, with that act before him, he would not have paid the interest according to his testimony? For he said, whatever the debt was which was due to Galphin, the act of 1848 had assumed. And who can say that £9,791 15*s.* 5*d.*, with six per cent. interest, was not due to Galphin by the act of Georgia of 1780? If any man is bold enough to do so, let him do it. My time will not permit me to discuss this subject at any greater length, and I trust the House will pardon this digression.

What I have said I have stated for the House and the country. The facts, as I have stated, are uncontroverted in the past, and will remain incontrovertible for all time to come, and I defy their controversion here or anywhere.

I am here to resist all party clamor that may be brought against this claim. I suppose that many of these expressions, such as "Galphins," by party heat, emanate from partisan feelings, and without any distinct or definite idea of what are meant by them. But I say that the character of every man should be defended by those who love truth and justice. The character of the humblest, alike with the character of the highest, shall, at all times, receive defense from me, when I can defend it. I care not if the name of wrongful accusers is legion, I will face them all, if necessary. I do not care to join with the shouting multitude barely because they are strong in numbers. I do not fancy the taste of those who play upon expressions because they catch the popular cant or whim of the day. It is an easy matter to pander to the passions or prejudices of the uninformed?

Sir, this is the "facilis descensus Averni," the downward road of the demagogue. It is easy to travel it, and, to some, it seems to be a pleasant jaunt; but to vindicate the truth, to stand up for the right against the majority, "Hic labor, hoc opus est." I shall do it, or attempt to do it, sir, though I be a minority of one.

I have nothing to say, at this time, about the connection of the then Secretary of War with it. Mr. Crawford was interested in the claim, and was Secretary of War when the interest was paid—that is all. I will, however, ask, when the offer was made to have the justice and legality of the allowance referred to the Supreme Court of the United States, who prevented it? The Senate Journal will show.

Did they want to commit a fraud upon the Treasury? Was Mr. BUTLER, of South Carolina, Mr. ATCHISON, of Missouri, Mr. TURNEY, of Tennessee, and a number more whom I need not name, were they all Galphins? But I am done with this; and I am also done with the matters alluded to in the report of the committee on the Gardiner case.

I have shown that that committee fully acquitted Mr. Corwin of the charge of being improperly connected with the claim, and that this bill has really no connection with the duty assigned to them.

This bill, with amendments, I intend to vote for; but I shall not vote for it as it is, because, under its provisions, any member might be put in the penitentiary for going down to the Pension Office and filing the memorial of any of his constituents for a bounty land warrant. With amendments which shall prevent members of Congress from attending to such business "for fee or reward," I shall vote for it. I am in favor of such a prohibition in future, not because there has been anything dishonorable, disreputable, or corrupt, or "malum in se" in such acts, and not because I think that Messrs. Dallas, Webster, Benton, and Stanton, or Corwin, did anything wrong in what I have stated, for I do not, but because I think that we should establish a rule for the future by which honorable men can act so as not to subject themselves to unjust imputations. The bill thus amended would, if even made retrospective, never touch any act of mine. But I make, however, no boast of that. I have never looked upon such acts in others as at all disreputable, much less as grounds of charging corruption. I think it wise and proper that such a regulation should be made. And why? Because honest, unimpeachable men, such, in my opinion, as Webster, and Corwin, and others acting in that capacity, may be a sort of cloak for those who may be unscrupulous and corrupt.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. As the gentleman intends to vote for the bill, which it is almost treason to say is an impeachment upon the whole House, I would inquire whether he intends to extend its provisions to prevent members from advocating cases before the Supreme Court of the United States; and if he does not, why does he make the distinction?

Mr. STEPHENS. I shall vote for that, but I do not know whether it will be incorporated with the bill or not. I will state candidly to the gentleman, as I did in a conversation on this matter with a distinguished gentleman yesterday, who said that he thought it proper not to extend the prohibition to the Supreme Court, that I think the prohibition should extend to members of Congress practicing in that court, as well as before boards of commissioners—and why? The impeaching power is with the House of Representatives, and the trying power with the Senate; and I ask what kind of influence would be more powerful than Congressional influence upon a judge who felt guilty, and knew that an impeachment was to be made? Would he not favor a distinguished member of Congress who was counsel in a case before him for trial, quite as much as a member of a board of commissioners? I will, if possible, vote for the extension of the provisions of this bill to the Supreme Court. If I cannot get that, I shall vote for the bill in the best shape I can get it. I am for establishing a rule by which every one can regulate his conduct, and then right and wrong will not be left to the capricious judgment of friend or foe. Let it be written in the law, and then all can equally stand or fall by the law, and not the uncertain standard of men's opinions.

[In the progress of the debate Mr. STEPHENS having repeated his belief, from the disclosures, that the Gardiner claim was wholly unfounded, but that the matter was undergoing judicial investigation before the proper courts, Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, inquired of him if the proof of its being a fabrication was not so conclusive as to cause the President to institute suits for the recovery of the money and prosecutions for forgery and perjury, &c.; and whether Mr. STEPHENS would say that Mr. Corwin, if these cases should be decided against Gardiner, would repay what he had received from the Treasury of the United States.]

Mr. STEPHENS. I will answer the gentleman. I admit that the President has done what he said, and it is a fact that he did it long before this clamor in the House was raised. The President had this man arrested under a suspicion that reached him, I think long before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] moved in the matter. The President upon suspicion did it, and he did right; and this committee, of which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] is a member, knows and reports that the President has been vigilant—and the papers in the report show that Mr. Corwin too has been active and vigilant in getting at the truth of the matter. I grant these facts, and I state them because the case is now pending and is yet to be tried. The President has been vigilant, Mr. Corwin has been vigilant, and am I to be asked what he will do in anticipation of that judgment?

Mr. Gardiner, it is true, was put in prison. He has given bail; he has found sureties; he says that he will vindicate his character. Is Mr. Corwin, or any one else, to prejudge him? I never believed much in those Mexican claims when we went to war to get them; when we were told that there were six or seven millions of them, that we ought to go to war to make Mexico pay them. I thought then that they were most of them nothing but batches of fraud. But I will do justice even to a Mexican claimant. I will not prejudge his case. Let him come into court. I, as a grand juror, say that I believe the suspicion is a strong one that his claim is a fraud. But he shall or should have his day in court before he is condemned. He claims the opportunity of vindicating himself, according to the laws of the country, and according to the treaty, and he should have it. My opinion is, that he will not do it. Mr. Corwin's opinion is, doubtless, that he will not do it. The President is of the opinion, I imagine, that he will not do it; and hence they institute these proceedings against him. But I will not crush even a worm; bad even as I believe Gardiner to be, I will not prejudge him, nor denounce Mr. Corwin in anticipation of his act, depending upon a future judgment in court. Now, the gentleman says, suppose Gardiner shall be found guilty by this court, would I defend Mr. Corwin for holding this money? I do not consider that the evidence discloses that Corwin has received one dollar of this money from the Treasury of the United States. The testimony is, that he did buy what he thought was a good title, and sold it without warranty, with a quit-claim. That is a matter between him and his assignee. Mr. Law, or some one under him, it seems, got Mr. Corwin's interest in it.

But my opinion is, that when the case in court is proven to be fradulent, if it shall be so proven, that the same vigilance which arrested Gardiner ought to pursue every man who holds a portion of it; the one fourth stands on the same footing as the other three fourths. I have no reason to doubt that Mr. Corwin would be just as vigilant, and the President would be just as vigilant, in ferreting out the one as the other. I do not care in whose pocket it is to be found. How Mr. Corwin will act towards his assignee I do not know. Whether he will feel under obligation to make good what he sold without warranty or condition, I do not know And it will be time enough to moot the propriety of his conduct in this matter after the case shall be found by the court to be fradulent, if that shall ever be, and after George Law, or his assignees, who got the money, shall fail to respond.

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN BELL,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE SENATE, February 5 and 17, 1853.

The bill reported from a Select Committee for the construction of a Railroad and Telegraphic line from the Mississippi Valley to the Pacific Ocean being under consideration,

Mr. BELL said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The Senator from South Carolina [Mr BUTLER] has made a very forcible, but I hope not a very formidable attack on this bill; and in rising to answer some of his objections, I do not suppose that I shall be able to dispose of all of them in the order in which he has presented them, because that I know would be impossible; for shape a proposition of this kind in what manner you may, there will be not only plausible but strong objections to be urged to it. This bill partakes of the character of everything else in legislation, and everything that is human. It is imperfect, and so will be found any plan that can be devised by the most ingenious and able gentleman on this floor, when he shall undertake to put together the various parts of a measure of this description. The Senator from South Carolina has denounced this bill as in the first place unconstitutional—as a violation of our organic law; and he is therefore opposed to it. He has denounced it as premature. He has announced, in as strong terms as he could, that we have no sufficient lights before us to guide our judgments in sustaining such a measure as this. He has denounced the plan before the Senate as an undigested one, with conflicting provisions. He has denounced it as merely experimental, and says that we have nothing to assure us that this great work is practicable. He has denounced it as a stupendous monopoly if it shall go into operation and be successful; and, what I think is somewhat conflicting with his own arguments against the measure, he has said that if it be a failure, though it may prove to be no monopoly and of no profit to a company, the expense will fall exclusively upon the United States. In how many other forms he has denounced it I do not remember, and I will not take time to look at my notes, in which I attempted to sketch them down.

Now, Mr. President, I am in favor of this road. I am in favor of commencing its construction at an early day. Is the honorable Senator from South Carolina in favor of it at all? If he be not in its favor, then we cannot stand upon equal grounds, either in assigning reasons for its support, or in answering objections that are interposed against it. But I ought to have stated that the honorable Senator sounded the alarm-drum of party prejudices; and in connection with his other objections, he appealed to his Democratic friends to recollect their obligations, to be found in the platform adopted by that party. He appealed to the prejudices of those who have stood in this body for years contending against a system of internal improvements by the General Government within the limits of the States, and he proclaimed that this bill was carrying out such a practice and such a policy on the part of the Government of the United States. From all these considerations, I take it for granted, therefore, that the honorable Senator is opposed to any bill of this kind; that he is not only so opposed now, but that he must remain so until the Constitution is amended. It is true, he has said that under the provisions of our present organic law, this Government has a right to make a military road through the Territories of the United States; but I would ask what, in these days of progress, is a railroad but a military road? If we have a right to construct a military road, to what great purpose would it inure, at this day, if it were not a railroad?

Suppose it was necessary in time of war to send troops and munitions of war and other army supplies across the continent, over the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada, for a distance of two thousand miles, what use at this day would an ordinary military road be—I mean a road by which you would have to drag cannon up the sides of the mountains and let them down on the opposite sides, pack your provisions on mules, or draw them with oxen through the narrow passes? That would be what is generally considered a military road, and the honorable gentleman thinks he has no objection to such a road as that! Such a road would be behind the times. According to his own argument, I would ask the honorable Senator what is a railroad but a military road? If the honorable Senator will reflect upon the objection, I think he will see that he will be obliged to with draw his opposition as to the constitutional power, so far as it is proposed to run this road exclusively through the Territories of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. My friend from Tennessee will allow me to make one remark in this connection. I have never gone further than to say that I would be willing to vote for a reconnoissance and survey, to see whether a military road could be made. I do not know that, after we should have that reconnoissance and survey, I would deem it to be a matter of policy to construct such a road.

Mr. BELL. I remember the honorable Senator did make some such qualification, but he seemed to doubt whether we could construct even a military road over these mountain passes. But I am traveling out of the order of the remarks that I designed to make. It occurs to me that there is one method of argument which will prove the most effective answer to the Senator, and that would be to trace the history briefly of this proposition to construct a railroad to the Pacific, from its inception to the present time. I have stated before, that I am in favor of such a road. I am not wedded to the particular mode or form of construction which is provided in this bill. If I cannot find a majority of the members of this honorable body concurring in this proposition, I am willing to take what, in my judgment, may be an inferior one, in order to get something which will answer the great purpose—I mean a road to the Pacific. If I had the power of sitting down and devising the best means in my judgment, and had the power, at the same time, of bringing to a concurrence with me a majority of the members of this body, I would frame a very different bill from this. But it was because I was in favor of the commencement of such a road as this, at the earliest possible day, that I gave my consent to this bill.

Four years ago, Mr. President, I gave my consent to the project of Mr. Whitney; and I am not prepared to say, even at this day, that that was a very wild or extravagant project. A majority of the Legislatures of seventeen different States of this Union were brought to concur in the propriety of making that experiment. They did not look nicely at what it might cost the country. They were willing to give the millions of acres of public lands which were proposed by that gentleman, for the making of what many of them must have known, from the lights that were before them, to be an experiment. And so, to make a remark pertinent to one that fell from the Senator from South Carolina to-day—that if this road shall turn out to cost fifty per cent. or one hundred per cent. more than we suppose in the bill before us, and prove to be a failure, he considers that all the expense will fall on the Government, and be a total loss; I say even then it will not be a failure. We may be making an experiment as to the cost of the road, it is true; but if it shall cost $80,000 a mile instead of $40,000, I shall consider it a profitable experiment to the country and to the world. And again, if the road were to stop at the base of the mountains, and could go no further, still every one hundred, or four hundred, or five hundred miles you advance with it, suppose it stops there, is so much space overcome and gained in the transit between the Atlantic States and Pacific coast. You shorten the land transportation; you shorten the transportation of troops and munitions of war by that much. The expense and labor are not lost. The honorable Senator's argument is a failure, when he attempts to show that if we cannot accomplish all we propose, all is lost. Every hundred miles we proceed with the railroad is so much gained. But to recur to the history of this project.

The Senator from South Carolina says this project is premature. Five years ago, I believe, we ratified in this body the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. Then, if the Senator had anything to object to making inroads upon the Constitution of the land, in this age of progress, then was the time for him to come forward with his objections. But from the moment that treaty was ratified, and California became ours, by a stronger and more imperative necessity than existed before, when we had only Oregon, it was settled that we were to keep up with this progress, and connect the Atlantic and Pacific together. It was then as inevitable as is now the necessity of making this road, to my mind, and I think it will be to every other Senator who will consider of it for a moment, calmly and without prejudice. We must have this tie, this bond, this channel of communication, if we mean to hold the territory which was ceded to us by that treaty. And, sir, for fear I shall forget it, let me now, although it is not strictly in the order of my remarks, call the Senator's attention to another point in answer to one part of his argument in which he complains of the infraction of the Constitution, and of what this progress has done. He should go back, to the admission of Louisiana into the Union, through a treaty with France, and commence this breach of the Constitution there; and he will trace it on to the admission of Florida through a treaty with Spain; and then, I trust, he will come to the admission of Texas; and when he complains of what progress has done in beating down the barriers of the Constitution in regard to the acquisition of territory, and the improvements projected to hold it in our control and dominion, I trust he will reflect upon the mode in which Texas was admitted into the Union. I do not know that he was in public life then, but I know that he is associated with gentlemen who gave their hearty concurrence to the measure for the admission of Texas. The greatest breach, in my opinion, ever made in those barriers was made by the mode in which Texas was admitted into the Union; and if the honorable Senator has no fault to find with that, surely he ought no longer to complain—I mean the admission of Texas by a resolution passed by a majority of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know what would have been my judgment at the time, if I had been called upon to vote; perhaps I would have yielded to assimilation—for the gentleman seems to say that, by assimilation, I shall be responsible for that measure. I might have assimilated to the views of others; if I had to give my opinion, however, in the abstract, I would have preferred a different mode of admitting Texas.

Mr. BELL. That is a fair and candid admission. But after these great barriers, which he thinks it is of such importance that we should hold up in their original strength and solidity, have been broken down in this manner, why interpose objections to every measure of this kind? It is out of time; it is past the period when such objections can be interposed with success here. Sir, it is a part of progress. No such thing was contemplated by the Constitution as the admission of California under the circumstances, or of Texas, any more than of Louisiana, under the circumstances in which it was admitted. But I repeat, these are the results, these are the evidences of progress. Then, it is but a part of the same step in progress that you must build this road to connect the Atlantic and Pacific. I will try now to proceed in some more regular order to answer the objections of the Senator from South Carolina. I think I can do it by tracing the history of this particular bill.

I have already stated that this measure has, in some shape, been before the Senate of the United States, and before the people of the United States, some four years. Four years ago Mr. Whitney's project was presented to the Senate in a well-considered bill. Four years ago the objection was raised, that such a measure was premature; a reconnoissance and surveys were required, and fifty thousand dollars were appropriated for that purpose. The Senator from Texas can correct me if I am wrong. At a later day some additional $20,000 or $30,000 were appropriated for the same purpose. Remember the objection then was that we had not sufficient information to act upon the subject; that we did not know that it was practicable; that it was premature. Numerous reconnoissances and surveys have actually taken place under those appropriations.

Mr. RUSK. I will explain it. In 1849, the question was brought before the Senate on a motion to appropriate $100,000 for the express purpose of a survey. It passed the Senate. It was reduced by the Committee of Conference to $50,000. It so remains on the statute-book. But a large portion of the amount passed into the general fund; it was not used; the orders were countermanded. I will say, though, that there have been more than half a dozen reconnoissances made.

Mr. BELL. I am adducing this in answer not only to the Senator from South Carolina, but to the other gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to the bill, and who have said that we have no adequate preparation for entering on the subject; that we have no sufficient lights to guide our judgments; that we have no reconnoissances or surveys to authorize us to undertake such a stupendous enterprise as this. We have had the explorations and reconnoissances in former days of Pike, and of Long; and coming down from them, we have those of Frémont, Emory, Stansbury, Abert, Simpson, Marcy, Sitgreaves, Johnson, and how many others I do not know. Many of their reports have been published to the world in an authentic form, and challenge the respect and admiration of the public for the enterprise and skill manifested in making them. Some of them, I believe—as Captain Sitgreaves's—have not been published, but will be in a short time. Many of these explorations and examinations have taken place, under instructions given with a direct view of ascertaining the localities of this country—this immense region—and the practicability of constructing a railroad through it. We have also the surveys upon the Rio Grande and the Gila—the southern route—by Bartlett and his company, and the exploration of Colonel Graham, when he went out to El Paso.

Senators assume what is absolutely unfounded in fact, when they assert that we have had no explorations, examinations, and surveys by reference to which we can decide upon the practicability of this road. They are entirely mistaken. If they had said that there are some mountain passes which have not yet been explored or surveyed, they would have said what is true. And this bill makes provision for that, by giving the President the power, and placing at his disposal the means of making further examinations and surveys before the road is located. And, what is more, in addition to these scientific surveys, we have men now in this city, who have spent their youth and their manhood in exploring this country; men of integrity and of as much intelligence as they could acquire as hunters and woodsmen; they are here, and are ready to give you assurances, with regard to the character of the whole country from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific coast. I believe there is a man in this city (Laroux) at this very time, who may be said, with very little exaggeration, to have been upon every square mile of these mountain passes, and the intervening valleys and depressions which we wish to know something about. He has traversed the whole country, almost from the northern boundary of the United States to the south; especially the southern portion. And we have had traders exploring that country, from the Missouri river to New Mexico, and from New Mexico down the Rio Grande, for some twenty or thirty years, with their annual caravans: they ought to know something about the country. We have had traders, trappers, and hunters penetrating even the Salt Lake region years and years before the acquisition of California. I remember General Ashley gave me a most interesting account of that lake—being one of his rendezvous in a trapping expedition in which he was concerned himself; and I recollect very well a thrilling incident connected with it. It is true that better, and more scientific explorations since that time, have thrown all that into the background.

During the last three or four years we have had emigrant trains or caravans—three or four in each season—numbering in all some forty or fifty thousand souls in a year, who have crossed this region to California and Oregon. How do they get to California and Oregon with all the difficulties and obstructions which they have to meet, and which are so great as to carry off some two thousand of them annually? Let it be remembered, however, that the loss of life has not been occasioned by the severity of the cold, or by being overwhelmed in snows, in the gorges of the mountains, but because of the failure of their provisions, or the diseases engendered by the change in their habits of living, or the want of sustenance for their teams. Take the reports of any of the travelers who have given us an account of these things: take that of Captain Stansbury, or any one else; and how many miles of this route do you suppose you can pass over where you do not find that your way will be marked at almost every step of your progress by newly-made graves and carcasses of oxen and mules which have perished by the way? The whole route of these annual caravans or emigrant trains may be said, in fact, to be one continued graveyard. It is under circumstances like these, and privations of this kind, that some two thousand emigrants perish every year on the plains and in the mountain passes in the long and dreary route. And yet, Mr. President, after three or four years of such disasters and privations, and with fifty thousand emigrants passing annually to the Pacific coast, we are called upon to delay still further making any provision for a road across that country. It is said that we have not the lights necessary, and that it is premature to act now; that we have not had sufficient reconnoissances to justify the passage of such a measure as this. I would ask Senators what sort of surveys and examination they propose? The Senator from South Carolina thinks the examination can be made in ten months.

Mr. BUTLER. I will correct the Senator on that point. I said that even if the discussion of this measure were delayed for ten months, we should lose nothing by that delay.

Mr. BELL. The Senator being against the bill, and thinking that we have not power to construct the road, I thought it a little singular that he should appeal to us for a delay of ten months. He will pardon me for having misunderstood him. I have said before, that a delay to act upon this bill at this session will be a positive delay for at least two years, before any effective progress can be made in the construction of this road, because it will only be at the end of the first or long session of the next Congress that any measure could be passed for this purpose, and then it will be too late to have any further exploration or survey in that year, and the road could not be located until the middle of the year following. The proposition for the minute surveys spoken of by the Senators from Georgia and Pennsylvania, would require five years, if not ten. I am the more desirous of dwelling upon this point for a moment, on account of the influence which may go abroad as the result of this discussion, and make an impression upon the President himself before he proceeds to fix the termini of this road, that it is necessary to have a description, survey, and examination of the whole of this extensive country, which could not be accomplished in less than five years. I want to know what is the necessity for any survey of the country from the western boundary of the States to the eastern base of the Rocky Mountains?

Senators speak of having conversed with able and intelligent engineers. Will they say that any intelligent engineer will declare that, for five, seven, or eight hundred miles, commencing at any eastern terminus which may be selected, there is any impediment which would prevent the construction of the road—I mean any impediment in the shape of mountains and streams, which will authorize them to say that the route is impracticable? There is the whole range of country from the base of the Rocky Mountains east to the Mississippi river, every acre of which, I may say, has been passed over and explored by your ablest scientific men. Any railroad to the Pacific which will ever be thought of, commencing in the valley of the Mississippi, north of Texas, must take one or the other of the several navigable rivers rising in the Rocky Mountains, and running into the Mississippi; the Platte, or the Nebraska, as it is called, the northern fork, or the southern fork; taking the northern fork if you want to pass higher up than the South Pass, and the southern fork, if you want to pass at that point; or if the Platte is too far north, take the Kansas. If that is found too far north, and would lead you into the snows and gorges, so as to render the passage impracticable in the winter, and you are compelled to go further south, then there is the Arkansas river; and so far as that offers facilities superior to either of the other routes on the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, it is all known. That has been examined and explored; there is no difficulty there. If that again is too far north, there is the Canadian, and that has been explored by Lieutenant Simpson. And what does he say of the Canadian? He says that for a distance of eight hundred miles there is no serious impediment to the construction of a railroad. It would be worth while, if I had time, to quote his authority, in which he speaks of the country from Fort Smith to Santa Fé. I want to read this, inasmuch as gentlemen have said "we want light; we have no information, and no authority; we have immense deserts which have not water to supply locomotives." He says that on the whole line of his exploration, "wood and water were generally suffi-'cient, and were they deficient, could be supplied 'without inconvenience, by following the direc-'tions laid down in the maps."

There is not only wood but water, and for about three hundred miles of a country that I had supposed to be a desert, destitute of wood if not of water, he says there is an abundance of fine timber for constructing a road. If you go still further south, there is the Red River valley, which has also been explored. Sir, I want to show that Senators assume as facts things which are not facts, and proceed to argue upon assumptions which are utterly unfounded.

With regard to the exploration of the passes of mountains—the South Pass has been carefully explored and examined by Colonel Frémont, and others, I believe. Captain Stansbury surveyed a pass still further south, leading into the Salt Lake region. Colonel Frémont attempted to examine a pass further south, and still north of Santa Fé, but was driven back by snows drifting upon him in the gorges of the mountains, where a part of his men perished. The next pass examined is that which passes by Albuquerque, south of Santa Fé, and leads over into the valley of the Colorado. Captain Sitgreaves is in the city, I am told, and he has made a reconnoissance of this route, under the direction of the Government He finds no obstructions which an engineer would consider as such, so far as he has gone. He took up the examination, I believe, where Simpson left it, passing the Rio Grande to the Colorado of the West, and along in that direction to Walker's Pass, in the Sierra Nevada. There is said to be a pass in the Sierra Nevada higher up in California, near the head of the valley of the Sacramento. Others say that there is no practicable pass there. That may be a point to be examined yet. Then there is the Guadalupe Pass, of which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CLARKE] reminds me, which has been surveyed, and which leads into the valley of the San Pedro, and thence into the valley of the Gila. Nobody doubts that there are numerous passes in the several mountain ranges between the Mississippi and the Pacific, over which a railroad could be constructed. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] said there were fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five which are known to be practicable, and the question was which was the best of all. And yet some Senators say there has not been any exploration, reconnoissance, or survey, sufficient to justify the passage of the bill.

I now leave that part of the subject, however, and refer to other objections to the bill. Sir, I have been led to take some more interest in this question, particularly with regard to the objections taken to-day, because I happened to be a member of the Select Committee which reported this bill. When that committee met, perhaps there were no two of its members who would have agreed in the provisions of a bill which they would recommend. Before they entered upon any details, they took up the more general and important principles and questions involved in the subject to be decided as preliminaries, for they justly concluded that, unless some material modification of the bills already presented to the Senate could be agreed upon, none could pass. It so happened that there was no member of that committee who was not of opinion that we ought to make an experiment, if you please to call it so, in the construction of such a road as this, from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean. Without consulting other members of the committee, I think I may say there were three of those gentlemen, constituting a majority of the committee, who could have put their fingers upon the termini of the road; or, at all events, upon the eastern terminus, and where, if they had the power, they would put it to-day, with the lights now before them. But these gentlemen, each reflecting in his own mind, and without communicating his thoughts to others, saw what every Senator has seen here for the last four years, if he has been so long a member of this body, and that is, that neither House of Congress can ever agree upon the termini or general direction of a railroad like this, which has to encounter so many local and conflicting jealousies and interests; and therefore I am not disposed to allow perfect ingenuousness to the arguments of those gentlemen who talk of Congress being the proper body to decide where this road shall be located. I have no right to say to those Senators, You, sirs, know that that can never be done; but I think any gentleman of large experience here does know that fact; and let him reflect upon it, and give full scope to his reasoning powers upon his past experience in the body, and he will, I am sure, agree that Congress can never settle this question. What was the difficulty three years ago, when the friends of this project brought it up for consideration? They found, by consultation, that there could be no agreement among Senators with regard to the location of the road.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina says he has a deep interest in the location of this road as a southern man. Well, sir, though not perhaps so deeply interested on that ground as he, I have an interest on that score also, as a man belonging to the same general section of the Union to which he belongs. I, too, have an interest in the location of this road. The Senators from Indiana, from Illinois, from Wisconsin, from Iowa, and from Missouri, have an interest in it. The Northwest have a deep interest in the location of this road—an intense interest; and they would not be authorized to surrender their right to contest it on this floor, but for what?—but from the knowledge derived from their experience here, and from the practical observation of others who have served in legislative bodies, that neither the Senate nor the House could ever agree upon the location of the road. I have given you the two great sections—the Northwest and the Southwest—that have a deep interest in the location of the road; and there is an intermediate section which I may be said in part to represent, and which my friend from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] also represents, which has a deep interest in the location of this road, for we all want it as near as possible to ourselves. So as to the Atlantic sea-board. The cities of New York and Boston and Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, and Savannah have an interest in its location.

A SENATOR. And Pennsylvania.

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir, Pennsylvania has as much interest in it as any other State. Every city and State in the Union has an interest in the location of this road; for it is destined, by its more or less favorable point of connection with their respective railroads and other channels of communication, to affect all their commercial and social interests. The East, not less than the South, has a particular interest in the location of this great road.

The committee saw, or thought they saw, that if this bill were reported in a shape requiring the Senate and House of Representatives to agree upon its termini, we should never have the road; and I would like any gentleman now in his place, to rise and say that there is the remotest prospect that Congress can ever agree upon such a question. The first question propounded to the committee by its chairman was, Shall we report a bill fixing the termini of the road? Sir, the gentlemen representing the Northwest, as well as the South, the Southwest, and the East, responded "No." I think we may assume that they were satisfied that we could never pass an act for the road otherwise. It has been suggested to me out of the Senate, May it not be made a question for a scientific corps to decide which is really the best route, the most suitable and advantageous point, to be made the termini? "No," I say, because there is no one terminus east so far superior in its advantages to the country, to all others that it is likely that any scientific board or body would unite upon it; and then if they did unite, the argument would be urged that there is very little difference between that terminus and one north of that, or one south of it, and so all the evil of conflicting interests and jealousies would still exist. We all, therefore, agreed that the only feasible project was to report a bill without giving Congress the power or making it necessary for them to select the road. Then, the question was, as we decided that Congress could not now and never could designate the termini of the road, Who should be authorized to designate them and the general route of the road?

The committee came to the conclusion, after some discussion and difference of opinion—if I may speak upon that subject—that the President was the proper authority to decide such a question as that. The Secretary of War might be under influences, and the country would not have full confidence in a board of officers, as indicated by the Senator from South Carolina. He seemed to think that the influence must operate upon every gentleman, and upon every scientific board, and upon every officer. We thought that it might. We thought that the President (being the highest in power, being President already, the measure of his ambition being probably full—his character being now so elevated) would be the least likely of all public functionaries to come under the sinister influences of capitalists or what not; that he would have his character, his fame, to consolidate by doing justice to the whole country, proudly independent of all influences whatever, personal or political.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina says that the President may be liable to influences. So he may. Where, then, would he place the locating power? Would he give it to Congress? Why, sir, in his very argument did he not advert to the influences of capitalists in the two Houses of Congress—even the inside influences of capital—for he said capitalists would find their way into this body. Other Senators have spoken more distinctly and candidly of the outside influences of capitalists. The Senator from South Carolina named the large steam navigation companies, and the powerful influences which they wield. He says that our bill has conflicting provisions. The Senator's argument is conflicting in its terms, and not only is his conflicting, but so is that of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON.] They are all conflicting. When you bring it to this body, we say that it will not be more likely to be free from influences, political or otherwise, than the President himself or the Secretary of War. We thought the President least of all likely to be controlled by such influences, and therefore the committee placed it upon the President. It is true the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] thinks it a very great hardship that the back of the President elect should be burdened with the great railroad from the Mississippi to the Pacific, with all its running gear and apparatus, in addition to his other great duties; and he protests against the burden being placed upon him. Sir, the incoming President was not my choice for President. He was the choice of the Senator from Indiana. Does the Senator fear to trust his integrity? Does he fear to trust his firmness and boldness in doing a great act of patriotism for the country, and upon sound and pure principles locating this road, when he sees that Congress will not and never can do it? Is he a man that would shrink from such a responsibility? If he is, he is not fit to be President of the United States.

But, it is said the President cannot make the surveys and preliminary examinations required. We do not suppose he will. He must have confidence in others, as we must have; the committee said, whatever may be the magnitude and responsibility of the trust, we must put confidence somewhere. The President is a unit. He can decide it. Nobody can gainsay his decision if we vest him with the authority. Congress will not and cannot agree upon the selection of a terminus in a boundary of more than a thousand miles, reaching from the mouth of the Rio Grande to Lake Michigan. There is a conflict of local interests at every step—therefore we cannot agree. The President can determine it. We must trust some one. We think we can trust him; and there is more safety in trusting a man of his position than a military board, or a scientific board, or a Secretary of War, or anybody else. The placing of the power in the hands of the President, therefore, was a necessity; and it is a necessity, if we want the road. You can never get it otherwise. I repeat that it is a matter of necessity. If we could decide among ourselves, I would prefer it, as the direct representatives of States and the people, but we never can, as every Senator's experience tells him.

Having decided that we are not to undertake to designate the termini, that Congress cannot do it, and that we think the President is the only proper tribunal that can do it, what was the next question that the chairman of the committee propounded? "How shall this road be built?" And here the Senator from South Carolina again will find his own arguments conflicting, as he says the provisions of this bill conflict, and so will the other Senators who have spoken on his side. How shall we build it? Shall it be done by the Government of the United States, after the proper reconnoissances and surveys? Shall the President not only locate the route, but shall it be built under his direction and control also? Shall the President appoint engineers, superintendents, and agents of every description to furnish supplies, iron, timber, and employ workmen and laborers? The committee thought it wiser to commit the construction and management of the road to private individuals or companies. Senators say we are about to create a corporation, and to give it a monopoly, and an enormous profit; and some Senators, in their places, and others out of them, have said that it will be the most stupendous monopoly that ever was created by this or by any other Government in the world. Why give it to a company? If we must have a road, why not provide that it shall be built by the Government? What do you mean? I appeal to Senators who use that argument—do you mean to say that the Government ought to undertake it? You just now objected to throwing the immense power into the hands of the President to locate this road, and yet you say Government ought to build it, if we must have one. The Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COOPER,] who has had full experience of what his State has done in the construction of roads, and the management of them, says the Government ought to do it. Senators from every quarter can give some experience of the same kind.

I apprehend the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON,] who contends that the construction of the road ought not to be given to a company, thinks that as the government of his State has succeeded in the construction and management of her railroads, the United States Government ought to make this road. We do not know yet how the Georgia experiment will turn out in the end; but everywhere else, excepting Georgia, I think I may undertake to say the experiment has failed. Then I would say to those gentlemen, if you think the Government ought to undertake to build this road, what becomes of your argument, used, I think, by the Senators from Georgia and Pennsylvania, as well as the Senator from South Carolina, against bestowing such enormous patronage upon the President? If the committee had made such a proposition, there would have been a general outcry against it at once; it would not have been unanimous, but I think it would have come from all except those who have the highest and most especial confidence in the Executive of the United States. If we had proposed to give the Executive the appointment of the superintendents, directors, agents, clerks, and what not, of such a line of road, it would have been said that it was an enormous increase of patronage; and it would not have been tolerated in this Chamber for one moment. Yet honorable Senators earnestly oppose the proposition to transfer the building of this road to private individuals or corporations. I would like them to show in whose hands they should deposit this power. Here again the committee thought we must trust somebody; we must have faith in man to some extent; we must have faith in our own institutions; and while we thought it best to trust the President to designate the termini and general route of the road, it would be best to commit the making and management of it to the enterprise, and in part to the capital of private individuals or corporations.

We thought it better to put the road, in the hands of private enterprise, which had a direct interest in it, than in the hands of the Government; better than to vest in the President the enormous patronage which would probably give him a dangerous influence, in addition to the legitimate patronage which he has under the Constitution. We also considered the waste and extravagance which always attends the construction of works of this description by the Federal Government. We thought it best to trust it to individual capitalists or companies, who might voluntarily be willing to take the risks upon the terms presented to them, and then the only patronage that would belong to the President, under the bill, would be the power to locate the road, and to appoint the superintending engineers on the part of the Government to watch the work in its progress. That is the ground on which the committee decided that it would be better to give it to companies, or to individuals, and not to the President. We thought that the patronage in the hands of the President would be too great, and that such a work would probably be carried on with great profligacy or waste, and lead to far greater expense than would be required in the hands of private individuals.

Then another question arose: Was it better to attempt to make the road by a donation of public lands alone? And here again I beg to say that some of the arguments of honorable Senators, like the provisions of this bill, as they allege, are conflicting. I believe no Senators have spoken who do not conflict in their views. We thought that this road could not be built by appropriating public lands; that we could not find private capitalists who would be willing to undertake it with a grant of such a quantity of land as would be likely to receive the sanction of Congress; and we concluded, therefore, that we had better connect with it the loan of a sum of money in addition to such a grant of land as would be sufficient to make it a temptation to capitalists to take the risk of undertaking to build the road, and supply whatever additional amount of capital might be required. The Senator from Georgia says that there is no man of sense—there is no capitalist in the country, or in the world, who would invest in such an enterprise as this. I think I do not misrepresent him. He said, no man would risk, for a moment, a dollar in such a wild experiment as this. The Senator from South Carolina thinks it is one of the most stupendous inventions to profit capitalists that has ever been brought forward. He insinuates, or rather he speaks out—for he does not generally insinuate—that the influence of capitalists was felt in making such a proposition as this. He said that this would not result to the benefit of the public, but the capitalists would get all that could be got out of the lands, and then abandon the project, and leave it on the hands of the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no; I said this: that they would take the fifty millions, or whatever the amount of appropriation may be, and go on as long as it would last, and if that would enable them to make a profitable concern of it, they would go through with the work.

Mr. RUSK. It is provided in the bill that the payment shall be pro rata according to the work done.

Mr. BUTLER. I know that; and they will go on and beg you to give them more money. That I know they will do.

Mr. BELL. The company will make a very great profit, he says, if successful; and if not successful, the experiment will be at the expense of the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. I say so.

Mr. BELL. So the Senator says. And the Senator from Georgia says no man in his senses will invest a cent of money for this purpose, for there is not a sufficient inducement to do it. Now, I repeat my remark of the other day, that if the road is made for fifty miles, it will be so much accomplished, and there is no loss to the Government. And whatever may be the length of the road that is completed, it will give aid to the trains passing to California or Oregon, will carry them so much further on their route, and shorten the distance to be passed over in the present mode. Thus these immense trains will have their journey lessened, and their means of subsistence preserved, and the mails, and Government troops, and military supplies of all kinds, will be cheapened and expedited just in proportion to the extent of the road which may be completed. So that there is no truth in the idea that there will be a failure in this enterprise, although it may turn out true that the road cannot be carried through the mountain passes. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] says they are passable, that there are some fifteen or twenty places where the mountains can be passed. We know they can be overcome by science, by genius, and by money.

Mr. BUTLER. By money.

Mr. BELL. By money—I give the argument in full. If it can be done by money at a cost of twice the estimated cost of the road, I am for doing it. Money, within any reasonable limit, is no consideration in questions like this. It is possible that a state of things may arise which would show that it would be wise to expend $300,000,000 in the construction of this road, if so much were required. I said the other day that $150,000,000 would be well expended for the road, if it could not be built for less. Will any Senator say that $200,000,000 in lands and money, would not be well expended for such a road, if the question should be this sum or no road between the Mississippi valley and the Pacific coast? I do not know what would be the expense of transporting a body of five thousand men across the country to California at the present time. I would like to have the Senator from California, or any other Senator, tell me what it would cost to transport such a body of troops and all their supplies to California, from the valley of the Mississippi. Can the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COOPER] enlighten us on that point, and what it would cost to subsist them for one year by overland supplies?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It costs about twenty dollars to transport a barrel of flour to Santa Fé.

Mr. BELL. I would like to know whether it would be possible to transport five thousand troops, with a train of artillery and other munitions of war, to California or Oregon in one year, from the valley of the Mississippi. Senators may say that we could transport them by sea by the way of Cape Horn, or by the Isthmus of Panama. You can get them there in that way with a sufficient number of transport vessels, if they are not cut off by your enemies lying in the way. But if you were engaged in war, with a powerful maritime nation, how could you do it? I am speaking of such an emergency; and I appeal to honorable Senators who have recently had their attention called to the questions affecting our foreign relations, to consider this question with reference to the condition in which we shall be placed in the event of a collision with any foreign Power. It was in connection with that subject that I said $150,000,000 might be well expended to secure a road to California and Oregon, on which troops might speedily pass to those possessions. What do Senators suppose it would cost to retain those possessions in the event of a war with England or France? I do not know; but I believe in such a case, as we are now situated, it might be a better policy to abandon those countries, and let a foreign yoke be imposed upon them, until we could construct upon the Atlantic coast a sufficient number of vessels of war to be able to meet them successfully upon the ocean. If you were to attempt to hold those possessions at any cost, as probably the country would feel it to be a duty to do, how many millions would it take to do it? That is the idea upon which I set out to show that if this road should cost even $200,000,000, it would be better than not to have the road at all.

Mr. BUTLER. If the honorable Senator will give way, I will move to adjourn, because I see he is now but in the middle of his argument.

Mr. BELL. No, sir. I could finish in a short time, but I do not wish to detain the Senate.

Mr. RUSK. I desire to make an announcement to the Senate. I desire to say simply that I do not wish to crowd other business out of the way by this bill. I am anxious to come to a vote upon it, and I hope the friends of the measure, and those who are opposed to it, will agree to come here on Monday prepared to go through with it, and settle it upon that day.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 17, 1853.

The bill being again under consideration, Mr. BELL continued as follows:

The question, I believe, is upon the amendment of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRODHEAD,] to strike out all of the bill of the Select Committee except the enacting clause, and insert what has just been read. In other words, the proposition is now to commence a reconnoissance and survey for this great enterprise. Of course, if it succeeds, it is fatal to any further legislation at this session of Congress upon the subject of the construction of this road. Now, I want to have the proper issue made between the opponents and the advocates of this great enterprise, as the responsible agents and representatives of the country. The project of the Select Committee has been denominated a stupendous and monstrous one—as one of great extravagance and recklessness. If that be the true character of the measure, there is a very heavy responsibility resting, not only upon the Senate, if they shall enact such a bill as this, but there is a responsibility attaching to each advocate of it; and if it be half so extravagant and monstrous a conception as it has been said to be, I should very speedily, if it presented itself to my mind in that light, wash my hands of it. But there is another responsibility, and it is a responsibility which attaches to honorable Senators for their opposition to a measure so loudly demanded by the country and so necessary for its defence, unless they can show that their objections are well founded. It is not generally safe to get up and make round, wholesale objections to a measure, unless those objections can be sustained by the evidence before Congress and before the country.

The proposition contained in the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania is now, in 1853, to commence the explorations and examinations of the route for this great work, as if, during four years, I may say five years, since this new and last accession to our territory has been made, these examinations had not been going on with more or less assiduity, and more or less success; as if report after report had not been made to Congress, communicating observations and explorations; as if you had not, by your order, printed numerous reports of explorations and reconnoissances, with expensive charts and maps, of a large portion of the country intervening between the Mississippi valley and the Pacific ocean.

I propose to recapitulate very briefly the points of objection to this bill, and the answers that can be made to them. The first objection is, that before the passage of such a bill as that reported by the Select Committee, or any other projects which have been reported, further explorations and surveys should be made and laid before Congress. It is said that we do not even know that the proposed road is practicable, and that it is preposterous to legislate upon a subject in regard to which we have so little knowledge. In reply to that, I have to repeat what I said the other day—that we have the report of six or seven exploring parties, composed of men of science, who have examined as many different routes from between the Mississippi valley westward to the mountains that intervene between that and the Pacific ocean, and crossing those mountains at several different passes. Every square mile of the immense slope from the Sierra Madre and the Rocky Mountains, which are only an extension of the Sierra Madre, to the Mississippi, has been explored and examined—not surveyed by the chain and level, for that is not necessary in this stage of the enterprise; but the whole of the extensive plain, some seven or eight hundred miles from the base of these mountains to the western boundary of the States bordering the west bank of the Mississippi, has been carefully examined.

Then, what surveys and reconnoissances may yet be properly demanded before the President, or any one else who may be authorized to locate the route of this road, shall proceed to the performance of that duty? Merely surveys of the comparative character and fitness of the various depressions or passes in the two distinct mountain ranges that intervene between the Mississippi valley and the Pacific—one called the Sierra Madre, west of the Rio Grande, and merged as you go north in what are ordinarily called the Rocky Mountain range, the other, the Sierra Nevada, still further to the west. There are thus two distinct mountain ranges and formations which constitute the proper range of the only future examinations or surveys required, before the President will be qualified to designate the route of the road. The survey of the different passes in these two mountain ranges, with the information we already possess, will be amply sufficient to enable the proper authority to establish the general route of the road. For example, if the valley of the Nebraska or Platte river shall be regarded as the most desirable route for that part of the road which is to be constructed east of the Sierra Madre or Rocky Mountains, then some more particular examination and survey of the South Pass may be necessary to be made to show what will be the grade and probable cost of a railroad carried over the Rocky Mountains at that point. If the South Pass should be found to present no serious obstacle, either in the elevation to be obercome, and the snows shall be found to be no serious obstruction in winter, then it would become proper to examine whether a road carried through that pass could be extended by a branch road from that point into Oregon, but that, I apprehend, would be found impracticable; but the new surveys and examinations on this route would have to be extended through the Sierra Nevada, to ascertain whether there is any practicable pass in that mountain towards the head of the Sacramento valley. If such a pass can be found, and the snows of winter shall be no impediment, and the South Pass likewise being found in every respect practicable, then I should say that these passes might be properly regarded as indicating a proper route for this great work.

But, if the South Pass should be found practicable only by very heavy grades, or if the snow in winter shall, upon inquiry, be found to be a formidable objection to that pass, then surveys may very properly be ordered, to see whether some other pass on the Sierra Madre may not be discovered between the head-waters of the Arkansas and the Colorado of the West, which may be free from these objections. I am aware that Colonel Frémont and his party were very near perishing, and I believe some of them did perish, in attempting an exploration of this pass, and that there is not much hope to be indulged of its practicability. The next pass on the Sierra Madre, as you proceed south, which will require a more particular examination or survey, is that through which a railroad up the Canadian or Red river would lead. This is the pass already explored by Captain Sitgreaves, passing near Alburquerque, in the valley of the Rio Grande, and proceeding westward to Zuni, and across the great valley of the Colorado of the West. Then there remains the passes on the route recommended by Major Emory, and a part of which was surveyed by the officers belonging to the Commission of Mr. Bartlett, and part by Colonel Graham. We have these three or or four different passes in the Sierra Madre range of mountains to survey, and then all that remains to be done in making preliminary examinations and surveys, will be confined to the passes in the Sierra Nevada range. Walker's Pass has already been pronounced practicable, and some affirm that it is the only one that is so in that large mountain range; but some further and more careful survey may be necessary of that pass. When the surveys of the several points or passes in the two great mountain ranges which intervene between the Mississippi and the Pacific shall be completed, then the President will have all the information, in addition to that which is already supplied in the reports of the several exploring parties before alluded to, which he will require to enable him to designate the termini and general route of the road.

Do Senators mean by examinations and surveys that you must have such surveys as would enable the contractors to commence their work—the work of excavation, embankment, the laying down the substratum, the timbers, &c., for the road? No such survey as that is necessary or even required before the general direction of a road is determined upon and established.

I say, then, that it is not true that we have no sufficient lights upon the subject to justify a legislative enactment providing for the construction of this road. Three of the passes in the Sierra Madre I have mentioned are confidently pronounced practicable by able and skillful engineers, so far as the construction of the road is concerned. One of them, upon further investigation, may not be considered so on account of the snows which accumulate in winter. Walker's Pass, in the Sierra Nevada, is pronounced practicable by the same authority, and there may be yet another found which will be so likewise. How is it, then, that Senators, in the face of all this evidence, persist in arguing that we do not yet know that it is possible to make this road—that any route has been discovered which is practicable? The point which I wish to make is, that the only additional examinations and surveys that we want are such as are necessary to determine which of the several practicable passes known to exist will admit of the easiest grading and the least cost; and when these poinst are settled, all that ought to be required or expected before the road is located will be accomplished, and all such necessary examinations and surveys are provided for in this bill. Provision is made in the bill for the appointment of ten civil engineers, should they be necessary, by the President, in addition to the whole corps of Topographical Engineers, which are placed at his disposal to make these very explorations and surveys.

Another objection to the bill was, that when we shall have all these additional surveys and examinations, Congress ought to make the designation of the termini and general route of the road. I will only repeat, in reply to this objection, what I stated on a former day—that every gentleman of any experience in Congress, must and does know, that upon a line of a thousand miles, from Texas to the lakes on the western frontiers, there are so many points having pretty strong, plausible grounds of preference, so many conflicting and local interests and jealousies will exist, that we need never expect the members of the two Houses of Congress to agree upon the termini—the eastern terminus, at all events, of this great road. It has been suggested to leave it to a scientific board—a board of engineers and geologists—to designate what would be the best route for the public interest, the one which could be constructed with the greatest economy, and would admit of the greatest speed. In the judgment of the committee which framed this bill, the answer to that was, that such a board would have great difficulty in agreeing among themselves; that its members would be liable to the imputation of being influenced by capitalists and their local interests and partialities; and that the public would not have so much confidence in it as they would have in the President of the United States.

Another suggestion is, that if such a scientific board were to report to Congress, which, in its opinion, would be the best route, it would be a safer plan. In regard to that, I repeat that there would probably appear to be so little difference between some two or three of the projected routes, that individual members of Congress would say, "Here is not so great a difference between the several routes examined that I should be called upon to surrender my own private judgment upon the subject, and the interests of my constituents." We all know that the whole interest of the Northwest is in favor of a northern route; the middle States of the West are in favor of some intermediate route; and the most southern and southwestern States must naturally prefer the most southern route. Where is there a route which has so great an ascendency over all others in reference to the great questions of practicability, economy, and speed, and a due regard to the commercial interests, the protection, and defense of the whole country, as to command the assent of a majority of either House of Congress? Such a thing need not be expected.

Gentlemen say, Why should we trust the President in designating the route of this great national work? I answer, because we cannot agree among ourselves. It is said that it is too great a subject to trust to any man, no matter how high in authority. But we can do nothing without putting our trust in man. We trust the President with the great and important duties connected with the execution of the laws and the executive power of Government, and why should we not trust him with this? He has a higher responsibility, and we may, with more confidence, trust him than any one else.

Then, when the question who should designate the termini and general route of the road was settled, another question was: Shall the road be built; shall the work be done by the employees of the Government, or be handed over to individual enterprise? I will not repeat my argument on that subject. As to the patronage and influences which are to grow out of it, the opinion of the committee, and I think it will be the opinion of every sensible member of this body, was, that it would be far more dangerous to give the construction of such a road as this, that may not be completed even in twenty years, for anything we know, to the Executive than to private individuals or companies. The vast number of Government agents and superintendents, and other employees, required in carrying on such a work; the vast amount of money to be disbursed and expended would, in themselves, constitute an amount of patronage equivalent to that of many independent Governments of the earth. By committing the execution of the work to private enterprise, we avoid the wasteful expenditure always attending the construction of public works under Government direction and control, and at the same time escape the corrupting influences of increased patronage in the hands of the Executive.

But we are told that any company of contractors for the construction of such a gigantic work, will have a vast and dangerous influence. In reply to this, I say, that the chief and greatest interest of the private capitalists who may undertake to build this road, according to the provisions of this bill, will be to construct the road in the most perfect and durable manner; and all the influences they can exercise will naturally be employed in having the work completed in the shortest time, and with the greatest economy. It is said that we propose to incorporate the contractors, and all the prejudices usually entertained against corporations and monopolies, and the dangerous influences which they sometimes wield, are appealed to and exaggerated in order to drive members from the support of this measure. But here again the interest of the corporation or company, if any there shall be, will happily, under the checks and limitations provided in this bill, all be concentrated in the successful completion of the road, and the prosperous operation and skillful management of it. Their interest and the interest of the public will be identical. We need have no fear that they will waste the funds granted by the Government, for they will be under bonds to supply all deficiencies out of their own pockets. But if corporations are objectionable, strike out that part of the bill which grants such privileges. Incorporated companies would undoubtedly possess greater advantages and facilities in the prosecution of such an undertaking, than private individuals; but corporate privileges are not essential, and may be dispensed with. The honorable Senator from South Carolina says, that Congress has no power to create a corporation. I suppose he means within the limits of a State. But no such thing is proposed; and whether Congress has that power or not, the friends of the bill do not mean to insist upon it.

The bill contemplates that the States through which the road may run, will grant corporate privileges to the contractors. But limit the exercise of corporate privileges to the territory of the United States, if that be the sentiment of the Senate. But I understand the Senator to question even whether we have the power to incorporate a company in the Territories for the purpose of constructing this road. He argues that if it is the duty of the Government to make this road, and it has the power to do so, it is a trust, and it cannot delegate it to a corporation. Whence, then, have we found it proper—and it has been practiced without objection from the foundation of the Government—to erect territorial governments? They are corporations of the very highest class, and we delegate to them the most important powers that we have—powers of legislation, powers of government. We in some instances govern the people of a territory without representation or a territorial legislature. Our powers are sovereign and plenary in the Territories. But, I repeat, that if an incorporated company is distasteful, strike out the clause which proposes to create one. There are sufficient inducements for private capitalists without any corporate privileges, we trust, to engage in this enterprise.

Another objection made to this bill is, the gigantic scale of the projected enterprise. A grand idea it is. A continent of three thousand miles in extent from east to west, reaching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, is to be connected by a railway! Honorable Senators will remember, that over one thousand miles—one third of this whole expanse of the continent—the work is already accomplished, and that chiefly by private enterprise. I may, as a safe estimate, say, that a thousand miles of said railroad leading from the Atlantic to the West, upon the line of the lakes, and nearly as much upon a line further south, are either completed, or nearly so. We have two thousand miles yet to compass, in the execution of a work which it said has no parallel in the history of the world. No, sir; it has no parallel in the history of the world, ancient or modern, either as to its extent and magnitude, or to its consequences, beneficent and benignant in all its bearings on the interests of all mankind. It is in these aspects, and in the contemplation of these consequences, that it has no parallel in the history of the world—changing the course of the commerce of the world—bringing the West almost in contact, by reversing the ancient line of communication, with the gorgeous East, and all its riches, the stories of which, in our earlier days, we regarded as fabulous; but now, sir, what was held to be merely fictions of the brain in former times, in regard to the riches of Eastern Asia, is almost realized on our own western shores. Sir, these are some of the inducements to the construction of this great road, besides its importance to the military defenses of the country, and its mail communications. Sir, it is a magnificent and splendid project in every aspect in which you can view it. One third of this great railway connection is accomplished; two thirds remain to be. Shall we hesitate to go forward with the work?

Now, with regard to the means provided for the construction of the road. It is said, here is an enormous expenditure of the public money proposed. We propose to give twenty millions of dollars, in the bonds of the Government, bearing five per cent. interest, and fifteen millions of acres of land, supposed to be worth as much more, on the part of the Government. This is said to be enormous, and we are reminded that we ought to look at what the people will say, and how they will feel when they come to the knowledge that twenty millions in money and twenty millions in land have been given for the construction of a railway! Some doubtless there are in this Chamber, who are ready to contend that we had better give these fifteen millions of acres of land to become homesteads for the landless and homeless. What is this twenty millions in money, and how is it to be paid? It is supposed that the road cannot be constructed in less than five years. In that event, bonds of the Government to the amount of four millions of dollars will issue annually. Probably the road will not be built in less than ten years, and that will require an issue of bonds amounting to two millions a year; and possibly the road may not be finished in less than twenty years; which would limit the annual issue of bonds to one million. The interest upon these bonds, at five per cent., will of course have to be paid out of the Treasury, a Treasury in which there is now a surplus of twelve or fourteen millions of dollars. When the road is completed and the whole amount of twenty millions in lands is paid, making the whole sum advanced by the Government forty millions, the annual interest upon them will only be two millions. And what is that? Why, sir, the donations and benevolences, the allowances of claims upon flimsy and untenable grounds, and other extravagant and unnecessary expenditures that are granted by Congress and the Executive Departments, while you have an overflowing Treasury, will amount to the half of that sum annually. The enormous sum of two millions is proposed to be paid out of the Treasury annually, when this great road shall be completed! It is a tremendous undertaking, truly! What a scheme! What extravagance! I understand the cost of the New York and Erie road alone, constructed principally by private enterprise, has been not less than thirty millions—between thirty and thirty-three millions of dollars. That work was constructed by a single State giving aid occasionally to a company, which supplied the balance of the cost. I understand that the road from Baltimore to Wheeling, when it shall have been finished, and its furniture placed upon it, will have cost at least thirty millions. What madness, what extravagance, then, is it for the Government of the United States to undertake to expend forty millions for a road from the Mississippi to the Pacific!

Mr. President, one honorable Senator says the amount is not sufficient to induce a capitalist to invest his money in the enterprise. Others, again, say it is far too much; more than we can afford to give for the construction of the work. Let us see which is right. The Government is to give twenty millions in all out of the Treasury for the road; or we issue bonds, and pay five per cent. interest annually upon them, and twenty millions in lands, which, if regarded as money, amounts to a cost to the Government of two millions per annum.

What are the objects to be accomplished? A daily mail from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific; the free transportation of all troops and munitions of war required for the protection and defense of our possessions on the Pacific; which we could not hold three months in a war either with England or France, without such a road. By building this road we accomplish this further object: This road will be the most effective and powerful check that can be interposed by the Government upon Indian depredations and aggressions upon our frontiers or upon each other; the northern tribes upon the southern, and the southern upon the northern. You cut them in two. You will be constantly in their midst, and cut off their intercommunication and hostile depredations. You will have a line of quasi fortifications, a line of posts and stations, with settlements on each side of the road. Every few miles you will thus have settlements strong enough to defend themselves against inroads of the Indians, and so constituting a wall of separation between the Indian tribes, composed of a white population, with arms in their hands. This object alone would, perhaps, be worth as much as the road will cost; and when I speak of what the road will be worth in this respect, I mean to say, that besides the prevention of savage warfare, the effusion of blood, it will save millions of dollars to the Treasury annually, in the greater economy attained in moving troops and military supplies and preventing hostilities.

I have said that this road, when completed, will cost the Government an annual expenditure of two millions of dollars. I have said that one of the objects secured by this road, will be a daily mail between the Mississippi and California. What do you pay now for the transmission of a semi-monthly mail between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts? About $700,000 annually; and you pay about $750,000 annually for the transmission of your semi-monthly mails to Europe and back, even after deducting all the proceeds you receive from postages. The two together amount to about $1,750,000.

But, to repeat a part of the argument: Honorable Senators may say you propose to give $20,000,000 more in land. Be it so. That is, you grant lands, which will be worth that amount, only because the road passes through them, and which you could in no other way realize that amount out of them. But set down the lands granted to be equivalent to $20,000,000 at this time, and upon which interest will have to be paid out of the Treasury when the road is completed; that will make the whole annual charge against the Government two millions. In return for this, the Government gets a daily mail over the whole extent of the road—all troops and munitions of war transported—a saving in the Quartermaster's Department of the Army alone of at least a million of dollars; and besides these advantages, the commerce of the whole country extended, the whole interior of the continent settled and made productive, peace preserved with the Indian tribes, and the Union cemented and bound together by bands of iron. One further idea in regard to the transmission of the mails is worthy of notice. What would it cost to get a weekly mail by the routes now in use between the Atlantic and the Pacific? I apprehend it would cost as much, or more, annually, as the interest upon the whole $40,000,000 proposed to be given for this railroad, estimating the lands as money. A memorandum has just been handed to me, stating that a contract has been recently made for four hundred and odd thousand dollars to carry the mail from New Orleans to San Francisco, by way of Vera Cruz and Acapulco. That would make the whole charge for carrying a weekly mail from the Atlantic to the Pacific, after making all the deductions from the postages, $1,100,000. At the same rate of charge, a daily mail could not be carried for less than $8,000,000.

I have been thus particular in noting these things because I want to show where or on which side the balance will be found in the adjustment of the responsibility account between the friends and the opponents of this measure—which will have the heaviest account to settle with the country.

For myself, I am not wedded to this particular scheme. Rather than have no road, I would prefer to adopt other projects. I am now advocating one which I supposed would meet the views of a greater number of Senators than any other. I think great honor is due to Mr. Whitney for having originated the scheme, and having obtained the sanction of the Legislatures of seventeen or eighteen States of the Union. Rather than have the project altogether fail, I would be willing to adopt his plan. It may not offer the same advantages for a speedy consummation of the work; but still, we would have a road in prospect, and that would be a great deal. But if gentlemen are to rise here in their places year after year—and this is the fifth year from the time we ought to have undertaken this work—and tell us it is just time to commence a survey, we will never have a road. The honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] says there ought to be some limitation in this idea of progress, when regarded as a spur to great activity and energy, as to what we shall do in our day. He says we have acquired California; we have opened up those rich regions on our western borders, which promise such magnificent results; and he asks, is not that enough for the present generation? Leave it to the next generation to construct a work of such magnitude as this—requiring forty millions of dollars from the Government. Mr. President, I have said that if the condition was a road or no road, I would regard one hundred and fifty millions of dollars as well laid out by the Government for the work; though I have no idea that it will take such an amount. Eighty or one hundred millions of dollars will build the road.

But with regard to what is due from this generation to itself, or what may be left to the next generation, I say it is for the present generation that we want the road. As to our having acquired California, and opened this new world of commerce, and enterprise, and as to what we shall leave to the next generation, I say that, after we of this generation shall have constructed this road, we will, perhaps, not even leave to the next generation the construction of a second one. The present generation, in my opinion, will not pass away until it shall have seen two great lines of railroads in prosperous operation between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and within our own territory, and still leave quite enough to the next generation—the third and fourth great lines of communication between the two extremes of the continent. One, at least, is due to ourselves, and to the present generation; and I hope there are many within the sound of my voice who will live to see it accomplished. We want that new Dorado, the new Ophir of America, to be thrown open and placed within the reach of the whole people. We want the great cost, the delays, as well as the privations and risks of a passage to California, by the malarious Isthmus of Panama, or any other of the routes now in use, to be mitigated, or done away with. There will be some greater equality in the enjoyment and advantages of these new acquisitions upon the Pacific coast when this road shall be constructed. The inexhaustible gold mines, or placers of California, will no longer be accessible only to the more robust, resolute, or desperate part of our population, and who may be already well enough off to pay their passage by sea, or provide an outfit for an overland travel of two and three thousand miles. Enterprising young men all over the country, who can command the pittance of forty or fifty dollars to pay their railroad fare; heads of families who have the misfortune to be poor, but spirit and energy enough to seek comfort and independence by labor, will no longer be restrained by the necessity of separating themselves from their families, but have it in their power, with such small means as they may readily command, in eight or ten days, to find themselves with their whole households transported and set down in the midst of the gold regions of the West, at full liberty to possess and enjoy whatever of the rich harvest spread out before him his industry and energy shall entitle him to. It will be theirs by as good a title as any can boast who have had the means to precede them. We hear much said of late of the justice and policy of providing a homestead, a quarter section of the public land, to every poor and landless family in the country. Make this road, and you enable every poor man in the country to buy a much better homestead, and retain all the pride and spirit of independence. Gentlemen here may say that the region of California, so inviting, and abundant in gold now, will soon be exhausted, and all these bright prospects for the enterprising poor pass away. No, sir, centuries will pass—ages and ages must roll away before those gold-bearing mountains shall all have been excavated—those auriferous sands and alluvial deposits shall give out all their wealth; and even after all these shall have failed, the beds of the rivers will yield a generous return to the toil of the laborer.

But however great the importance of this road, indispensable as it is to the safety and defense of the country in a military point of view; however advantageous to the commerce of the country, and however desirable it may be to the whole population, and especially to the enterprising poor man, I am not encouraged to believe that this measure will receive the sanction of this Congress or of the next. Gentlemen were perfectly right when they suggested that it is very difficult to keep the influence of capitalists out of the consideration of these measures. Capitalists get into our legislative halls, it is suggested. I know of no such influence in the Senate. But capitalists without have an influence. How many and how great are the influences at work against this project, or any other that we could devise for the object? I do not remember to have seen a paragraph in the Washington correspondence of a leading public journal in any one of the large cities, favorable to this bill. The general intelligence conveyed to the country through the leading newspapers, is that it is an impracticable one; that nothing can be done with it; that such and such a project of a different complexion is preferable; and that it is only a waste of time to consider this. This is significant. The honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] chimes in, and says it is only a waste of time, and we can do nothing with it. I know that he is under no improper influences in his course, except that I feel pretty sure that he is against the road in any shape. I am sorry to see an advantage taken of the interest excited by other business and questions before the Senate to defeat this measure. The resolutions in relation to Cuba, Central America, to the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, British Honduras, the Bay Islands, the Tehuantepec grant, and the Texas debt bill, have each and all of them been magnified into subjects of far greater public interest than the construction of a railroad to the Pacific. In the midst of so many more interesting and exciting questions, it is difficult to get Senators to give any attention to such a project as this. The truth is, that this subject has not the advantage of the outside pressure of personal and individual interest and solicitude, as some other measures have. All the influences of this kind are decidedly against it.

What are these outside influences? It is said that some $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 will be required to complete the Panama railroad. I have heard that a much larger amount than that will be vested in that road. There is the large capital said to be vested in the interoceanic ship-canal project on the route of the San Juan and Lake Nicaragua; there is the Tehuantepec railroad project, which enlists the influence of its millions of capital against this road. Although I do not think those interested in these various enterprises ought to look with any jealousy upon the project of a railroad within our own territory between the Mississippi and the Pacific, yet it is in perfect keeping with human nature that they should do so. There are also several lines of splendid and costly steamers employed in carrying the mails and passengers on both sides of the continent, and forming a communication between the ports of the Atlantic and the Pacific. The proprietors of these lines are all likely to feel some jealousy of the railroad project to connect the valley of the Mississippi and the Pacific, and their influence will be thrown into the scale against it. Not content with the profits of the present, nor with those of the ten years to come before this road can be completed, still, such is the timidity and far-reaching calculations of capital, that there can be no project, however far in the future, but excites some distrust and alarm. We thus have the combined influence of all these great interests to contend against.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] says that however important this road may be, it will take twenty years to complete it, and he therefore concludes that the Tehuantepec contract question is more important and a more practical one at this time. I concede a good deal of importance to the Tehuantepec question. We must have the right. It is of great importance that a right of way through the Mexican territory, by the Tehuantepec bay, should be secured to this country; but how does that prove that the road contemplated by this bill should be delayed? If twenty years will be required to complete it, according to his estimate, it is of more importance that it should be commenced at once. I believe it can easily be accomplished in ten years. Four years have already passed since this road should have been commenced.

But there are impediments to the passage of this bill of a different nature from those influences of which I have spoken. There are some gentlemen who are not content with any bill which leaves the eastern terminus of the road unsettled. Some gentlemen of the Northwest want such provisions as will secure the point of terminus at St Louis, or at some point north of that city. We have seen the evidences of this influence in the progress of this discussion. Some gentlemen of the South and Southwest would prefer never to have a road unless it shall have its eastern terminus pointing to their own section of the country. I think they are both wrong. I think the time will come when they will have a road leading from the Southwest to the Pacific, and one from the Northwest, if they do not get it now; and I also think the intermediate position will be occupied in due time. I want one, commence it where you will, northwest, or at the intermediate point looking towards Memphis, or some southern point. Give us one, and you will satisfy me for the present, not doubting that in time all these various sections will be gratified.

The great and the general interest of the country demands that we shall have a road commenced at some point or other; looking forward with confidence to the growth and increased resources of the country as a guarantee that we will have a second road very soon, or at least branches communicating with the main trunk of any one we may now resolve to construct. There can be no doubt that the main trunk will have branches in five years from the time of its construction, looking to all the important points northwest, southwest, and to intermediate points. That is my view of the subject.

On a former occasion, Mr. President, I alluded to the importance of having a communication by railway between the Mississippi river and the Pacific ocean, in the event of war with any great maritime Power. I confess that the debates upon the subject of our foreign relations within the last few weeks, if all that was said had commanded my full assent, would have dissipated very much the force of any argument which I thought might be fairly urged in favor of this road as a necessary work for the protection and security of our possessions on the Pacific coast. We now hear it stated, and reiterated by grave and respectable and intelligent Senators, that there is no reason that any one should apprehend a war with either Great Britain or France. Not now, nor at any time in the future; at all events, unless there shall be a total change in the condition, social, political, and economical, of those Powers, and especially as regards Great Britain. All who have spoken agree that there is no prospect of war. None at all. I agree that I can see nothing in the signs of the times which is indicative of immediate and certain war. Several gentlemen have thrown out the idea that we hold the bond of Great Britain to keep the peace, with ample guarantees and sureties, not only for the present time, but for an indefinite time; and as long as Great Britain stands as an independent monarchy. These sureties and guarantees are said to consist in the discontented and destitute class of her population, of her operatives and laborers, and the indispensable necessity of the cotton crop of the United States in furnishing them with employment and subsistence, without which it is said she would be torn with internal strife.

I could tell gentlemen who argue in that way, that we have another guarantee that Great Britain will not break with the United States for any trivial cause, which they have not thought proper to raise. We may threaten and denounce and bluster as much as we please about British violations of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, and the Mosquito protectorate, about the assumption of territorial dominion over the Belize or British Honduras, and the new colony of the Bay Islands; and Great Britain will negotiate, explain, treat, and transgress, and negotiate again, and resort to any device, before she will go to war with us, as long as she can hope to prolong the advantages to herself of the free-trade policy now established with the United States. It is not only the cotton crop of America which she covets, but it is the rich market for the products of her manufacturing industry, which she finds in the United States; and this has contributed as much as any other cause to improve the condition of her operatives, and impart increased prosperity to her trade and revenue. As long as we think proper to hold to our present commercial regulations, I repeat that it will require very great provocation on our part to force Great Britain into a war with the United States.

One gentleman [Mr. DOUGLAS] has told us that we are in no danger of a war with Great Britain, for another reason. He informs us that she is under bond to keep the peace with us, because she has large territories on this continent, and on our immediate borders, which she would be sure to lose in the event of a war with us. But Great Britain is under a stronger bond to keep the peace with us just now than any I have yet mentioned. As long as Louis Napoleon shall maintain his present imposing attitude in Europe—as long as the French Empire stands, with the strong anti-English feeling known to pervade France—Great Britain will not venture to provoke a war with the United States, nor be over sensitive or pugnacious in resisting our pretensions to exclusive control in America.

The late debates in the Senate of the United States have tended to allay the apprehension which existed in this country that the advent of the new Administration would be distinguished by hostile movements in reference to Cuba. It was feared, and not without some show of reason, that the temper and policy of the new Administration, but more especially of that portion of the Democracy which it was supposed would be apt to control its counsels, were decidedly of the annexation type, and adverse to the prospect of peace. We all know that such apprehensions were felt. The Senators from Virginia [Mr. MASON] and Michigan [Mr. CASS] contributed to allay those apprehensions in a good degree, by the unexpected moderation of the tone, especially of one of those Senators, [Mr. CASS;] and, at a later day, we have the views of other Senators, which may be supposed to furnish a clew to the policy of the incoming Administration on questions connected with our foreign relations and the preservation of peace. That we are to have no difficulty—no war with any foreign Power, growing out of our relations with Spain and Cuba, is strongly supported by the views of several southern Senators, who have avowed not only their opposition to any movement of questionable propriety towards the acquisition of Cuba, but regard its annexation as of questionable advantage to the interests of the South, or of the country generally. One Senator took the ground that the annexation of Cuba would be decidedly injurious to the planting interest of the South, and I can hardly suppose that the North will be disposed to force the annexation of Cuba against the wishes of the South. The argument has also been advanced that it is better for the interests of this country that Cuba should remain in the hands of a foreign Power, especially one that would be likely to be neutral in any war in which the United States may be engaged. We would then have the advantage of neutral ports near our own shores. It has been further contended that one of the inducements to the annexation of Cuba is founded on a mistake. It is confidently stated that the relative position of Cuba, no matter into whose hands it may fall, does not give it the command of the Gulf trade—that it is not the key to the Gulf—but that the Tortugas and Key West are the true keys to that trade. These views in relation to the policy of annexing Cuba to the United States may be well founded. I do not propose to go into these inquiries. My object has been to array the several arguments which have been employed to give the country assurances of continued peace.

Still further to strengthen and confirm the expectations of uninterrupted peace of this country, it has been declared that France, the only other great maritime Power besides Great Britain, has not only no motive to go to war with the United States, but that she dare not, so dependent is she, in the straitened condition of her revenue and finances, upon her foreign commerce, which, it is supposed, would be swept from the ocean in a trice, should she engage in a war with us. We hold, it is said, France as well as England under bonds to keep the peace. I beg to say, with the greatest respect for all the honorable Senators whose views I have alluded to on this subject, that I have not the fullest confidence in their arguments, or the conclusions founded upon them. I fear, sir, that many of them are delusive, and by no means safely to be relied upon by the country.

I beg honorable Senators who have spoken so confidently of the insuperable obstacles to a war against the United States, which they suppose exist in the internal condition of Great Britain, in respect to the destitution and discontents of her population, that at no time within a very long period has the laboring population of Great Britain been in a more prosperous and satisfactory condition. The wages of labor has advanced in every branch of industry, and there is no longer any difficulty in finding employment. Some danger, indeed, has been apprehended that there would before long be a deficiency of labor in the United Kingdom. This great and striking change in the internal condition of Great Britain has been effected principally no doubt by the discovery of the rich and inexhaustible gold mines in California and Australia; by the emigration of her redundant population to the United States, in such unexampled numbers, for many years past, and more recently to California and Australia; by the internal activity of all branches of trade and industry, stimulated as they have been by an easy and abundant money market. Nor has the favorable basis of the trade of Great Britain with the United States been the least of the causes which have contributed to diffuse content and comfort among the masses of her population. Then as to the menacing position and aspect of the French Power, so contiguous to her shores—that is a transcient circumstance—the ground of a panic for a day. The policy of the French Emperor must soon be developed, or his power will pass away. If he dreams of invading England, his design cannot be long disguised, nor the attempt delayed. Doubtless as long as a hostile feeling among the French people is fashionable or prevalent in France, and that great people shall continue to be under the control of an Emperor, Great Britain cannot but feel some uneasiness; but allow me to warn the Senate and the country that with whatever trammels or fetters, real or imaginary, Great Britain is supposed to be bound to keep the peace with the United States, let but her honor be at stake, let but a blow be struck at her present proud and elevated position in the eyes of the world, and she will break those fetters in an instant, and vindicate her position and honor at all hazards. Let the United States, under menace of war, seek to drive her from any of her possessions and fastnesses in America, or take from her her newly-created colony of the Bay Islands under color of the Monroe doctrine, and my word for it, neither the destitute condition of her population, nor the importance to her prosperity of the cotton crop of the United States, nor the apprehension of losing the Canadas, nor the fear of the French Emperor, nor even the loss of the advantages of our market for her manufactures, would deter her from the consequences of a war. Nor could she safely do otherwise than accept the issue of war; for the moment she stoops from the lofty position she now occupies, and succumbs under the menaces of any Power on earth, her own power is dissolved.

I can see, indeed, how an adroit English diplomatist and statesman might manage to save English honor, and seek to advance her interest, by receding from certain pretensions, and even surrendering some solid possessions upon condition of receiving an equivalent, or a concession of interests and privileges on the part of the United States of greater value. I doubt not that Great Britain may be perfectly satisfied to withdraw her pretensions to the Mosquito protectorate—to relinquish her assumption of territorial dominion in the Balize, and even to abandon her Bay Island colonial pretensions, if the United States will concede all that the interest of the British Empire demands in the adjustment of the fisheries question, and of the terms of our commercial intercourse with the British Provinces in America. In this way peace and harmony may be successfully maintained between the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon stock for the present, without dishonorable retreat from past pretensions on either side, should no other cause of quarrel exist or ensue. The only question for the United States would be, whether the supposed equivalent conceded by them was not really of more value than all the fruits of a barren abstraction.

I have said, Mr. President, that the conclusions to which many Senators have come, in regard to the securities we enjoy of perpetual peace, are, in my judgment, delusive. I say, further, that the idea that neither Great Britain nor France would risk a war with the United States, under any circumstance or contingencies which may arise out of questions which have already been agitated in our foreign intercourse, especially with England and Spain, is not only delusive, but if indulged by the people of the United States, would be decidedly mischievous. I must say that the aspect of European affairs and of our international relations at this time, impresses me in a very different manner from what seems to be its effect upon the judgment of others. I do not desire to touch any subject of sectional agitation, or one not agreeable to the Senate; but it is impossible to shut our eyes to the fact, that notwithstanding the profuse professions of amity, of kind and fraternal feeling, by some of the leading public journals of England, and by many of her statesmen—notwithstanding the unqualified terms in which a war with this country is deprecated, and the blessings and advantages of peace commended, there is a growing jealousy and an ill-suppressed hostility to our institutions felt by the whole governing class of Great Britain. The same may be affirmed of all the great Monarchies. These feelings have been in active operation since the events of 1848 to 1852. We have no friends among them. France, isolated as she is, from all the old dynastic Powers, still, with her present political organization, will find employment for her army and navy in America, if she can find no better field in Europe.

We fancy that we hold the bonds of both England and France, with ample securities, to keep the peace with us; and under this delusion we suppose that we may bluster and menace, and assume what doctrines and policy we please in relation to the control of the affairs of this continent, and still involve no risk of war. But let me tell the members of the Senate, and the people of the whole country, if my voice can reach them, that while we indulge the delusion that we hold the bonds of those two great Powers to keep the peace with us, and while we openly boast that they dare not make war upon us; they, on the other hand, more secretly, and therefore more prudently, indulge a similar delusion in regard to bonds which they suppose they hold of ours, and with more ample securities, by which we are bound to keep the peace with them.

This delusion on their part is not founded upon our inconsiderable pretense of a Navy. That could easily be remedied. That is not the idea. Nor is it the defenseless condition of the Atlantic coast, and of our harbors and navy yards, nor the absolute want of any defenses whatever on the Pacific coast, though that would be something to be considered. Some English statesman is said to have stated in Parliament, that Great Britain in possession of the Island of Cuba could, in the event of a war with the United States, cut our commerce in two—as doubtless she could, so far as regards our coastwise trade between the Gulf and Lower Mississippi States and the States on the Atlantic. But Great Britain looks to a more effective mode of warfare than the breaking up of our coastwise trade. If the United States shall attempt to enforce the Monroe doctrine to an offensive extreme—should they go beyond mere menace and bravado, and attempt by force to drive her out of Central America, or in any other way or under any pretext provoke a war, she considers that she holds in her hands a key with which she can unlock an element of war of such potency as to cut the Union in two.

Great Britain supposes that she holds a key with which she can at pleasure unlock an element of public sentiment by which she can stir the blood of her own subjects to such a feeling of hostility to the United States as will reconcile them all to the consequences of interrupted trade and industry, incident to war. I think, sir, that we must be a little blind if we do not already perceive that the initiatory steps have already been taken to prepare the people of England for any future contingency which may possibly give rise to a war between the two countries—however sincere British statesmen may be in desiring that no such a contingency may ever happen. I repeat, that it is impossible that any sagacious American statesman can look on and consider the current of things, not only in England, but on the continent, in reference to American affairs and institutions, and not be impressed with the idea that there is as much of State policy as of sentiment at the bottom. Whence the obstinate persistence of Great Britain? Whence the increased sensibilities of English statesmen to the atrocities of the slave trade? Whence the more than usual tenacity, not only of the two late cabinets, but the present one also, in enforcing the treaty obligation of Spain, in regard to the slave trade? Does any one believe that it is a philanthropic impulse only which prompts Great Britain to menace Spain, and send her dozen ships-of-war to prevent the landing of slaves in Cuba? Or does any one now doubt that it has become a settled point of English policy, since the correspondence of Lord Palmerston and Lord Howden has come to light, that Cuba shall become like Jamaica? that there shall be no slave-grown sugar in the islands? that Cuba, with the abolition of slavery, shall become worthless, and a burden to Spain? and then we know the sequel.

It is for these reasons, in part, Mr. President, that I regard the idea of an exemption from wars in future, either with England or France, delusive. Not, I repeat, that I see any immediate prospect of war; but I would not, in considering the temper of our own people and the present unsettled condition of Europe, and of our relations with Great Britain and Spain, (to say nothing of France,) be surprised if we should be involved in a war at any time.

As for this road, we are told at every turn that it is ridiculous to talk of war in connection with it; for we will have no wars except those with the Indians. Both England and France dare not go to war with us. I say this course of argument is not only unwise and delusive, but if such sentiments take hold on the country, they will be mischievous; they will almost to a certainty lead to a daring and reckless policy on our part; and as each Government labors under a similar delusion as to what the other will not dare to do, what is more probable than that both may get into such a position—the result of a mutual mistake—that war must ensue? It is worth while to reflect upon the difference between the policy of Great Britain and this country in her diplomatic correspondence and debates in Parliament. When we make a threat, Great Britain does not threaten in turn. We hear of no gasconade on her part. If we declare that we have a just right to latitude 54° 40', and will maintain our right at all hazard, she does not bluster, and threaten, and declare what she will do, if we dare to carry out our threat. When we talk about the Musquito king, and the Balize, of the Bay Islands, and declare our determination to drive her from her policy and purposes in regard to them, we do not hear of an angry form of expression from her. We employed very strong language last year in regard to the rights of American fishermen; but the reply of Great Britain scarcely assumed the tone of remonstrance against the intemperate tone of our debates. Her policy upon all such occasions is one of wisdom. Her strong and stern purpose is seldom to be seen in her diplomatic intercourse, or in the debates of her leading statesmen; but if you were about her dock-yards, or in her foundries, or her timber-yards, and her great engine manufactories, and her armories, you would find some bustle and stir. There, all is life and motion.

I have always thought that the proper policy of this country is to make no threats—to make no parade of what we intend to do. Let us put the country in a condition to defend its honor and interests; to maintain them successfully whenever they may be assailed; no matter by what Power, whether by Great Britain, or France, or both combined. Make this road; complete the defenses of the country, of your harbors, and navy-yards; strengthen your Navy—put it upon an efficient footing; appropriate ample means for making experiments to ascertain the best model of ships-of-war, to be driven by steam or any other motive power; the best models of the engines to be employed in them; to inquire whether a large complement of guns, or a few guns of great calibre is the better plan. We may well, upon such questions, take a lesson from England. At a recent period she has been making experiments of this nature, in order to give increased efficiency to her naval establishment. How did she set about it? Her Admiralty Board gave orders for eleven of the most perfect engines that could be built, by eleven of the most skillful and eminent engine-builders in the United Kingdom, without limit as to the cost, or any other limitation, except as to class or size. At the same time orders were issued for the building of thirteen frigates of a medium class, by thirteen of the most skillful ship-builders in the kingdom, in order to ascertain the best models, the best running lines, and the best of every other quality desirable in a war vessel. This is the mode in which Great Britain prepares for any contingencies which may arise. She cannot tell when they may occur, yet she knows that she has no immunity from those chances which, at some time or other, are seen to happen to all nations. In my opinion, the construction of this road from the Mississippi to the Pacific is essential to the protection and safety of this country, in the event of a war with any great maritime Power. It may take ten years to complete it; but every hundred miles of it, which may be finished before the occurrence of war, will be just so much gained—so much added to our ability to maintain our honor in that war. In every view of this question I can take, I am persuaded that we ought at least prepare to commence the work, and do it immediately.

RECIPROCAL TRADE.

SPEECH OF HON. T. J. D. FULLER,

OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 22, 1853,

On the bill establishing Reciprocal Trade with the British North American Colonies upon certain conditions.

Mr. FULLER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Being a member of the Committee on Commerce, which has reported this bill, I take this early occasion to explain my views to the House and my constituents in regard to its provisions. Here I wish to observe, while I profess to be a thorough-going free-trade man in my political principles, I am, at the same time, of the opinion that free trade, in a few specific articles, and with one nation or community alone, may result in the most objectionable system of protection, and operate very injuriously with reference to certain industrial pursuits of portions of the country. Such is my opinion of this bill. As a measure, it has a very important bearing upon the revenues of the Government, and the free-trade policy of the tariff of 1846.

The tariff in 1846 was revised, and its details adjusted upon what was then deemed to be the revenue principle, at the same time affording incidental protection to the great industrial pursuits of the country. If there was any portion of the Union which had greater cause of complaint than another in this adjustment, it was the State which I in part represent. The product of her forests was incidentally protected from foreign competition at the rate of twenty per cent., while the great State of Pennsylvania, in her coal and iron fields, was protected at the rate of thirty per cent.—a difference of one half. This bill proposes, so far as it affects the interest of my State, to strike off all incidental protection on its chief product of labor, and leave it to bear the most onerous burdens of the tariff of 1846.

The planters of Louisiana, the hemp-growers of the West, the iron and coal producers of Pennsylvania, the manufacturers in Massachusetts, are all protected at high rates of duty; but Maine, which consumes the products and manufactures of these great States, and pays for their protection, has kindly tendered to her the admission of lumber free of duty from the adjoining British Provinces, for the especial benefit of those interests and sections she is taxed to protect.

There is a law of the sea which quite appositely illustrates the bearing of this bill on my constituents. It is "the prerogative of the great fish to eat up the little ones;" and in no other light can I view the practical application of this bill in its operation upon my State. I desire to look fairly at all the different interests of this great and varied country. I am disposed to favor any proper measures which will so divide the common burdens of taxation that they may fall equally upon all. In this connection, I wish to invite the attention of the House to a few historical facts. In 1824, and prior thereto, the State of Massachusetts was eminently one of commerce and navigation. That State for a time opposed the protective policy, but her interests changed and she became a manufacturing State, and asked for protection. She obtained it. Under that system, notwithstanding its fluctuations, her manufactures have now obtained a firm foothold, and she now seeks a foreign market on the principle of mutual exchanges. That State, with others at the present time, has large investments in railroads and other means of transportation.

This bill is emphatically, as its friends claim it to be, a measure to promote manufacturing and railroad interests, and its adoption is urged upon the ground of the especial benefits it will confer upon those interests. Now, sir, capital is always quick to scent out its own true interests, and never fails to exercise its full share of influence in the halls of legislation. This bill proposes to establish new rules of trade between the British North American Provinces and the United States, which trade, in the aggregate, the past year, amounted to over $18,000,000. By reference to the report of J. D. Andrews, Esq., communicated to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury at the present session, and to which I wish to pay a deserved compliment for the vast amount of valuable statistical information it affords, exhibiting not only method, but great industry and research, it appears that our gross amount of exports to the British North American Provinces for the last year, was $12,678,279; and the aggregate of imports from those Provinces was $6,218,660. Now, every one knows that under existing laws the industry of the country adapts itself to such laws, and that any material change thereof affects private interests to a very great extent. As an illustration: by our present tariff, gypsum in its crude state is admitted into our ports free of duty; and under my own observation on the frontier of my State, near tide-waters, large investments have been made in mills and machinery for calcining and grinding plaster. This bill proposes to admit plaster manufactured free of duty; the effect of which would be to transfer the process of manufacturing to the quarry, or place of shipment in Nova Scotia, and thereby save the expense of transhipment, and the result will follow of the entire abandonment of the present places of manufacturing, and the loss of the capital invested in the buildings and machinery. How stands it with lumber? It is affirmed by the friends of this measure that lumber is scarce; that our forests are fast disappearing, by reason of the great demand for it, and that it is, at the present time, enormously high in the markets; that lumber must be placed in the free list of articles, for the purpose of cheapening it to the manufacturing districts, which are great consumers of it. Admit it to be so. Are not the woolen shirts, the satinets, the cottons, the boots and shoes, iron, hemp, and cordage, produced in other sections of the country, quite as indispensable to the producers of lumber as is lumber to the producers of these articles? Any measure which partakes of incidental protection, in the shape of duties, to defray the expenses of the Government, should be so adjusted as to bear equally on all, and this is all I contend for. Any system which stops short of this must work unequally, and produce great discontent and dissatisfaction.

Now, what are the facts in relation to lumber? Lumber, in its varied forms of manufacture, is at this time, and for many years will continue to be, an article of export from our country.

By the annual report of commerce and navigation of the past year, it appears that the United States exported to foreign countries over three hundred millions feet of lumber, and of the approximate value of $3,000,000; while for the same period of time we imported only about $800,000 worth, notwithstanding the long-extended line of frontier bordering on the British Provinces. Is there, then, any foundation in the allegation that lumber is becoming scarce in the markets of our own country, while our lumbermen are seeking a foreign market for their surplus? Our merchants export lumber largely to Spain on the Atlantic and Mediterranean, to France on the Atlantic and Mediterranean, and to the West India Islands.

My friend from North Carolina [Mr. ASHE] laid upon my desk this morning a statement of the exports from the port of Wilmington, in his State, one of the items in which statement is seventeen millions feet of lumber exported the past year.

Now, that this free-trade project with the North American British Provinces will operate, and is so intended, beneficially to the manufacturing interests, and to capital invested in railroads, I do not deny. On the other hand, it is just as evident that it will operate to the injury of agricultural producers, and to the producers of the raw material. IT IS A TARIFF MEASURE, and it should be so understood.

I caution the friends of liberal principles and free trade, that they be not ensnared by this seductive proposition to get up a free-trade system in part, without looking into its details and practical effect, to see that in other respects it does not become more protective.

It is well known that repeated attempts have been made in this, and the last Congress, to substitute specific duties for ad valorem ones by the friends of protection, under the specious allegation of preventing frauds on the revenue, while the real object was to obtain higher protection. Failing in this—failing to put a dollar in their pockets, the next resort is (and this is that measure) to save paying out a dollar in the shape of duties on the raw material which they must necessarily consume in the business of manufacturing. Our protective friends have quite suddenly become the advocates of the free-trade policy on such articles as they wish to buy, and desire, no doubt, all the incidental protection they can obtain in the form of duties on what they have to sell. I do not complain of them, for it is an illustration of the maxim, that men are very much inclined to consult their own interest in legislation as well as in other matters.

Maine is a large lumber-producing State. From reliable data, I have ascertained her exports of lumber coast-wise and to foreign countries amount annually to about five hundred million feet. Between that State, as an integral portion of the Union, and the neighboring British Provinces, there can be no interchange of commodities. Why? Because in soil, in climate, in production, they are similar: and so it is in our consumptions. We must travel the same road, carry the same articles, and sell in the same market, and return with the same exchanges.

In this aspect of the case, we shall find ourselves in the same condition with the Provinces, with this exception: for what we buy, we must pay thirty per cent. higher for the protection of the interests of other States, while they can purchase from the open markets of the world thirty per cent. cheaper than we can. Now, if this sacrifice is to be made of the interests of one portion of our people, for the benefit of another portion, it becomes an interesting matter of inquiry, and a very grave question for Congress to determine, how great that sacrifice is to be, and who shall be the victim. For one, I am bound to say that my constituents shall not be made the victims without an effort being made on my part to prevent it.

In this lumber trade, how do these Provinces stand? Great Britain levies a discriminating duty of five dollars per thousand feet on lumber imported from the United States, and about a dollar upon provincial lumber.

This is prohibitory of the export of lumber to the British markets. The Provinces export to the mother country about four million dollars' worth per year; and not content with this exclusive market, they desire an equal participation in our own markets, for the reason, that the difference of freight on so cumbrous an article of merchandise, is nearly equal to a third of its value. Even with the condition contained in the bill, that Great Britain shall receive our lumber at the same or no higher rate of duty than we may admit provincial lumber, no adequate consideration is furnished for the free exchange—for the simple reason that a distant market is not an equivalent for a near one.

I deny that lumber is now too high, or that it pays more than remunerating compensation. For a period of ten years prior to the last two years, it did not pay for the expense of manufacturing; and no man who did not own mills and timber land, and who was embarked in the business, escaped bankruptcy. To this cause is the fact owing that so many of the failed lumbermen of my State are now engaged in opening and working the pine forests of the northwestern States.

There is an abundant supply of lumber in the eastern States fully adequate to the demands of our own market. My colleague from the Penobscot district, and myself, represent a tract of territory approximating to twenty thousand square miles, being two thirds of the area of the whole State, and a very large portion of that territory is now green land covered with various descriptions of timber.

But what other equivalents do the friends of this measure propose, as an offset for the losses I have shown that we must sustain in this trade, of selling out the interests of Maine? It is the free navigation of the St. Lawrence. Now, of what value will that be to us? And how much shall we use it after we purchase the right? If I can show that the Provinces themselves will use it less and less, by reason of other preferable modes of transit being created, then I suppose, by parity of reason and interest, it will be of less comparative value to us. What I am about to say of the St. Lawrence is, in a measure, applicable to the Mississippi river.

The time was when the right to navigate those great inland arteries was considered indispensable, they being the only outlets for the productions of the countries which they drain. But the power of steam is substituting new and more direct outlets, for the circuitous ones through the Gulf of the St. Lawrence and around the Florida keys.

The same policy which is now tapping by railroads the great valley of the Mississippi at different points, and terminating on the Atlantic coast, and building up cities, is now beginning to divert the trade of the Canadas from the mouth of the St. Lawrence to the Atlantic cities. The Portland and Montreal railroad, the three roads leading through Vermont, and the Ogdensburg road, are all inviting the exports and imports of Canada over their tracks, rather than to have them seek the dangerous and difficult navigation of the St. Lawrence, inaccessible a very considerable portion of the year.

Our own Government has very wisely secured, by legal enactments, the privilege of the through transit of Canadian imports and exports over these roads, and that privilege is now extensively used.

It is further said, if this bill does not become a law, the Canadian Government will prohibit the use of their canals to our citizens, as a retaliatory measure. Well, sir, if they should see fit to adopt that policy, I would, as a Yankee, smile at their folly, and increase the facilities for their use of our roads by reduced tolls, and thereby secure more freight for the roads. What further are we to receive as equivalent? It is answered, the free navigation of the river St. John. Maine once bought and paid for that privilege. The only consideration of any value connected with this proposition, is the abolition of the provincial export duty on lumber the growth of Maine. All the lumber the growth of Maine, and which is manufactured in the Province of New Brunswick, may be admitted free of duty, at any time, if we choose to have it so by our laws; and in my judgment, it should be so. The reason is this: all the streams which feed the St. John, flowing from Maine, as they unite with the St. John, have dangerous falls near their junctions, so that the timber can only be floated down in the round log, and necessarily must be manufactured at the place of shipment—the city of St. John. A duty on this lumber, if brought into the United States, is a tax on our own citizens, for the privilege of using in the only practicable way the waters of the St. John, for which right Maine reluctantly consented to part with a large portion of her territory as an equivalent.

But there is another consideration which I wish to present. The lumber trade, which is an immense interest throughout the United States, scarcely inferior to the coal and iron trade, enters into all conditions of life. I have spoken of the quantity of lumber Maine exports. In that estimate I included long lumber only. There are other kinds of lumber—shingles, clap-boards, laths, Hackmatac timber, ship timber, wood, and bark. For this description of lumber, the principal market is the United States, and there is no other, not even the distant British markets. Upon the St. Croix river, where seventy of the five hundred millions before spoken of were manufactured, one hundred and fourteen millions of laths were also manufactured; of which the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore were large consumers. The value of this kind of short lumber, as it is called, is made up wholly of the labor employed in the manufacture, the material being the refuse of other lumber. It furnishes employment for a great many persons, whose families are dependent upon the trade for their support. By including this description of lumber in the free list, most ruinous consequences will follow; for in the production of this kind of lumber, I am free to admit, our people cannot compete with their provincial neighbors. The same is true of wood and hemlock bark.

I next come to consider the fishery difficulty; which question, as I believe, has been designedly thrust into this bill by the friends of reciprocity in both Governments. That it is a question of some difficulty, and quite likely to become one of embarrassment to the Government, I have no doubt; and my constituents, who will be a portion of the sufferers, so long as it remains an open question, have a strong desire to see it satisfactorily adjusted; and to this end are willing to concede something. But they ask and will insist that our Government shall protect them in the free exercise of their just rights; and above all, from petty provincial annoyances, designed to coerce them into a submission to what is manifestly unjust.

My amendment proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause in the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following proposition:

That whenever the British Government shall permit American citizens to enjoy the same rights in catching and curing fish as British subjects now do, or shall hereafter enjoy, then British caught and cured fish may be admitted into the United States free of duty.

This proposition is a fair one, as I will proceed to show. In the deep-sea fisheries, American citizens possess all the rights and privileges which British subjects do; also in a portion of the shore fisheries, but not in all. The extent of the exclusive right in the shore fisheries is a disputed question between the two Governments. Now, yielding to the lower Provinces the value of the right to the exclusive shore fisheries which they claim for it, I propound this interesting question: "What are the fisheries worth to them, or any one else, without a market for their catch?" They are not valued for mere pastime. Where do the Provinces find their chief market for fish? I answer, the United States. The importation of fish from the lower British Provinces the past year was something short of $1,000,000 worth. To show, further, the state of the markets of the world, I have copied and read extracts from the official report of Moses H. Perley, Esq., made to the Governor of New Brunswick, and by him laid before the Provincial Legislature in 1850, on the subject of the sea and river fisheries of that Province:

"FOREIGN MARKETS FOR FISH.—As a knowledge of the markets for fish properly cured, is matter of great importance, the writer has been at some pains to acquire information as to the amount of duties and restrictions in Europe and America, which is here submitted.

"A large proportion of the pickled herrings of Scotland go to Prussia, and the States under the Germanic Union of Customs; this is in consequence of the low duty. In the Germanic Union the duty is 3*s.* sterling per barrel on salted herrings, and 1*s.* per barrel on smoked herrings; the quantity of Scotch herrings sent there annually is 150,000 barrels.

"Austria, an adjoining country, to which there is easy access from Prussia, probably receives some of the British herrings; but the duty there is 4*s.* sterling per barrel, besides a transit duty of 1*s.* 6*d.* per barrel on all herrings passing through Prussia, to Austria or Poland. In consequence of these duties, British herrings, instead of becoming a staple export to Austria, as they ought to be, to the Catholic population of that large empire, are reserved as objects of luxury to the higher classes. The loss of a direct trade with Austria deprives the British merchant of a rich market, which would carry off many thousand barrels of herrings.

"Russia is another country to which a large export of herrings might be made, but a heavy ad valorem duty is assessed upon them, the value being calculated from the first imports of the season, which brings an extravagant price. In Russia, also, fish are exposed to the injurious practice of bracking, which consists in opening the barrels, and removing the contents to inspect them.

"In France, the duties on the importation of fish are as follows: Foreign fish by French vessels, per 100 killograms, 40 francs, or £1 12*s.* 6*d.* sterling; if imported in foreign vessels, or by land, 44 francs, or £1 15*s.* 2*d.* sterling. These high duties entirely exclude British fish from the French market.

"In Holland, the importation of all kinds of salt fish are prohibited.

"In Belgium, the duties on British fish of every kind vary with the season at which the importation takes place, as also whether imported in a British or foreign vessel; but all the duties are so high as to exclude herrings and dried fish.

"No British fish have been sent to Sweden or Denmark; the reason for this is not ascertained, but the extensive fisheries of Norway preclude the hope of a market in that quarter.

"Smoked herrings are sent from Scotland to Geneva, Leghorn, Naples, Sicily, Venice, and Trieste. In Naples and Sicily, the duty is estimated at 10*s.* per barrel, which added to the freight, renders the article a luxury, and keeps it from the greater part of the population.

"Imports of British fish, on a small scale, are received in Sardinia, Tuscany, the Roman States, Greece, and the Ottoman Empire, with all of which a trade of some extent might be established but for the uniform system of high duties kept up in each.

"One or two vessels are cleared annually at St. Johns, Newfoundland, with dried fish for the Ionian Islands, and for Egypt; but of the value of the trade in those quarters no exact information has been obtained.

"In Portugal, the duty on cured fish is fixed at 1,600 reis, or about 9*s.* sterling per quintal. The object of this high duty was to protect a fishing company whose operations have failed, and it is now urged that Portugal ought to relax this duty, and allow the admission of British fish on terms in accordance with the reciprocal good relations which subsist between Portugal and Great Britain as to other articles of general commerce.

"In Spain, foreign fish of all kinds, fresh, salted, or dried, except codfish and stockfish, are prohibited. If these are imported in the vessels of Spain, a duty of thirty per cent. is charged; if in foreign vessels, the duty is forty per cent., and this difference gives the carrying-trade to the Spanish vessels. Great numbers of Spanish vessels resort annually to Newfoundland for cargoes of dry fish, and some of these vessels have also visited Halifax for the same purpose. But none of the vessels of Spain have yet visited the ports of New Brunswick, although the fish caught near its shores are equally as good as those of Newfoundland or Nova Scotia—their cure is so bad that they are altogether unfit for the market of Spain.

"With the Spanish islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, an extensive trade might be carried on in fish in return for tropical products if the fish of New Brunswick were properly cured and dried to stand the climate and give satisfaction to the consumers. The writer has procured, from Washington, translations of the several tariffs of duties levied on fish, in Cuba and Porto Rico, from which it appears there are four separate rates. The lowest rate is on Spanish fish imported direct in a Spanish vessel; the next, on foreign fish imported from Spain in a Spanish vessel; the third rate is on fish imported direct from foreign countries in a Spanish vessel; and the fourth and highest rate, is on foreign fish imported in a foreign vessel. Under the last of these rates, pickled herrings are subject to a duty of thirty-three and a half per cent., the value being established at an uniform rate of $4 50 per barrel; the amount of duty is therefore $1 52 per barrel. Dried fish of all kinds pay a duty of twenty-seven and a half per cent., the value being fixed at $3 50 per quintal of 100 pounds; the duty is therefore ninety-seven cents per 100 pounds. When foreign-caught herrings and dried fish are imported in a Spanish vessel, they pay rates of duty amounting to $1 07 per barrel on herrings, and sixty-nine cents per 100 pounds on dried fish. If vessels load a full cargo of produce at any of the ports of Cuba or Porto Rico, an allowance of one fifth is deducted from the duty on the inward cargo. The tonnage duty on foreign vessels is seventy-seven cents per ton; but if they load with full cargoes of molasses, they are free from the tonnage duty.

"Some of the badly-cured fish, mentioned by Mr. Allison, which were shipped to Cuba last season, having been sold there, the following is furnished as the account of sales, dated Matanzas, November 26, 1850:

Sales.

Fifty drums fish, weighing 22,005 pounds, sold at $2 75	$605 01

Charges.

Note of duties	$2 01
Duties on 22,200 pounds, at $3 50	217 05
Balanza—one per cent. on duty	2 01
Freight per bill of lading	58 02½
Labor, weighing, and delivering	10 00
Commission, five per cent. on $605 01	50 02
	$320 03½
Net proceeds	$284 05½

"In Brazil, the duty on dried cod is 2,500 reis the quintal of 100 pounds; on other fish, the duty is twenty-five per cent. on their valuation. At Pernambuco, on the 21st of October, 1850, the price of dried cod was 10 milreas—2000 reis the 100 pounds. The exchange was then at 28½ pence sterling the milrea; consequently the price of dried cod was equal to £1 4*s.* 11*d.* sterling per 100 pounds, and the duty 5*s.* 11*d.* on the same. The milrea is an imaginary currency, the value of which is governed by the exchange on London, and fluctuates accordingly.

"In the United States, all fish pay a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem, under the tariff of 1846. Besides the markets for fish in the sea-board cities of the Union, there is a large and growing demand for fish in those States which border on the great lakes, and which may be supplied through Canada by the St. Lawrence. There would seem to be an almost unlimited demand for pickled herrings, as well in those States as in Canada West, if caught in proper season and well cured; when sufficient care in these respects is taken, the rapidly-increasing population of the vast fertile districts of the West, near the great lakes, whether Canadian or American, will long continue to offer a sure and profitable market for the products of the fisheries."

Now, in this same connection, I wish to show further, the quantities of fish imported under the tariff of 1842, when the duty was specific, and amounting to about one dollar per quintal; also, the increased quantity imported under the tariff of 1846 for the same length of time, the duty being only twenty per cent. ad valorem, and from this increase of importation show how much greater the importation will still be, if all duties are removed. Then I say, for the purpose of preventing all future difficulty and dispute, upon a question which ever will be a prolific source of discord and neighborly irritation, I propose the establishment of the principle of free fishing and free markets for fish. It may be regarded as hard by the fishermen, but it will be better for them than the present state of things.

If, however, our provincial neighbors shall decline, or the home Government shall refuse to adjust this vexed question on such a basis, and the Provinces shall continue their annoyances upon our fishermen, another alternative may be presented for their consideration, to wit: the imposition of a duty on fish which shall be prohibitory of importation in its operation, as is the duty imposed by France.

The following table shows the operation of high and low duties on the importation of salted fish in barrels. I have not had time to prepare a table of all descriptions of fish imported in the same period:

Under tariff of 1842.

1843	12,334
1844	43,542
1845	30,506
1846	21,402
	133,452
Average number of barrels per year	26,490

Under tariff of 1846.

1847	31,113
1848	122,594
1849	158,508
1850	108,300
1851	145,368
	546,683
Average number of barrels per year	109,116

I have a word to say in relation to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN.] His proposition is, to open our coast-wise trade to the competition of the world. I am not disappointed in this proposition. I expected it. When the protectionists of New England and other States ask for the free admission of raw materials, why should not the southern States ask to have the coast-wise carrying-trade thrown open to the world? Shall we repeal our navigation laws whether the European nations shall permit our vessels to engage in their coast-wise trade or not? Should we throw open our valuable California carrying-trade to the competition of the world? In our foreign trade I have no fear of competition.

Now, sir, representing as I do particular interests, I wish to ask if our people, who are scattered through our forests, felling our trees, to be floated down the streams upon the melting of the winter snows, without knowledge or suspicion of this measure, are to have this law sprung upon them, the effect of which will be most unjust and injurious?

I do not refer to this for sectional purposes, but it is proper and legitimate that I should say, that while we are legislating for all interests, we should so legislate as not to destroy and break down any particular interest; and especially that of a people who have to struggle along under the disadvantages of a rigorous soil and climate.

Let me say that if you value your mercantile marine—if you consider your commerce as the right hand of your strength, and as a means to promote your growth and prosperity, break us not down, and paralyze not the energies of those who, from necessity, are driven into a seafaring life, but rather build us up and sustain us. Let me say, and appeal to the history of the world for the truth of the assertion, that where men find a warm sun over their heads, and a rich productive soil under their feet, they will not venture upon an ocean life, and expose themselves to the perils of the sea. Who were the men who first explored our continent? Men, sir, from the high and cold latitudes of the north of Europe. They visited our coasts in vessels far inferior to those of the present day. It has ever been found necessary, and ever will be, to look to the North, where men are always compelled to struggle with the elements, for your effective mercantile marine.

And further: While some of our western friends think the bounties paid to these fishermen are unjust, I say that the moment you strike down these bounties, and turn off these men, you give yourself a wound that years cannot heal. You may cultivate the valley of the Mississippi, but you cannot build ships and make sailors.

Mr. JONES, of Pennsylvania. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he wishes the duty on lumber to remain as it is, solely for the purpose of revenue; or does he wish the incidental benefits which may arise out of it, as an incidental protection to the lumber trade?

Mr. FULLER. My answer is, take off duties on everything and we are content; but if you put the duties on, put them on equally. We do not want to pay thirty per cent. for all the iron we put into our ships, and have lumber made duty free. That would be unjust, as I presume the gentleman will not deny.

Mr. JONES. I agree with the gentleman fully, and I only inquired that I might understand whether I comprehended him correctly.

Mr. FULLER. Under the tariff of 1846, we came off third best with Pennsylvania; she got thirty per cent. on iron, and we got twenty per cent. on fish and lumber.

The great point I make is, THE EQUALITY OF TAXATION. "Equality is equity." If duties are imposed upon iron for revenues, so should duties be imposed upon lumber for the same purpose. One kind of property should bear its proportion of the public burdens as well as another.

EXPLORATION OF THE INTERIOR OF AFRICA.

SPEECH OF HON. J. W. MILLER,

OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE SENATE, March 3, 1853.

On the Exploration of the Interior of Africa, and in favor of recognizing the Independence of Liberia.

The Naval Appropriation bill being under consideration—

Mr. MILLER offered the following amendment:

For equipment, maintenance, and supply of an expedition for the exploration of the interior of Africa eastward of Liberia, and the ascertaining of the resources of that region, and for the colonization of the free blacks of the United States, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, $125,000.

Mr. MILLER said:

The Secretary of the Navy addressed a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Finance recommending this appropriation, with an estimate, and requesting that the appropriation should be made. It has not been acted upon by the committee, and I have thought it my duty to present this amendment for the action of the Senate. The Senate will recollect that the Secretary of the Navy, in his annual report, directed the attention of the President and the country to this subject. I will read a short extract from that report:

"In Commander Lynch, to whom the country is already indebted for important service in another field, I have found a prompt and ardent volunteer for this employment. He is now on his way to the African coast. He will land at Liberia, Cape Palmas, and other points, and will pursue his inquiries as far as the river Gaboon, with a view to the ascertainment of such localities on the margin of the African continent as may present the greatest facilities, whether by the river courses or by inland routes, for penetrating with least hazard to the interior. He will collect information touching the geographical character of the country, its means of affording the necessary supplies of men and provisions, the temper of the inhabitants, whether hostile or friendly, the proper precautions to be observed to secure the health of a party employed, and all other items of knowledge upon which it may be proper hereafter to prepare and combine the forces essential to the success of a complete and useful exploration of the interior. In the performance of this duty, under the most favorable circumstances, he will encounter the perils of a climate famed for its unwholesome influence upon the white man, and may hardly hope to escape the exhibition of hostility from the natives. The spirit which has prompted him to court this perilous adventure, so honorable to his courage and philanthropy, I trust will enable him to brave every hazard with success, to overcome every obstacle in his progress, and to reserve himself for the accomplishment of the great object to which these preparations are directed. In the mean time, I most earnestly commend the subject of the exploration to the early and favorable attention of Congress, with the expression of my own conviction that there is no enterprise of the present day that deserves a higher degree of favor, or that will more honorably signalize the enlightened policy of this Government in the estimation of the present or of future generations. It will require a liberal appropriation of money, and an enlarged discretion to be confided to the Navy Department for the organization and arrangement of a plan of operation which must embrace the employment of a number of men, the supply of boats, armaments and tools, and the enlistment of such scientific aid as a long and laborious inland exploration, beset with many dangers and difficulties, will suggest."

It will be perceived by the Senate that this expedition has two objects in view. The first is the exploration of the interior of Africa, and especially of that portion of western Africa lying directly east of the Republic of Liberia, for the purpose of developing its natural wealth and commercial resources. It is believed by those who have looked at this subject, that there is a large region of country directly eastward from Liberia, of a higher elevation, more productive and healthy than that bordering on the coast. England has paid considerable attention to the exploration of Africa, for the purpose of developing its resources in reference to her own trade with the interior tribes. Our own interests, as well as the calls of humanity and of civilization, demand that we should do something for the improvement of Africa.

The country intended to be explored, lying between the meridians of 20° west and 20° east, (Greenwich,) and the parallels of 5° and 15° north latitude, is an inhabited country, of which we have sufficiently authentic accounts, from actual observation by white men and reliable reports of natives, to warrant our belief that there live upon it many millions of people, who need, and are desirous to receive the products of the agriculture and manufactures of more civilized nations. Towards that country adventurous explorers have made essays from the English possessions on the west; from the mouth of the Niger in the south, and also from the Mediterranean. The British are now endeavoring to trade with it from Sierra Leone, and from the Gold Coast. Between these two localities lies the Republic of Liberia, offering the only means of access which can be securely open to the activity of the United States. Hence the question of exploration opens the question whether or not the United States shall have a proper share of the great inland traffic of Africa.

The second object is one which I consider of a character eminently national. It is for the purpose of aiding in the colonization of free persons of color from the United States into Africa. The present position of these people in the United States makes it necessary that we should do something for their relief. Several of the free States of this Union have passed laws excluding this unfortunate class of men from their limits. The only way of relief open to them is a more rapid emigration from this country to Africa. To promote and encourage this, is one of the objects of this expedition.

Recent discoveries, aided by modern improvements, are producing strange and astonishing changes in the condition and affairs of the world. Under these operations the hitherto abandoned and despised portions of the world are becoming the most attractive, and the waste places of the earth the most productive. Wealth is escaping from its old investments, and population is flying from its crowded homes to wild and distant countries, in search of higher profits and more prosperous business. Lands hitherto rejected for their sterility, and countries despised for their barbarism, are now sought for with avidity on account of the richness of their natural productions and their fitness for the abode of civilized man.

The convict's land Australia, and the Indian's hunting ground in the Pacific, now command the respect of the civilized world, and by the abundance of their golden treasures, regulate the exchanges of London and New York, and give tone and character to the commerce of the world.

Let no man hereafter condemn any portion of God's earth as hopeless and useless.

Africa, doomed and despised as she has been, by the opinion of the world, is in no less forlorn condition than were Australia and California ten years ago. It needs but exploration and development to bring forth her natural wealth for the use of man. But I have not time now to go into this subject at large. I believe that Africa is about to open one of the richest fields of commerce in the world. It needs only exploration and development, to make it one of the most attractive and profitable regions. I therefore think that this expedition will be of more service to the country and the world than any of the recent expeditions projected by this Government.

Mr. President, a few days since I presented to the Senate a resolution of inquiry relative to the acknowledgment of the independence of the Republic of Liberia. I sought on several occasions to bring that resolution before the Senate for consideration, in order that I might give to the country the reason which induced me to offer it; but the time of the Senate has been so occupied that no opportunity was afforded me to do so. As the subject now under consideration is german to that question, I will take this occasion to give to the country the reasons why I think the Government of the United States should acknowledge the independence of Liberia.

I was induced to offer that resolution in consideration of the notorious fact that Liberia has existed as an independent Republic for five years, without any official recognition by our Government, while England, France, Prussia, and Brazil have acknowledged her nationality, and received her into the family of nations.

This silence on our part to notice the first and only free Government upon the Continent of Africa, is the more remarkable when we consider the origin and history of that Republic.

Liberia is of American origin, nurtured and protected through all the trials and dangers of colonial life up to her present national existence by the benevolence and enterprise of our citizens. Associated with the names, and sustained by the influences of the greatest statesmen and the purest philanthropists of America, her humble history connects itself with our own, and forms one of the most interesting chapters in our national annals.

On the 24th of December, 1816, a meeting was held in this Capitol for the purpose of adopting measures to assist in the formation and execution of a plan for the colonization of the free people of color, with their consent, in Africa. This meeting, though small in numbers, was great in the moral, intellectual, and political characters of the men who composed it. Henry Clay presided over its deliberations, and John Randolph and other distinguished public men of that day took part in the discussions which led to the unanimous adoption of the following preamble and resolutions:

"The situation of the free people of color in the United States has been the subject of anxious solicitude with many of our most distinguished citizens, from the first existence of our country as an independent nation; but the great difficulty and embarrassment attending the establishment of an infant nation, when first struggling into existence, and the subsequent convulsions of Europe, have hitherto prevented any great national effort to provide a remedy for the evils existing or apprehended. The present period seems peculiarly auspicious to invite attention to this important subject, and gives a well-grounded hope of success. The nations of Europe are hushed into peace; unexampled efforts are making in various parts of the world to diffuse knowledge, civilization, and the benign influence of the Christian religion. The rights of man are becoming daily better understood; the legitimate objects of government, as founded for the benefit and intended for the happiness of men, are more generally acknowledged, and an ardent zeal for the happiness of the human race is kindled in almost every heart. Desirous of aiding in the great cause of philanthropy, and of promoting the prosperity and happiness of our country, it is recommended by this meeting to form an association or society for the purpose of giving aid and assisting in the colonization of the free people of color in the United States; therefore,

"Resolved, That an association or society be formed for the purpose of collecting information, and to assist in the formation and execution of a plan for the colonization of the free people of color, with their consent, in Africa, or elsewhere, as may be thought most advisable by the constituted authorities of the country.

Four days after, at an adjourned meeting, the first constitution of the American Colonization Society was adopted, and on New Year's day, 1817, the following officers of the society were elected:

President: Bushrod Washington. Vice Presidents: William H. Crawford of Georgia; Henry Clay of Kentucky; William Philips of Massachusetts; Henry Rutgers of New York; John E. Howard, Samuel Smith, John C. Herbert, of Maryland; John Taylor of Caroline, of Virginia; Andrew Jackson of Tennessee; Robert Ralston, Richard Rush, of Pennsylvania; John Mason of the District of Columbia, and Rev. Robert Findley of New Jersey.

Immediately after the organization of the society, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That the President and Board of Managers be, and they are hereby, instructed and required to present a memorial to Congress on the subject of colonizing, with their consent, the free people of color of the United States, in Africa or elsewhere."

The memorial here referred to, was signed by Bushrod Washington, President of the society, and was on the 14th of January, 1817, presented to Congress. I will read two extracts from this memorial, in order to show to the Senate that the great men who originated the plan of African colonization were influenced by high national considerations, and that the final and grand object of their patriotic enterprise was the establishment of free national government in Africa; the successful result of which, after forty years of labor, my resolution was intended to acknowledge and proclaim to the world.

The memorial says:

"Your memorialists are delegated by a numerous and highly-respectable association of their fellow-citizens, recently organized at the seat of Government, to solicit Congress to aid with its power; the patronage, and the resources of the country, the great and beneficial object of their institution—an object deemed worthy of the earnest attention, and of the strenuous and persevering exertions, as well of every patriot, in whatever condition of life, as of every enlightened, philanthropic, and practical statesman." * *

"Your memorialists beg leave, with all deference, to suggest that the fairest and most inviting opportunities are now presented to the General Government for repairing a great evil in our social and political institutions, and at the same time for elevating, from a low and hopeless condition, a numerous and rapidly-increasing race of men, who want nothing but a proper theater to enter upon the pursuit of happiness and independence, in the ordinary paths which a benign Providence has left open to the human race. Those great ends, it is conceived, may be accomplished by making adequate provision for planting in some salubrious and fertile region, a colony to be composed of such of the above description of persons as may choose to emigrate; and for extending to it the authority and protection of the United States, until it shall have attained sufficient strength and consistency to be left in a state of independence."

In the month of February, 1820, the ship Elizabeth sailed from the United States with eighty-six passengers; they were free people of color, voluntarily emigrating from this country to the western coast of Africa, to make a permanent settlement there. The good ship carried them safely to their destination. From this small plantation of legally-manumitted slaves there has grown up in the course of thirty years, a nation containing, of emigrants and natives, two hundred thousand inhabitants, governed by a republican form of government, with a written constitution like our own, and exercising an undisputed dominion over seven hundred miles of sea-coast, with an extent of inland territory yet undefined, and commanding by its position the trade and commerce of western Africa.

The establishment of the Republic of Liberia is one of the most remarkable events in this most eventful age. History furnishes no parallel either as to its origin, the motives which induced it, or the means used to bring about the grand result. It commenced a private enterprise, not of gain, but of benevolence. The inducing cause was humanity. The means used, Christian charity. Its great objects, the relief of two continents from the evils of slavery and barbarism. Its grand result, civil and religious liberty to a whole race of men. But what is still more remarkable, all these great objects have been accomplished, legally, justly, and peacefully; without aggression or wrong; interfering with no man's rights, intervening upon no nation's prerogatives, and by its quiet and lawful progress exciting neither the passions nor the prejudices of any, Liberia is the first Republic ever established without revolution, war, or bloodshed.

The patrons of African colonization were neither fanatics nor agitators. They occupied an unappropriated field of usefulness, and nobly have they cultivated it. The objects of their beneficence were outcasts from Government and country. They took up the slave after law and Constitution and master had released their obligations over him. They found him outside of social and political relations, isolated, degraded, and forsaken. They pursued him when the law was a fugitive from the slave, and not he a fugitive from the law; and when neither master nor State nor Government would own him or protect him. This beneficent enterprise took the outlaw under its guardian care, and has given to him a name, a character, and a country.

During the time this great work was in progress, it received the aid and approbation of the wise and good men from all sections of the country. President Monroe was one of its earliest and warmest friends; and there is a "Monroe doctrine" as to colonization in Africa, as well as to colonization in America, equally orthodox, although not quite so popular. It also received some collateral aid from the Government itself. So national was the object, so catholic was the feeling in favor of its success, that even the strictest constructionist expressed the regret that there was not a clear power in the Constitution to enable the Government to adopt the enterprise as its own, and to extend to it national aid and protection. It is perhaps well that the Government did not interfere, for the work has been done without the exercise of any doubtful powers. That which politicians hesitated to do; that which our Constitution with all its liberty had not the power to accomplish; that which armies and navies could not force into existence, has been peacefully accomplished by private enterprise, instigated and supported by Christian charity. And now, sir, the work being done, and the grand result made manifest to the world, the question is whether we shall acknowledge the event and stamp it with the official approbation of the nation. In my opinion both national honor and national policy demand that we should do so. No one can doubt our power, and the question is one of expediency merely. Is it expedient for the United States now to acknowledge the nationality of Liberia?

In treating this question, I intend to confine myself mainly to a commercial view of the subject.

For some years past the European commercial nations have, with a view to settlement and trade, turned their attention to Africa. For these objects, England has established, and now maintains with much energy, her colonies at Sierra Leone, upon the Cape, and at other points on the coast. France also has her possessions at Algeria. No one, I think, can at this day mistake the policy of England with regard to unappropriated fields of commerce. We have a most striking illustration of this in that mighty political and commercial dominion which she has secured in the East Indies, and in her attempts upon South and Central America. No country is too remote, no island too distant, for her ships. No tribe nor class too savage or insignificant for her barter. Bushmen and Hottentots, negroes and Mosquito Indians, are all objects of her commercial attention. Wherever human beings are found, requiring food and raiment, and have something to give in exchange for them, England is ready to administer to their wants. To such a policy Africa opens up a rich and wide field of operation, and if I mistake not the signs of the times, she is preparing to improve the opportunity afforded her by our neglect of Liberia.

It is quite evident, that whatever the foreign commerce of western Africa may be, the Republic of Liberia will control it. Her position on the coast will give to her that advantage. I have no certain data for ascertaining the present amount of that commerce. I am, however, informed that the trade of England with the western coast of Africa exceeds $5,000,000 annually; but whatever may be the present amount, it forms no criterion of its future developments. Up to 1847, the year of Liberia's independence, it was a mere struggle for existence, without the power or the means to protect or regulate commerce; and without ships, without any of the facilities of trade, the colony of Liberia could do but little towards developing either her domestic or foreign commerce. But these hindrances have now been overcome by the establishment of national government. She has now the power to form international relations, under the directions of which the productions of that vast region of country will find their way through the regular channels of foreign trade to the markets of the world.

This new field of commercial enterprise will attract the observation of other nations; and if we continue to look on with indifference, the Republic of Liberia, by our neglect or timidity, may become in fact, if not in name, a commercial colony of England. And thus, sir, it will turn out that that rich commercial harvest, the seeds of which we sowed, will be reaped by another, and the first fruits of the tree which we planted will be plucked by our rival.

Liberia acknowledges with gratitude our superior claim over all other nations, to any advantages in trade which she can legally confer upon foreign Powers, and we may now secure by free concession, a commercial dominion over western Africa which, in my opinion, will in the course of twenty years be tenfold more valuable than that we shall acquire by force over other portions of the world. But to secure these advantages we must put ourselves in a position to obtain them. To do this we must form commercial relations with Liberia; and to this end the first step is to acknowledge the nationality of the Government which has the power to control the subject.

England has seized the first opportunity to form these relations. And why has she done so? Not that she has any peculiar regard for this young Republic, or for her free institutions, but simply because she sees in that infant Government, weak and feeble as it is, the germ of national power which will hereafter direct and control a vast region of commercial dominion.

If we refuse or neglect to acknowledge the national existence of Liberia, we can have nothing to say against the partiality of any treaty she may form with those nations who may recognize her nationality. And if England or France should to-day obtain for any of their subjects, the exclusive right to trade in palm oil, or the privilege of introducing their manufactures free of duty into Western Africa, we could not justly complain, for by our cold neglect we shall be presumed not to know that there is such a country as Liberia, or if we did know of its existence, we deemed her not worthy of our international intercourse.

But, sir, I desire to present a higher view of this subject than that derived from the mere lucre of trade. There is a mighty moral power in commerce, the power of civilization and humanity.

The early foreign commerce of a half-civilized country frequently gives tone and character to its inhabitants, which are seen and felt during many years of their future progress. It not unfrequently impresses a deep influence upon the very soil itself. Africa is a striking example of this result. For many years her only foreign commerce was the slave trade—the exchange of her children for the things of other countries. The result of this unnatural intercouse, was to bring upon that benighted region a twofold curse—additional brutality to its inhabitants, and an increased sterility upon its soil. Thus it was, that commerce, deprived of its moral power, impressed upon both people and land a curse so deep, that it will require centuries to eradicate the evil. We have other examples of the effects of illicit commerce in the opium trade of the East, in the early slave trade of Spanish America, and in our own whisky dealings with the northern tribes of Indians.

But a new and happier era has opened upon Africa. The Republic of Liberia has put an end to the slave trade in Western Africa. She has done what the three great Christian Powers of the earth, England, France, and America, could not accomplish. She has done it, not by force, not by fleets and armies, nor yet by premiums and prize money, but simply by working out one of the simple rules of legitimate commerce, so plainly that even the dull mind of the native negro may comprehend it, by teaching him that the productions of the forests, the fruits of the trees, and the vegetables of the soil, which God has planted all about him, may by the aid of his labor bring to him and to his family more comfort and wealth than all the gains of the unnatural slave trade. And now along a coast of seven hundred miles, where but a few years since the only marts of trade were the slave-pens to which the chiefs dragged their brothers and their children to barter for foreign productions, are to be found safe harbors in which English steamers and American packets may be seen, inviting the natives to bring the vegetable oils, the coffee, and the spices, with all the other rapid and rich productions of that sunny land, and exchange them on equal terms for foreign merchandise. Civilized and Christian commerce has taken the place of the barbarous traffic in human blood. Legal trade has superseded piracy, and the flag of a Republic, and the laws of a constitutional Government, defend, protect, and encourage the honest labor of a free and Christian people.

Thus has legitimate commerce become the efficient instrument for the regeneration of Africa. The Colonization Society has done its work, private charity and Christian benevolence have performed their duty. Through their agency law and liberty, religion and civilization, have been carried into Africa, and there embodied in free national institutions. A new power and influence are now required to sustain and to protect those institutions, so as to enable them to accomplish the final and glorious result for which they were established. That power is national; that influence is commercial. It is our duty, as it will be our interest, to exercise that power and direct that influence. If we will do so, we shall accomplish the two grand results contemplated by the friends of African colonization—the civilization of Africa, and the removal from this country of that anomalous class of men called free people of color. I have already shown the mighty influence of commerce upon the first-named object; I will now endeavor to show its efficiency to accomplish the latter. The negro is a timid creature; he lives and moves more by sight than by faith; he feels in his soul that which the white man boldly avows: that he is an inferior being, and therefore the subject of deception and wrong. Hence it is that so few of the free people of color have been found willing to leave even this land of their degradation, for a better home and country in Africa.

Here, in my opinion, lies the difficulty in the way of a more rapid emigration of these people to Liberia. But, sir, let them know by a public official act of this Government, that the country to which you desire to send them, has a name and a position in the family of nations; that the people and the institutions of that country are respected by the great Powers of the earth; let them understand that you have an interest in their commerce; let them see the ships returning from Africa laden with rich cargoes of merchandise of native production and ownership; let them see the flag of their country waving in your harbors, side by side with the merchant flags of Europe. In a word, give to the free negro ocular demonstration that money may be made in Liberia; that fortunes may be accumulated, and that social and public positions of honor and profit are there at his command, and we shall soon see that even the degraded and suspicious negro is subject to the same laws and influences which govern the white emigrant. The negro is not the only emigrant who is moved by sight more than by faith. All the speeches, reports, and books that were made and published about the wealth and commercial advantages of California, produced but little effect upon our people; they wondered and talked, but they did not believe; and it was not until some adventurer returned from the mines and presented to our sight and touch the shining ingot, and the golden sands fresh from the diggings, that our people were roused to that spirit of emigration which has since sent them in thousands, by sea and by land, to the shores of the Pacific.

So, sir, it will be with emigration to Africa. It will move cautiously and slowly until commerce shall expose to the eye of the world the rich mines of natural wealth which now lie hidden in the dark forests of that neglected continent. When this exposition is made I have no doubt the free negro will have many a white competitor in the race of emigration even to Africa.

In urging this subject upon the consideration of the Senate, I have not been indifferent to the fact that there are difficulties in the way of our forming full international relations with Liberia. They are of a domestic character, applicable alone to this country, and required to be treated with delicacy and prudence. My desire is to keep clear of these difficulties, and I have, therefore, made my resolution one of inquiry, merely leaving it to the Committee on Foreign Relations to decide the proper way and manner of accomplishing the object.

My desire is to obtain a simple recognition of the nationality of Liberia, preparatory to forming commercial relations with that Government, reserving the more delicate question of diplomatic relations to the future action of the Executive under the advice of the Senate. When, under what circumstances, and in what form, this Government will enter into diplomatic relations with Liberia; whether we shall send a representative there or receive one from her here, is not necessarily involved in the acknowledgement of her independence. That question I have no desire to obtrude upon the Senate, and, whenever presented, it should be treated with reference to our peculiar domestic institutions, and disposed of in such manner as would be least offensive to the feelings and habits of the people of this country.

The acknowledgment of independence may be made by Congress, and I have a precedent to show that it is the duty of Congress to take the first step in cases of this kind. I refer to the case of Texas. You will recollect that for some time after the existence of that Government de facto, the President, General Jackson, on account of our friendly relations with Spain, hesitated to form diplomatic relations with Texas. In the mean time Congress took up the subject of the recognition of her independence, and in 1836 passed resolutions in both Houses acknowledging the independence of that young Republic.

But, sir, whatever difficulties the fears of gentlemen may suggest upon this point, I can assure them that Liberia will never obtrude herself officiously upon this Government. She knows too well how much forbearance and prudence were required by her friends here to overcome the prejudices which obstructed her colonial advancement, than to do any act now which might tend to revive opposition. All she asks at our hands, is that we shall not now abandon our own great work of free Government in Africa, by neglecting to express our confidence in its strength, and our faith in its durability.

I have heard it suggested as an objection to the recognition by this Government of the independence of Liberia, that it would reflect upon the legal institutions of domestic slavery as they now exist in some of the States of this Union; that we cannot admit the capability of the African race for self-government, and, at the same time, justify ourselves before the world in holding a portion of that race in bondage. This objection, I admit, must, to a certain extent, be met and answered in determining the present question. I therefore answer in the first place, that the obnoxious fact—the improvability of the African race, has already been established. Liberia is a living witness of its truth, and we, by our refusal to admit its existence, cannot get rid of any of the legitimate results which must flow from that living fact.

Nay more, sir, this experiment, whether for good or for evil to us, is our experiment. We have worked out the problem ourselves, and it is too late now, after the demonstration has been made to the world, for us to shrink from the result.

But, sir, I deny that this successful demonstration in favor of the improvement of the African race can in any manner cast odium upon our domestic institutions, or affect the legal rights of the master over his slave; but, on the contrary, this experiment has given to American institutions of slavery, a moral power and sanction which neither law nor constitution could invest them with. It does so, because it has opened a safe way of deliverance from the evils of slavery, a legal way by which lawful servitude may be safely and legally abolished. It has taken from slavery many of its dark and gloomy features. It has dispelled that hopeless aspect of slavery which clouded the future with fearful forebodings of evil.

The Republic of Liberia is a witness of good and not of evil, to the institution of slavery in the United States. She bears living testimony to the fact, that the African race has been improved, and not debased by servitude in this country. The Government of Liberia could not have been formed out of the native African negro. It was upon the American-born negro, trained and prepared by Christian masters, that the experiment has proved successful. Slavery in America has brought liberty to Africa. Our free institutions, by their beneficent workings, have shown that they are capable of improving the lowest grades of humanity, and of making even our slaves more capable of self-government than many of the subjects of European despotisms.

Sir, I am no apologist for slavery in any of its forms, much less would I seek to excuse the deep wrongs which the Christian world has perpetrated upon Africa; but if forgiveness is to be found for our criminal aggression upon Africa, it must be sought for in the restitution of her children to their fatherland, improved and trained under our domestic institutions for the enjoyment of civil and religious liberty.

If this generation can atone for the sins of the past, that atonement can only be made by offering up a rich national sacrifice upon the altars of liberty and religion now erected in Liberia.

Why should we hesitate to acknowledge this triumph of humanity, or attempt to cover up a result as honorable to us as it will be glorious to the world? Rather let us proclaim, as with a trumpet, in the dull ear of the despotic nations, that the spirit of American liberty will penetrate the deepest despotism, and enlighten the darkest barbarism with a potency sufficient even to regenerate the negro, and to give liberty and civilization to Africa.

Mr. President, absorbed as we have been for the last month with questions of great national import—questions involving the peace and the dominion of the world, and exciting, by their importance, the public mind up to the highest point of national pride and glory, I feel, when surrounded by such influences, that I am striking but a low note of public sentiment in advocating the modest claims of Liberia. I fear that the Senate has even grudged me the short hour which I have consumed in presenting this humble subject to their consideration. Yet, sir, I confess that I have designedly taken this occasion to trespass upon your time; for the purpose of aiding the cause for which I speak. My object is to take advantage of the exuberance of feeling manifested here in favor of human liberty throughout the wide world, and to ask that its surplus, if nothing more, may be given to Africa. She will be satisfied even with the crumbs which may fall from your overloaded table. It is true that her claims do not present any of those striking allurements which usually excite the popular mind. She sounds no trumpet of war. She offers no armed resistance to our power. Neither do kings nor emperors resist our intervention. Africa lies before us unappropriated and unoccupied, neglected and despised alike by the cupidity and the ambition of the world. Yet she is not destitute of some charms to the true friends of progress and humanity.

She presents a field of commerce wide and rich; extensive territories to be cultivated and improved; barbarous people to be civilized; heathen men to be christianized; a continent unoccupied by despotic power, to which God and nature invite us to come and bless with our free institutions.

If the colony of Liberia had been planted by our people in Europe instead of Africa, how we should have watched with jealous care its daily progress, resisted with national power every attempt to impede its advancement, and would have seized the very first opportunity to acknowledge its existence as a free Republican Government. There has not been a movement in Europe for liberty, however feeble, that we have not looked upon with anxious eye. There has been no country, however remote or insignificant, in which an advance towards free government has been made, that has not commanded our sympathy and attention. So frantic have we become in the cause of free institutions, that we have been betrayed by our sensibilities to indorse spurious movements for civil liberty altogether unworthy of our approbation. The late revolutions in France and in Italy, were specimens of this character.

But, sir, the case now presented, is one of no doubtful character. It is a people who through years of trial and suffering, have shown their devotion to, and their capability for free government. A young Republic of American origin, with a constitution like our own, and who aspire to no higher ambition than that of being instrumental in disseminating over Africa our own great principles of liberty and humanity.

Shall we refuse to this true Republic that influence which we are continually wasting upon the sham Republics of Europe? Shall we be deaf to the calls of humanity, and only show our love for human liberty where ambition instigates our action? Shall we beat the air to agitate the morbid political atmosphere of Europe, and refuse to strike a blow for liberty when all Africa, land and people, lie before us, prepared to receive the impression of our power?

But, after all that I have said, it is probable that this subject will be lost sight of in the more absorbing topics of the hour; be shoved aside by Cuba, by Japan, or the Bay Islands, and so the existence of the Republic of Liberia be forgotten for a season. But, thank God, liberty and law will still live in Africa; and the time will come when we shall not only acknowledge the independence of Liberia, but in our need cry unto her as unto a sister, to relieve us from a national curse—a curse from which the dominion of all America from pole to pole, cannot save us—the national evil of an overgrown and degraded population of emancipated slaves.

In ordinary cases the recognition of a new government by the old Powers of the world is but national courtesy, a cold formality, conferring neither influence nor character. But not so in the present case. The acknowledgment of the independence of Liberia by the United States, however formal on our part, will confer substantial benefits upon that young Republic, of vital importance to her future welfare. As she was indebted to us for national existence, she is still dependent upon our favor and good will for future life and prosperity. An experiment in government upon the capabilities of a degraded race of men, with no past history to excite national pride, with no heroic legends to reflect national glory, with no ancestral associations to confer national character—just emerging from centuries of slavery in America, and still standing beneath the gloomy shadows of barbarism in Africa, Liberia has but a slight and feeble hold upon national existence. A kind word, timely spoken by us, will impart to her feebleness, strength, confidence, and enduring life. Shall we not speak that word, by declaring that her national independence has the confidence of this Government, and will be sustained by the friendly regards of the people of the United States?

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

SPEECH OF HON. A. C. DODGE,

OF IOWA,

IN THE SENATE, February 18, 1853,

On the bill reported from the Select Committee for the construction of a Railroad and Telegraphic line from the Mississippi Valley to the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. DODGE said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I was one of the Select Committee to whom this bill was referred—the least efficient and most humble member of that committee. Without claiming to myself credit for anything that is contained in it, I deem it but an act of justice to say of my distinguished associates upon that committee, that never did men labor more faithfully, or in a more disinterested spirit, to accomplish, as far as they could accomplish, the great work committed to their charge. Day after day, for weeks, we devoted the whole of our mornings to the preparation, discussion, and consummation of this measure. Our chairman, the Senator from Texas, [Mr. RUSK,] has labored most indefatigably upon this bill, besides having given much time and thought to the consideration of the general subject of uniting our distant Pacific possessions to those of the interior and Atlantic, by bands of iron, from the day that the subject was first introduced. All know, too, from the extraordinary success which attended his most sagacious management of the Texas boundary bill, familiarly known as the ten million bill, that few men better understand the duties of a practical legislator, or are more faithful and untiring in their discharge.

The venerable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] whose enlarged experience and observation touching our railroad system, coming, as he does, from a State literally streaked with roads of this description, and being more familiar, perhaps, with the legislation necessary to protect the rights and interests of the Government, the traveling and commercial community, as well as those of the companies having charge of the work, has devoted his time and talents most patiently and assiduously to framing this bill, and may appropriately be termed the "Mentor of the committee," every member of which will bear evidence to the many sage and valuable suggestions which we received from him.

The distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] has thrown his whole soul into this noble enterprise, and both in the Senate and the committee, has brought his research and talents zealously to the work of its accomplishment.

Of the zeal and ability of the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] and of the time, attention, and devotion which he has shown to this work, it is unnecessary I should speak, as they are familiar to the Senate and the whole country.

My purpose in making this allusion to the committee to whom all the various projects for a Pacific railroad were referred, is to say, that excluding myself, I humbly conceive that the Senate, and especially those who are friendly to the enterprise, should receive the labors of the Select Committee with something akin to a "generous confidence." The North, the South, the East, and the West, were fairly represented, and I am proud to say, that I never saw the least exhibition of sectional or selfish feeling manifested by any member of the committee in the preparation of the bill. I allude with pleasure to this fact, because it is well known that there are four or five rival routes, all of which have their friends and champions; and because the bill of the Special Committee has been attacked—boldly and bitterly attacked—for that feature in which consists its chief excellence, in my humble judgment—I mean the provision which confides to the incoming President of the United States, after the most thorough geographical and topographical reconnoissance, the designation of the termini and general route of the road. I have said that this is one of the best provisions of the bill, and I reiterate it, because, with the lights which that high officer will have before him when he comes to determine this momentous matter, he will be much more likely to make the proper designation than would Congress. Besides, sir, as a fast friend to this measure, one who is neither to be coaxed nor driven from its support, it is my solemn conviction, that upon the retention of this provision depends the life or death of the bill. You cannot fix the termini or route of this road in any bill, and then get votes enough to pass it. No, sir; not with all the surveys and estimates of cost, general and particular, that ever have been made or that ever can be made—and the reasons are these:

There are, I believe, at least five contending lines or routes, over which it is proposed to run a railway from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean.

These are, beginning at the North:

First. From Green Bay, in Wisconsin, to Puget's Sound, in Oregon, with a branch to California.

Second. From some point in Iowa, on the Mississippi river, via Council Bluffs, Fort Laramie, the South Pass, in latitude 42° 30′ north, Salt Lake City, and then by the emigrant trail through a pass in the Sierra Nevada, in latitude about 42° north, to San Francisco.

Third. From St. Louis to Albuquerque, latitude 35° north, on the Rio Grande; thence to Walker's Pass, near the same parallel, in the Sierra Nevada; thence through the valley of the San Joaquin, to San Francisco.

Fourth. Either from St. Louis, Memphis, Vicksburg, southwest corner of Arkansas, or Matagorda, in Texas, to El Paso, on the Rio Grande; and thence by the Gila, at its junction with the Rio Colorado; and thence, via the Tohone pass, about latitude 33° north, through the valley of the San Joaquin, to San Francisco.

This last line, by way of El Paso and the Gila, is believed by many to be the most practicable route; but it passes, a large part of the way, through the Mexican States of Chihuahua and Sonora. Many able men, and I believe Mr. Whitney among the number, think the first-named route, notwithstanding its hyperborean locality, the most feasible and advantageous.

Now, sir, these lines of route all have their supporters and advocates; and it is not my province to assail or to disparage any one of them. But I have to say that which I do know: Fix any one of them arbitrarily and by name in any bill, either before or after any number of surveys and estimates, and the friends of all the others fly from the support of the bill. They will give for excuse that the route designated is too far north, or too far south, to answer the great purposes of transit and commerce. It will be alleged that the Corps of Topographical Engineers, high as that corps deservedly stands in public estimation, by whom the surveys will have been made, were governed by sectional or other improper considerations and motives, and to this there will be added many other excuses for opposition. But few, if any, of the opponents will avow the true objection, which would be, that the road is not so located as to subserve the immediate local interests of the objecting member's State and constituency. Mark you! the contention to which I now allude would be among the friends of the bill—those friends whose votes and harmonious action are demanded for the success of the measure. Now, all who want a road can and do pull together, being at heart for the measure, and willing to run the risk of their favorite line of route being selected by the President, as, in his opinion, the best one. Hence, I regard the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD] as directed at the existence of the bill. I trust that it will be so viewed by all the sincere friends of this great highway, and that it may receive at their hands that condemnation it so richly merits. I am perfectly satisfied that there are several practicable routes; and with this conviction I am for progressing with the road. I believe it to be the greatest question which now concerns our nation, and I wish to commit the Government to its construction—ay, and beyond the possibility of backing out—let the cost be double, triple, or quadruple the amount which the bill proposes to appropriate.

For the reasons given, and for others, I repeat I am glad that there is no critical survey and estimate of the cost of this road, nor any location of it now before us. I want a vote upon the great paramount question of the road itself, unembarrassed by collateral questions, such as those of route, survey, or cost, which, although important, are of minor consequence. If we are determined to have the road, these matters of detail are quite as well to follow, and in this instance, for the reasons stated, I think had better follow than precede the bill: a bill that determines the fate of the first and greatest measure of the day—the thoroughfare—which is a question, as I religiously believe, involving the brightest hopes of our nation and people, if not the perpetuity of the Union itself. For who that will contemplate the present long and circuitous route, through foreign governments and countries—the Rocky and Sierra Nevada mountain barriers—the scarcely less formidable desert prairies, some of which are even denominated "journada del muerto," the journey of death—can doubt that such a ligament is necessary to bind in contentment and peace the mighty States which are to grow up upon our Pacific borders, and having those local and sectional attachments and prejudices which ever surround the spot called "home?" Sir, without this rapid overland railroad connection, we must, in the lapse of time, see the god Terminus driven back from his present Ocean boundary, and seated upon those Stony mountains beyond which it was once thought he ought not to have been removed, though I was never of the number of those who so thought.

I am as much averse as any Senator in this body, to increasing the power or patronage of the Federal Executive; but the objections made to this bill upon the grounds that it does either, are not, in my poor judgment, well founded. He is to use officers of the regular corps of engineers, just as they are now, every day and year, employed; and when he gets, through them, the information necessary to enable him to do so, he decides where the contemplated road shall run, and where terminate. It does not give him the appointment of a single new officer. Congress often passes laws for the admission of new States, and provides that when certain things are done by territorial officers—as this does for certain things to be done by engineers, and certified to the President—that thereupon he shall issue his proclamation, and the State be admitted without further proceeding on the part of Congress. In high party times, I remember, when such a power was conferred upon the President, with the view of facilitating the admission of a State, the then opposition gravely asserted that it was giving to the Executive the power of admitting a new State: that it was a bold increase of Executive power and patronage, &c. Time has shown how unfounded these apprehensions were; and if this bill should pass, I feel that I hazard but little in saying that the same great arbiter will in like manner falsify the lugubrious predictions of its opponents.

Mr. President, after the able expositions given by the Senators from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] and Texas, [Mr. RUSK,] of all the provisions of the bill, and the masterly defense, both of its constitutionality and expediency, by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] there remains little for one so humble as myself to add, in the way of its support. But having been a member of the Select Committee whose chairman reported this bill, and feeling as I do the deepest interest in the construction of this great national highway, the Senate will, I am sure, pardon me for further trespassing upon its time. No other Government than one which, like ours, waits for the people to do or prompt everything, would hesitate or delay for a single day, a work so absolutely necessary to "bind in everlasting peace State after State, a mighty throng," as this is to bind together our Confederacy.

Look at what the ever-vigilant Government of Great Britain is doing even upon this continent, and in close proximity to us, in that great commercial race which the two countries are running for the trade of Eastern Asia. I see it stated in the London Daily News, of January 13th, of the present year, that the project of connecting the Atlantic and Pacific, by a ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien, is seriously entertained, and that considerable progress has already been made in the requisite arrangements. A full preliminary concession has been obtained from the Republic of New Granada. A preliminary survey of the proposed route has been made by civil engineers, whose report is highly favorable. The documents and plans, with an interesting pamphlet on the subject, has been, it is said in the News, privately circulated amongst the most influential merchants of Great Britain.

The proposed route is between Port Ecosses and San Miguel, and is only thirty-nine miles long. Three modes of intercommunication are presented; the most expensive and most efficient one, is by a canal of thirty feet depth at low water, one hundred and forty feet broad at bottom, and one hundred and sixty feet at low water surface. No lockage would be required. The material to be cut through being described as chiefly rock—a stratified shale, with thin beds, which are said to form an excellent side lining to the canal—the cost of its maintenance would be merely nominal. The estimated cost is £12,000,000, (nearly $60,000,000.) By this canal, the transit of the largest vessels from sea to sea, could be effected in five hours.

Such a canal in the hands of Great Britain, unless we make some movement to checkmate it, would give her the control of the commerce of the world, at least of that portion of it which has for centuries been the object of merchants and monarchs, conferring prosperity and power upon its recipients.

For more than fifty years the United States have been engaged in a commercial contest with England, and rapidly gaining on that avaricious and ambitious Power. The second war of independence was fought for "free trade and sailor's rights." The appeal to arms taught our ancient foe and present rival that we were neither to be jockeyed nor trampled on. Since the war of 1812, we have been gaining on her with constantly-increasing speed, and at last the race has become so close that England is hardly a neck ahead of us. Construct this road, mount Brother Jonathan on the iron horse, and he will thus be enabled to turn the corner, and not only to beat John Bull but to distance him.

I call the especial attention of the Senate to a letter which I have received from Lieutenant Maury:

National Observatory,
Washington, February 16, 1853.

Dear Sir: I have this morning before me your note of yesterday, asking for an approximate estimate in answer to the question, "With the railroad finished to San Francisco, how many days will we beat the English in reaching the marts of trade in Eastern Asia?" We shall be able to beat the English by about two thirds the time that it takes to come from England here, with the addition of the gain by running nearly three thousand miles on a railroad instead of performing the same distance in a steamer at sea. The distance from England, via the Straits of Gibraltar, Isthmus of Suez, and Red Sea, to Shanghai, in China, the center of the tea district, is very nearly equal to the distance from England, via Halifax, California railroad, and steamer thence to Shanghai. The distance by the former route is some six or eight hundred miles less than by the latter. On the former route there is no railroad transportation to speak of, the only land travel being across the Isthmus of Suez. Of course you will observe that I put the route by European railways to the Mediterranean out of the question; as a commercial route, that would require too much loading and unloading. Supposing, then, that each route be in operation, with steamers connecting, equal in speed to the Collins steamers, the difference in our favor by California railroad would be from fifteen to twenty days; perhaps more, because our steamers would only have to stop once to coal, and would have no way ports to touch at; whereas, from the head of the Red Sea, by the shortest steaming route possible, is not less than eight thousand miles. If your question applies to the English routes as they are, and to the California route as it probably will be, with a railroad hence to California, and a line of steamers thence to Shanghai, the difference then in our favor would not fall short of twenty-five or thirty days. Respectfully,

M. F. MAURY.

Hon. A. C. Dodge, Senate Chamber.

Instead, then, of meeting us in India, China, and even on our own Pacific coast, as the English now do, with the advantage of some ten days' sail, or more, the scales will be turned, and we shall have the advantage over them of twenty-five or thirty days, which, in commercial and business transactions, is conclusive and overwhelming. This Pacific railroad across our country will be the grave of British commercial supremacy. The epoch of its completion will be the zenith of her sun over the sea—from that day the splendor of her maritime power will begin to grow dim.

I come now to speak briefly of some of the vast and inappreciable benefits which I think will inure to mankind here and the world over from the construction of this road, and the consequent dense settlement of our distant Pacific possessions. In doing this, I will not dwell upon the mineral wealth of California and Oregon, nor upon the boundless fertility of their soil, nor the salubrity of their climates. Great and important as these are admitted to be, I think there are other benefits connected with and dependent upon the construction of this road, which transcend and cast them into the shade. They are, the command of the commerce of Eastern Asia, and the effect of the settlement of the American race on the western coast of our ocean-bound Republic opposite the coast of Asia; a country containing two thirds of the population of the world.

The trade of the East has ever been regarded as the richest jewel in the diadem of commerce; and every nation that has participated in it has thereby acquired prosperity and power. It is a historical fact, known to all, that this commerce, through what channels soever it may have flowed, has built up cities and kingdoms amidst the desolation of rocks and sands. It was for centuries the object of merchant and monarch to find a shorter route than that pursued by the navies of Tarshish or the fleets of Carthage. Phœnecia, Persia, and Egypt were among the ancient routes of this commerce. Constantinople and Alexandria were among its more modern channels; and Bruges and Antwerp in the north, and Genoa and Venice in the south, the means of spreading it through Europe. The discovery of the continent of America is said scarcely to have consoled Columbus for the disappointment of finding his expected passage to Asia obstructed; and from that day to the present, skill and power have exerted themselves to get round, through, or over this formidable obstacle. The wonderful progress of the arts, and especially the omnipotence of steam, now place it in the power of the men of this day and generation to accomplish the work.

We observe all over the older portions of our country, that cities and states are pushing forward their rival schemes of internal improvements, and setting up opposition to bring travel and commerce by and through them—considering themselves remunerated when they secure the business between places containing a few thousand people engaged in traffic. This Pacific railroad will bring us the travel and precious commodities from colintries containing much the larger portion of the inhabitants of the world, and convey them through the length and breadth of the land, scattering local, sectional, and national benefits all the way. Nations, like states, cities, and even the smallest towns have ever sought to avail themselves of the advantages which business and travel dispense on the wayside of great thoroughfares. This improvement offers them to us on a scale proportioned to the mountain ranges, lakes, and rivers of our country, and sublime in proportion to its free institutions. The main trunk completed only, if you please, across the territory of the United States, and the adjacent States will join their lines to it—it is a law of progress that one improvement rapidly begets another. But for that great pioneer work, the Erie Canal, and the impetus it gave to commerce and business, few, if any, of the railroads now in existence in New York would have been made. In like manner the Pacific railroad will give an impetus to commerce and travel with Asia and our own country, causing innumerable thoroughfares to be made to connect with it, and by showing the amount of business to be done, will demonstrate the necessity for its construction. It will cause old channels of trade to be abandoned, and new ones opened. As a general rule—and I think a wise one; because it supplies the deficiencies of nature—our railroads and rivers run at right angles in their courses. In the New England States, where the usual course of the rivers is south, the railroads run east and west; in the middle and southern States, where the water courses run eastwardly, the railroads tend to a northwardly direction. Rivers run from the mountains to the sea; railroads, generally across, or rather through the ridges, hills, and mountains. Influenced in their course and direction by the desire of facilitating the interchange of the productions of different climates, commercial railroads are observed to lead from valley to valley, for the purpose of meeting navigable streams—in this case it is oceans—taking from them a portion of the commodities which they are conveying, and drawing it off to other markets. There are certain countries which, from the eligibility of their geographical positions, are destined to enjoy a highly prosperous future; wealth, power, every national advantage, flows into them, provided that where nature has done her part, man does not neglect to avail himself of her beneficent assistance. Nations, states, cities, and towns which are situated on the high roads of commerce, and which offer to it the safest ports and harbors, are in the most favorable condition. Those thus situated, find in the intercourse of foreign trade, immense resources, and are thereby enabled to take advantage of the fertility of their own soil—the enterprise and industry of their own people—thus bringing into existence a home trade commensurate with the increase of foreign traffic.

The United States have Europe to the east, Asia to the west, and being midway between these two portions of the Old World, they occupy a geographical eminence in commerce and navigation, which places, as it were, all parts of the earth at their feet, and from which they may send their surplus to the people of every country and clime which are to be found on sea or land. If the productions of the earth were the same everywhere, and for a like amount of labor, there would be no commerce. Commerce consists in the carrying of articles from one place where they are not wanted to another in which they are needed. With commercial countries it is always a paramount object to open trade and intercourse between the inhabitants of different climates. The planter who raises more sugar than he can consume, does not, of course, desire to exchange this surplus for the sugar of his neighbor. He wishes to buy with it corn or wheat, beef or pork, everything I may say, save sugar. He, therefore, through the merchant and dealer, ships it off to a climate which does not produce sugar, and exchanges it for merchandise or something else of which he may be in want. From the history of the past, we learn that it was by such trade and commerce that Tyre, Carthage, Constantinople, Venice, Genoa, Amsterdam, London and Liverpool achieved their growth and prosperity; rising from the condition of poor villages to that of extensive and affluent commercial cities, exhibiting the astonishing spectacle of powerful cities springing suddenly from unwholesome swamps and marshes.

This road will, to a great extent, supersede the present long and dangerous commercial voyages round the Capes of Horn and Good Hope. It is needed and will be used in conducting the commercial and business intercourse between—

1st. The western States of the valley of the Mississippi, with California, Oregon, and Eastern Asia.

2d. The Atlantic coast of North America, and a large portion of the Pacific coast of South America.

3d. The north of Europe, and the Pacific coast of North and South America.

I will not tire the Senate with a detailed statement of the statistics of the value of the trade of the States and countries referred to, but may give such statement in a report of my remarks hereafter. The simple announcement of the names of the several countries interested in the road will demonstrate the necessity of its construction.

Mr. President, the most important event in the modern history of the world's progress was, I think, the exodus of that vanguard of Americans, principally from my own and adjoining western States, in 1843, who planted themselves on the Pacific coast. Insignificant as this little band of pioneers appeared to be, consequences of vast magnitude have been produced by their westward movement, and greater are destined to flow from it. It was their possession and occupancy of the valley of the Columbia that forced the settlement of the long-standing controversy with Great Britain, and an admission that we had some rights upon the Pacific. A foothold obtained in Oregon, and the possession of California became only a question of time. Mexican violation, for twenty-five years, of the rights of our citizens, and her shedding of American blood upon American soil, precipitated that golden acquisition to our territorial limits many years perhaps in advance of the time at which it would have become ours by the same process that Texas did—by a progressive course, perfectly honorable and proper, and founded upon the moral and intellectual superiority of our race. Already a bill has passed the House of Representatives dividing Oregon and creating a new Territory out of the northern portion of it, to be, and most appropriately, I think, called Washington. I hope and doubt not it will receive the sanction of this body. In a few years an immense population will grow up on the Pacific slope of our continent, between which and China, and other parts of Asia, lines of ocean steamers will be established, and our citizens, possessing all the lights of the present age, cannot fail to make a deep and most beneficial impression upon that country and people, the advantages of which will be felt by commerce, agriculture, and every department of human industry.

Our Pacific possessions now, to a considerable extent, occupy towards us the same relative position that the western country did towards the Atlantic States years before and after the acquisition of Louisiana, and the opening of avenues of communication and trade with the West. Listen to the words of him who was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," when he spoke upon the subject of the then distant and transontane possessions of the United States, and let us learn wisdom from them. In 1784, one year after the close of the revolutionary war, and five years before the present Government went into operation, General Washington, who was an explorer and surveyor of new countries as well as a general and a statesman, made a tour on horseback from Mount Vernon to the Monongahela, crossing the mountains by the usual route of Braddock's road. He designed going to the mouth of the Great Kanawha, but was prevented by Indian hostility. On his return to Mount Vernon, he addressed a letter to Benjamin Harrison, the then Governor of Virginia, in which, among other things, he says:

"I shall take the liberty now, my dear sir, to suggest a matter which would, if I am not too short-sighted a politician, mark your administration as an important era in the annals of this country, if it should be recommended by you, and adopted by the Assembly. It has long been my decided opinion that the shortest, easiest, and least expensive communication with the invaluable and extensive country back of us would be by one or both of the rivers of this State which have their sources in the Alleghany mountains." * * * * "Maryland stands upon similar grounds with Virginia. Pennsylvania, although the Susquehanna is an unfriendly water, much impeded, it is said, with rocks and rapids, and nowhere communicating with those which lead to her capital, (Philadelphia,) has it in contemplation to open a communication between Toby's creek, which empties into the Alleghany river, ninety-five miles above Fort Pitt, and the west branch of the Susquehanna, and to cut a canal between the waters of the latter and the Schuylkill, the expense of which is easier to be conceived than estimated or described by me." * * * * "That New York will do the same, as soon as the British garrisons are removed, which are at present insurmountable obstacles in their way, no person who knows the temper, genius, and policy of those people as well as I do can harbor the smallest doubt."

"I need not remark to you, sir, that the flank and rear of the United States are possessed by other Powers, and formidable ones, too; nor how necessary it is to apply the cement of interest to bind all parts of the Union together by indissoluble bonds, especially that part of it which lies immediately west of us, with the Middle States. For what ties, let me ask, should we have upon those people? How entirely unconnected with them shall we be, and what troubles may we not apprehend, if the Spaniards on their right, and Great Britain on their left, instead of throwing stumbling blocks in their way, as they now do, should hold out lures for their trade and alliance? The western States—I speak now from my own observation—stand as upon a pivot. The touch of a feather would turn them any way. They have looked down the Mississippi until the Spaniards, very impolitically, I think, for themselves, throw difficulties in their way."

Such, in brief, were General Washington's views of the means necessary in 1784 to preserve the western States; and looking from the present point of time, wild and utopian as they may then have appeared, we behold their realization by the States which he named, and much more, because of the discovery of steam and its application as a propelling power on roads, rivers, and to almost everything else. The rival routes and antagonistic State interests are alluded to by him, and had the same effect to delay the great work of that day as they now have to retard the one of the present day.

Mr. Jefferson—that statesman of rare endowments, whose fertile mind was always teeming with enterprises beneficial to his country—in his confidential message to Congress of the 18th January, 1803, asked authority to order an exploring expedition to the source of the Missouri river, which "might explore the whole line even to the western ocean," remarking that "while other civ-'ilized nations have encountered great expense to 'enlarge the boundaries of knowledge by under-'taking voyages of discovery, and for other lite-'rary purposes in various parts and directions, 'our nation seems to owe to the same object, as 'well as to its own interests, to explore this, the 'only line of easy communication across the con-'tinent, and so directly traversing our own part 'of it. The interests of commerce place the prin-'cipal object within the constitutional powers and 'care of Congress; and that it should incidentally 'advance the geographical knowledge of our own 'continent, cannot but be an additional gratifica-'tion."

After the return of the exploring party, Mr. Jefferson remarked in his message to Congress of the 2d December, 1806, that "the expedition of 'Messrs. Lewis and Clark, for exploring the river 'Missouri, and the best communication from that to 'the Pacific ocean, has had all the success that could 'have been expected. They have traced the Mis-'souri nearly to its source; descended the Colum-'bia to the Pacific ocean; ascertained with accu-'racy the geography of that interesting commu-'nication across our continent, and learned the 'character of the country, of its commerce, and 'inhabitants."

Nearly fifty years ago, Mr. Jefferson took the initiative in this matter, and more recent reconnoissances by officers highly competent for the duty, have confirmed the general correctness of the results anticipated from those early proceedings. The more careful and more enlarged means of examining the whole face of the country by talented, learned, and experienced officers, have resulted in the indication of a route which, while it follows the general line of the one named by Mr. Jefferson, through the whole distance, coincides with it exactly for a part of the way, indicating a route which many consider the only feasible one for the site of a road across the continent.

I beg not to be understood as saying that this bill is perfect. I know that it is not; and there are some amendments which, if proposed, will meet my hearty sanction. I will cheerfully vote to strike out the incorporation clause, and for an express prohibition against the exercise, by the company who are to construct it, of anything in the shape of banking powers; none such are given, but I would like to see the possibility of their exercise guarded against. The means and the powers necessary to carry forward the enterprise are all with which I wish to see the company clothed; indeed, if it were not for the success, economy, and speed with which private companies have carried forward these railroad enterprises in our old States, I would decidedly prefer that the whole road should be made by the General Government, and be exclusively under its management and control. But the slow progress and ill success of the Cumberland road would seem to admonish us against the latter plan. I admit that the construction of this road, like every internal-improvement measure, whether of a general or local character, is fraught with difficulties and liable to abuses, such as we know from the past history of these works, constantly imperil their fate. But this is only an argument for increased vigilance on the part of the legislator, and honesty and fidelity on the part of the public officers having charge of these works, in distant and remote parts of the country.

The arguments against this bill apply with much greater force against river and harbor appropriations. With these, besides their liability to abuse, is the very great difficulty of determining whether they are national or local. For one, I have always maintained, that when of the former character, they are objects worthy of appropriations from the National Treasury. Now, I ask if it is at all probable in the course of human events there will ever come before Congress a measure which is more certainly and surely of national importance than that now before us? I think not. None to compare with it in nationality or in any other point of view. Its whole line will be within our own territory—the United States owning nearly every foot of the soil over which it will run. All the money expended in the construction of the road will be for the benefit of our own citizens; and all those great incidental benefits everywhere imparted to the value of the soil by thoroughfares of this sort, the building up of cities and towns, encouragements to emigration from both extremes of the world, will inure to the advantage of our own country and our own citizens. I do not believe that this Government has the right to grant a charter for such a purpose within the limits of a State, and hence the bill has provided that it shall have no effect within the borders of any State, unless such State shall by formal act assent thereto.

But the right of the United States to aid chartered companies of States for such purposes, has at least the sanction of precedent in their subscription to the Louisville and Portland, the Delaware and Chesapeake, the Potomac and Ohio, and the Dismal Swamp canals; and in the exercise of this right, our subscription in the present instance is made on prescribed conditions, such as the dimensions and strength of the road, and the privilege to transport the mails and munitions of war free of charge. I am aware that Pennsylvania, like other States of this Union, was at an early day precipitated into a ruinous and expensive system of internal improvements. I appreciate the vigilance which would induce my friends from that State [Messrs. BRODHEAD and COOPER] to guard against such abuses on the part of the Government of the United States. But, sir, was not this rather the result of that log-rolling system which undertook to provide every place in the State with a railroad or a canal, than in carrying on, if you please, her double improvements—canal and railroad—through and over the Alleghany mountains, from Philadelphia to Pittsburg? If my information be correct, such was the case. Would that Senator, [Mr. BRODHEAD,] or his colleague, [Mr. COOPER,] who so ably addressed the Senate a few minutes since in opposition to this measure, be willing now to give up their expensive canals and railroads, with their deep cuts, tunneling and inclined planes, and resolve his State and people back again into the condition in which they were before these improvements were made? Do they not very much prefer these works, premature and unwise though some of them may be, than a return to the pack-horse, the bell-team, and the stage coach? Although the construction of those great works may have saddled Pennsylvania with an onerous public debt, I cannot doubt that the benefits and advantages arising from them more than counterbalance the evils of that debt.

Mr. President, besides the intrinsic merit of this measure, and the deep interest felt in its success by those whom I in part represent, it is commended to my support from the fact that it is so fiercely and bitterly opposed by those Senators who have never failed to show their opposition to every western measure. Prominent among these is my worthy friend from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON,] whose smiling countenance and sonorous voice are always seen and heard upon this floor in opposition to every measure of internal improvement in the West. Our differences in this regard do not in the slightest degree lessen my respect and kind feelings for him, nor for my worthy friend from Maine, [Mr. BRADBURY,] who usually takes the same side, and between whom and myself, owing to a misapprehension on my part of his views and position on this question, the first day this bill was discussed, there was an unpleasant altercation, which, however, passed off with the occasion, leaving us the same good friends we have ever been.

At the last session the Senator from Georgia pounced, most unmercifully, not only upon our alternate section bills, but upon the bill of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] providing forts and some protection to our western emigrants on their perilous journey to California and Oregon. That bill was then slain, because, as was alleged, it made a large increase to our standing army. This one is to be defeated for the want of preliminary surveys. The speech which the Senator from Georgia made against the Pacific railroad, reminded me of his happy effort against the Illinois Central railroad bill. That road was six hundred miles in length, and there were no estimates or surveys before us of any kind, when, notwithstanding that Senator's opposition, the bill became a law; and what is likely to be the result? Triumphant in favor of the principle and expediency upon which the grant was made! Uncle Sam parting with his alternate sections for six miles in width on each side of the road, raising the others to $2 50 per acre! and the gratifying result is manifest that the great thoroughfare through Illinois will, in all probability, be made in a short time, and the old gentleman, who deals out his acres and his dollars so parsimoniously, has not lost a cent, but has actually made money upon the operation, having realized some seven cents the acre more than the $2 50.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COOPER,] who preceded me in this debate, toward the conclusion of his remarks, contended that this road might be so located as to run from some point in California, say San Francisco or San Diego, to Matagorda, or some other point in Texas, and if unfortunately it should fall there, it would run through but two States, and be objectionable on that ground. He disposed of the Texas road summarily, and while avowing friendship for the measure, admitting its magnificence and great utility, he proceeded north and pronounced an adverse judgment, as I understood him, upon all the proposed northern routes, not because of the mountain obstructions, but owing to the depth of snow in the mountain gorges. Neither southern nor northern lines will answer the purposes of the opponents of this bill. Now, sir, being in favor of the route up the valley of the Platte, through the South Pass, &c., though willing to take my chance of getting it upon its merits—I wish to meet the latter objection of the Senator by that which I have learned from practical men, not from books. It is, that dry snow is no impediment to a car, no matter how deep. It is wet snow that impedes. This may now be seen, without going to Russia, at Ogdensburg, in New York, in latitude about 44° 40', where, I am told, the cars have been seen to plow through fifteen feet of snow without difficulty, while a few inches of wet snow—that is, snow in a soft climate, is oftentimes a great impediment. The hardihood and enterprise of the people who will immediately flock along the northern line, if it be selected, will overcome all difficulties, such as snow may interpose to the progress of the cars in any given locality upon that route. Repeating my preference for the route through my own State, and up either side of the Platte river, through the South Pass, &c., I avow myself willing to vote for the road whether my favorite line be designated or not. Upon that point, Mr. President, I am willing to take my chance, and only wish briefly to call attention to what the accomplished and scientific Frémont has said respecting the practicability of the route to which I allude, and especially to that portion of it which all must certainly admit to be the most difficult. He says that the route he "followed in 1842 was up the valley of the Great Platte to the South Pass." "The road, which is not generally followed 'through this region, is a very good one, without 'any difficult ascents to overcome." "It passes 'through an open prairie region, and may be much 'improved so as to avoid the greater part of the 'inequalities it now presents." In describing his arrival at the Great South Pass, he remarks that "the ascent had been so gradual that with 'all the intimate knowledge possessed by Carson, 'who had made this country his home for seven-'teen years, we were obliged to watch very 'closely to find the place at which we had reached 'the culminating point. This was between two 'low hills, rising on either hand fifty or sixty 'feet." "We crossed very near the Table Moun-'tain, at the southern extremity of the South 'Pass, which is near twenty miles in width, and 'already traversed by several different roads. 'Selecting as well as I could, in the scarcely-dis-'tinguishable ascent, what might be considered 'the dividing ridge in this remarkable depression 'in the mountains, I took a barometrical obser-'vation, which gave seven thousand four hundred 'and ninety feet for the elevation above the Gulf 'of Mexico." Its importance, as the great gate through which commerce and traveling may hereafter pass between the valley of the Mississippi and the north Pacific, justifies a precise notice of its locality and distance from the leading points, in addition to this statement of its elevation. As stated in the report of 1842, its latitude at the point where we crossed is 42° 24′ 32″, its longitude 109° 26′. This route having been explored, I may say surveyed, its altitudes ascertained and compared with others deviating from it, fixes the conclusion in my mind that its eastern terminus, as a United States road, should be at the mouth of the Platte, in the Territory of Nebraska. States, companies, and individuals, with the aid of the usual alternate section grants, or upon their own means and resources, must do what remains to furnish a continuous eastern line, and they will rapidly do this, causing it to branch in more than a dozen directions from that point, or other points further west.

But Senators are frightened at the magnitude of this measure. I beg them, before condemning it, to contemplate the past, present, and probable future growth of our country—to look to the interests, not only of those now living, but to those who are to come after us. I am one who regards, with great satisfaction, the arrival upon our shores, from revolutionary and despotic Europe, of the large number of foreigners who now annually migrate to the United States, believing them, in the main, to make excellent citizens, and knowing that there is nothing we so much want as people. This large and various population scattered over our western plains and valleys will greatly accelerate their settlement, and produce a harvest of good fruits not possible without them. But our unparalleled increase is not to be mainly ascribed to the foreigners; nor should we be told that we are legislating alone for them. The census shows that of our whole population of 23,347,884, but 2,210,028 were born in foreign countries. Thus it is seen, from the most reliable data, that our increase is to be attributed mainly to the productive and expansive energies of the Anglo-Saxon stock of this continent—the same causes which impelled us forward so rapidly in our early history when emigration was comparatively unknown. Official documents, printed by the House of Commons, show that the whole emigration from Great Britain and her dependencies, to this country from 1812 to 1821, did not exceed 68,988, and from the rest of Europe, it was quite small; yet our population in that period increased two millions, or thirty-three and a third per cent. The increase of our white population, from births alone, independent of immigration, has averaged thirty per cent. every ten years during the present century. Without any foreign immigration, our Republic would have doubled once in twenty-seven years; but including that element, it has doubled once in twenty-three years. The Spaniards commenced the great work of colonizing this continent at the same time the English did, and for two hundred years they occupied a larger portion of it. Now, in all America, including, of course, Mexico and the South American States, it is estimated that there are not more than five millions of actual Spanish descent, while there are at least fifteen millions of Anglo-Saxon. Of this race, three hundred years ago there were less than three millions. It is now believed to be, with the exception of the Sclavonic race, the most numerous in the world. It is not only among the largest, but the most energetic and influential. It is gradually taking possession of all the ports and coasts of the world, and its language superseding almost every other. Expansion, if not aggression, is everywhere a characteristic of our race, which should, I think, be called American rather than Anglo-Saxon. The Frenchman feels them in Canada; the Russian in the Northern Archipelago; the Italian in Malta; the Greek in the Ionian Islands; the Spaniard in Cuba and on the frontiers of Mexico; the Dutch at the Cape and at Natal; the Indian in the Rocky Mountains and at the Isthmus; the Negro at Liberia and Sierra Leone; the Arab at Suez and on the Nile; the Australian at Sidney and Adelaide; the Malay at Bombay and in Burmah; the Chinese at Hong Kong; and the repellant Japanese will soon have to learn something of them at Jeddo. Perry and his fleet are going to form their acquaintance soon.

The allusion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COOPER] to the fact that the road may run through Southern California and Texas, will not deter me from voting for the bill, nor sustaining the act of the President, if he should designate the most southern route spoken of, as, in his judgment, the best for the nation. I iterate and reiterate, that, for myself, I will vote for the road, although the line selected may not meet my individual preferences. What Senator is so lost to a knowledge of the strong feelings of sectional and local attachment which exists in every legislative body, as not to know that when you attempt to name the termini in your law, that you have either to name all the points which are aspirants, or none, or deposit the power of selection with some disinterested tribunal?

Now, sir, we can construct one great thoroughfare which will cost much money, land, and time; but we cannot build two, much less five, to accommodate aspiring cities and selfish localities. We must run the risk of choice or never have a road. I have reflected long upon this subject, and am well aware of the pent-up local feeling which lies at the bottom of it. The only hope of success, in my poor judgment, is to deposit the power of designation in the hands of the President of the United States. And I would just as soon, if the bill could be passed to-day, intrust that power of selection to Millard Fillmore as to Franklin Pierce. Chief Justice Taney, or any one of his distinguished associates on the Supreme Bench, if we could impose the duty upon him or them, would answer my purpose quite as well. The officer who performs the duty, so that he be a man of intelligence, character, and responsible position, is a matter of the most unimaginable consequence to me. I want the law for the road put upon the statute-book. I want the dollars and the land voted. I want the President of the United States, through his engineers, to obtain all the information he may desire to enable him to decide the question of termini and general route, and to put the road under contract as soon as his convenience will allow.

Sir, when we institute a comparison between this work and others, or reflect upon the objects to which the national treasure and resources will be applied, how completely insignificant, compared with this road, all of them appear. For one, I would be willing to reduce the expenses of the Government at all hazards, to one half of what they now are, if necessary, to enable us to go forward with this work. To my own State—to the West—to the nation, I believe it is worth all the other measures which have come before Congress in modern times, or which are at all likely to present themselves for legislative favor.

Pass this bill, and grant alternate sections of the public lands upon the usual conditions to those States which are pushing forward their roads to and over your public domain in line with this great thoroughfare, and we may truly say that we have bound our Union together by bands of iron; and what is more potent than these, by ties and interests which will render it indissoluble. It is not a party measure, but one on which men of every hue and creed may cordially unite. New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, are all building their roads to and through the State of Ohio, in different directions, to the Mississippi river. Many of these roads are in line from our great eastern cities with the proposed Pacific road, and will constitute a portion of it. When the State of South Carolina shall have finished her road to Memphis, or through Nashville to the Ohio, the web will then be completed, and our whole nation will be brought together at its grand center in the short space of four days—affording us an opportunity not only to carry passengers, but every description of merchandise and produce, from the center to New Orleans, Richmond, Norfolk, Charleston, Savannah, Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, and to the Pacific in the same time—four days; and from California to any of those cities in less than eight days; and to China in twenty days—thus bringing our vast country together in four days, and the extremes of the globe in thirty days. Teas from China may then be transported to any of our Atlantic cities in thirty days, and to London or Liverpool in less than forty-five days. These things accomplished, and we may, in the glowing language of the British bard—

> "Bid harbors open, public ways extend,
> Bid temples worthier of the God ascend;
> Bid the broad arch the dangerous flood contain,
> The mole, projecting, break the roaring main;
> Back to his bounds their subject sea command,
> And roll obedient rivers through the land."

NATIONAL OBSERVATORY,
WASHINGTON, March 9, 1853.

DEAR SIR: It gives me great pleasure to comply with your request. Indeed, I am always glad to avail myself of any and every opportunity to contribute anything in any way towards the establishment of a railway hence to California.

You ask me for a table of distances, by which you may compare time from New York and England, via overland route, on one hand, and California railway, on the other, to Asia.

By the overland route, I wish you to understand that I have taken the shortest distance by sea from England to the Isthmus of Suez, and thence down the Red Sea to the places named.

You will also, I hope, bear in mind, that the distance quoted as per railway, is by an air line, and the distance by sea is measured in arcs of the great circle.

Were the California railway finished, and were there a line of steamers to the East from California, it would be as near for the Liverpool merchant, setting out on a trip for Canton, to come this way and take steamer at California, as it would be to go the overland route via India. The distance in miles would be about equal, but the time would be in favor of the California route, because of the railway travel.

By the overland route, the whole distance except a few miles by land across the Isthmus of Suez, is supposed to be accomplished by water as below stated:

	To Bombay	To Calcutta	To Canton.	To Shanghai.
From England via Suez	20 days	27 days	37 days	40 days
From do. via California	50 "	43 "	33 "	30 "
From New York.....	40 "	33 "	23 "	21 "

The importance of a railway to California is becoming greater and greater every day, and the necessity of it more and more urgent. Not only is this work required as a work of national defense, but it is required to hold this Union together, and to make it compact, by subserving the purposes of travel, trade, and commerce.

Steam and the telegraph, by sea and land, are making wonderful changes in the business of the world, as well as in the modes of conducting it.

Why is it that railroads are shutting up canals, and taking their business from them? For the same reason precisely that they are superseding the old-fashioned "slow coaches."

It is because the producer and consumer must come closer together.

There is no part of the Mississippi river, from its mouth to the Falls of St. Anthony, that, by an air line, is more than one thousand eight hundred geographical miles from San Francisco. Midway between these two points on the river, the distance is only one thousand five hundred miles. Two days by railway ought therefore to put the traveler from the Mississippi valley into San Francisco. Thence by steamer to Shanghai, the distance is five thousand four hundred miles, which is equal to eighteen days steaming, at the average rate of three hundred miles per day. Twenty days from China to the heart of this country! Why no one can foretell the revolution in the commercial affairs of the world, which such a compression of time and distance is to make!

I have said and written much upon the subject of this communication across the country. I do not know why I should have it so much at heart, unless it be in consequence of a sort of affection for it, acquired by inheritance.

We have heard a good deal said as to whom belongs the credit of originating the idea as to this communication across the country. I thought it was an affair of our own day and generation; but in looking over some old family records I find that the idea was a familiar one to my father's father, and that one hundred years ago that most excellent man and worthy divine was writing earnestly and enthusiastically upon the subject.

It is well to cast back and see how this question has grown in importance since Anno Domini 1756, when my grandfather, from his globe home under the mountains of Albemarle, in Virginia, was inditing his letter about a commercial thoroughfare from "Hudson's river, or the Potomac, across this country to the East Indies."

Tobacco, at that day, constituted the currency of the country, and with the bad roads of the time, you may well imagine the difficulty planters had in hauling their crops seventy five or one hundred miles to market. One wagon load was the work of weeks. Under this state of things, one of the neighbors of my grandfather had just conceived and executed the plan of putting a hogshead or two across a canoe, and of so paddling his crop down the James river at its floods to market.

In telling of the importance and value of this discovery, the old gentleman, who taught in his school both Madison and Jefferson, asks his correspondent in England to conceive, if he can, the importance which this canoe discovery is to prove to the Ohio and Mississippi country.

The letter of his to which I refer is a remarkable one. I venture to make a few extracts from it. It is dated "Louisa county, Fredericksville parish, January 10, 1756.

"Since the publication of that map, another has made its 'appearance in the world, much more extensive, as it comprehends all that part of the British American Empire that 'lies between Boston and the southern boundary of Virginia; the territory of the six confederate northern Indian 'nations; the river St. Lawrence, almost from Quebec to its 'source; the various communications between that river 'and the lakes and Ohio; also, Ohio, with its dependencies 'lower than the falls." * * * "With it the author has 'published an instructive, curious, and useful pamphlet, 'explanatory not only of the map, but of many particulars, 'too, relative to the face and products and natural advantages of the tract of territory which is the subject of it. 'The map is but small, not above half as large as Fry and 'Jefferson's—consequently crowded. Though both it and 'the pamphlet be liable to several exceptions, and I believe 'just ones, yet both are very useful in the main, and together give an attentive peruser a clear idea of the value 'of the now contested lands and waters to either of the two 'competitor Princes, together with a proof amounting to 'more than probability, that he of the two who shall remain 'master of Ohio and the lakes, at the end of the dispute, 'must, in the course of a few years, without an interposal of 'Providence to prevent it, become sole and absolute Lord 'of North America; to which I will further add, as my own 'private opinion, that the same will one day or other render either HUDSON'S RIVER AT NEW YORK, or Potomac river, in Virginia, the GRAND EMPORIUM of all East Indian commodities. Marvel not at this, however surprising it may 'seem; perhaps, before I have done with you, you will believe it to be not entirely chimerical.

"When it is considered how far the eastern branches of 'that immense river, Mississippi, extend eastward, and how 'near they come to the navigable, or rather canoeable parts 'of the rivers which empty themselves into the sea that 'washes our shores on the east, it seems highly probable that 'its western branches reach as far the other way, and make 'as near approaches to rivers emptying themselves into the ocean to the west of us—the Pacific ocean—across which a short and easy communication—short in comparison with 'the present thither—opens itself to the navigation from that 'shore of the continent into the Eastern Indies." * *

"There are more than probable reasons for believing that 'the western branches of this river are no less extensive 'than its eastern branches. This is a common property of 'most rivers, and that it is of the Mississippi, I have the 'authority of one Mr. Cox, an English gentleman who, 'either some time before, or during the reign of King William III.—in virtue of a charter granted by Charles I., if 'I remember right, for I speak without books—to his attorney general, Sir Robert Heath, constituting him the lord-'proprietor of the lands and waters of the Mississippi, and 'afterwards transferred through several hands, till it fell into 'those of 'his gentleman—sailed up to its great falls, near one thousand five hundred miles from its mouth; both took 'its soundings that whole distance; traced some of its considerable branches on either side, and almost up to their 'sources; made a settlement and planted a colony upon it 'near widway that distance—if my memory fails me not—'and published a map of it from his own and the company's 'journals, as far as those falls, and above them, from what 'information he could collect from the savages. One of its 'western branches, he tells you, he followed through its 'various meanders for several hundred miles, (which, I believe, is called Missouri by the natives, or Red river, from 'the color of its waters;) and then received intelligence 'from the natives that its head springs interlocked in a neighboring mountain with the head springs of another river, to the westward of these same mountains, discharging itself into a large lake called Thoyayo, which 'pours its waters through a large, navigable river, into a 'boundless sea, where, they told him, they had seen prodigious large canoes, with three masts, and men almost as 'fair as himself, if I mistake not; for, as I have read a history of the travels of an Indian towards those regions, as 'well as those of Mr. Cox, the reports of the natives to both 'of them as to the large canoes are so similar, that I, perhaps, may confound one with the other. Mr. Cox's book, 'I imagine, is very scarce. I know of but one copy in 'this colony, of which I had an accidental, and therefore 'a cursory view, about four years ago. It is a small octavo 'volume, entitled 'Cox's Carolana,' that country being thus 'called, from the donor.

"Now, sir, though this narrative hath in it something of 'the romantic air of a voyager, yet the author's accounts of 'such branches of that river and such parts of that country, 'even as high up as the latitude of Huron's Lake, and also 'his description of the extent, situation, shape, soundings, 'and other properties of the lakes now confessedly navigated by him, together with his character of the circumjacent 'lands, are said to have been found just by late discoveries, 'as far as discoveries have been made. And if so, it is but 'reasonable to give credit to what he tells us concerning 'others of its waters and countries into which, perhaps, no 'British subject has ever since penetrated.

"I presume the credit which Colonel Fry gave to Mr. 'Cox, and his recommending these matters to the consideration of the Governor and Council, gave birth to a grand 'scheme formed here about three years ago.

"The scheme might have been formed in Great Britain, 'and was this: Some persons were to be sent in search of 'that river Missouri, if that be the right name of it, in order 'to discover whether IT HAD ANY SUCH COMMUNICATION 'WITH THE PACIFIC OCEAN; they were to follow that river, 'if they found it, and make exact reports of the country they 'passed through, the distance they traveled, what sort of 'navigation those rivers and lakes afforded, &c., &c.

"And this project was so near being reduced into practice that a worthy friend and neighbor of mine, who has 'been extremely useful to the colony in the many discoveries 'he has made to the westward, was appointed to be the 'chief conductor of the whole affair, and had, by order of 'their honors, drawn up a list of all the necessary implements and apparatus for such an attempt, and an estimate 'of the expense, and was upon the point of making all 'proper preparations for setting out, when a sudden stop 'was put to the further prosecution of the scheme for the 'present by a commencement of hostilities between this 'colony and the French and their Indians, which rendered 'a passage through the interjacent nations, with whom they 'are ever tampering, too hazardous to be attempted. This, 'I must observe to you, still remains a secret; and to prevent its discovery to the enemy, in case the ship I write by 'should be taken, the person to whom I have recommended 'this packet has instructions to throw it overboard in time. 'However, you are at liberty to impart it to my uncle John, 'or to any other friend of whose retentive faculty you can 'be as confident as I can be of yours.

"But to return once more. As there is such short and 'easy communication by means of canoe navigation, and 'some short portages between stream and stream from the 'Potomac, from Hudson's river, in New York, and from the 'St. Lawrence to the Ohio, the two latter through the lakes, 'the former the best and shortest. As there also is good 'navigation, not only for canoes and batteaux, but large 'flats, schooners, and sloops down the Ohio into the Mississippi, should Cox's account be true of the communication 'of this last river with the South sea, with only one portage, 'I leave you to judge of what vast importance such a discovery would be to Great Britain, AS WELL AS TO HER 'PLANTATIONS, WHICH, IN THAT CASE, AS I OBSERVED 'ABOVE, MUST BECOME THE GENERAL MART OF THE EUROPEAN WORLD, at least for the rich and costly products of 'the East, and a mart at which chapmen might be furnished 'with all those commodities on much easier terms than the 'tedious and hazardous, and expensive navigation to those 'countries can at present afford. This would supersede the 'necessity of going any more in quest of the northeast passage, which, probably, if ever discovered, will also be 'productive of another discovery, that it lies in too inclement a latitude ever to be useful.

"The discovery of a communication through this part 'of the continent with the South sea, would not only 'be a nursery for our seamen, but would be instrumental in 'saving the lives of great numbers of them, under Heaven, 'the protectors of you and of us, who, poor fellows, drop 'off like rotten sheep, by scorbutic disorders consequent 'upon such long voyages as that to the East Indies.

"What an exhaustless fund of wealth would here be 'opened, superior to Potosi and all the other South American mines! What an extent of region! WHAT A ——! 'But no more. These are visionary excursions into futurity, with which I sometimes used to feast my imagination, ever dwelling with pleasure on the consideration of 'whatever bids fair for contributing to extend the empire 'and augment the strength of our mother island; as that 'would be diffusing Liberty, both civil and religious, and her 'daughter Felicity, the wider, and at the same time be a 'means of aggrandizing and enriching this spot of the globe, to which every civil and social tie bind me, and for 'which I have the tenderest regard.

"But these pleasing expectations, if not entirely vanished, are much weakened and suspended, till Heaven decides the controversy between the two mighty monarchs 'now contending in some sort for the empire of the 'world."*

* See Memoirs of a Huguenot Family. Letters of the Rev. James Maury. Page 386.

Now, draw the contrast. One hundred years ago, the Missouri river was a myth; sailors, on the long voyage to India, died off with the scurvy and other diseases like rotten sheep. Indeed, so dangerous was the calling, that philosophers and political economists at that day confessed themselves at a loss whether to class the sailor at sea as among the living or the dead.

As much then as this old worthy felt that his country owed to sailors, so much, and more too, do I now feel that our country still owes to that gallant class.

What, then, has wrought these changes that have since come over the face of the sea, and the surface of this broad land? Bold mariners, steam, and the hand of improvement, guided by that "spirit of civil and religious Liberty, with her daughter Felicity," to which that worthy sage did homage in his lifetime: these are the instruments with which these great changes have been wrought.

He foresaw that New York was to be the great commercial emporium of this country. He showed theoretically why the Columbia river should exist. He predicted that the northwest passage, as a commercial question, would turn out, as you and I have seen it has, a chimera. He claimed for this country the importance of becoming the "general mart to the European world." He certainly saw far and well into the future.

As great and important as a "canoeable" navigation across this continent to the Pacific would have been in those days, the change which such a thoroughfare would have then made upon the business and commerce of the world would not be greater than that which this Pacific railway would now draw after it.

While the steamboat, the railway, and the telegraph, have, on one hand, compressed the earth into a smaller compass, by bringing the far corners closer together, science, with the discoveries and improvements which its lights have cast upon agriculture and the art of good husbandry, has, on the other hand, vastly enlarged its dimensions by causing two blades of grass to grow where but one stood before, and thus increasing the capacities of the earth to sustain population.

These changes have impressed their characteristics upon the affairs of life, and the whole business of the world. And in contemplating the ways of commerce now, and contrasting them with what they used to be, we are struck with the motto, which we feel rather than see, as we pass among the business marts of the world; it is the "open sesame" of the age, for "Speed's the word, and quick's the motion," is now the countersign with which we are greeted at every turn by every man of business.

Old Vasco de Gama was in a slow coach; and the voyage around Cape Horn is too tedious, too long. There is not time to go round the house, when both the front and back doors are open; we must go through it, and have access from one side of the country to the other by a passage-way right in the middle of it. We cannot wait six months to get our tea from China, when this railroad may give it to us fresh and good in three weeks.

The great end and aim of the vast commercial enterprises that are now on foot, that have wrought such changes and accomplished such magnificent achievements, is to bring the consumer and the producer closer together.

How beautifully and magnificently would this California railway accomplish this end!

But there is another point in my ancestor's letter from which we may, I think, learn wisdom. You observe that many of the friends of the California railway say, let us have a survey first. Why this is exactly what the people were saying one hundred years ago. Survey, survey, was the word then. I am sick of surveys. Let us do by this railway precisely what we do by all other great enterprises, and what we daily see done by corporations and States. Authorize the work, then make the surveys and locate it.

Pray pardon my earnestness upon this subject, and excuse me for troubling you with such long, but I hope not tedious, extracts from an old family letter.

Very respectfully, M. F. MAURY,
Lieutenant United States Navy.

Hon. A. C. DODGE, U. S. Senate, Washington.

DEBT OF TEXAN REPUBLIC.

SPEECH OF HON. W. H. SEWARD,

OF NEW YORK,

IN SENATE, March 1, 1853,

On an amendment proposed by Mr. PEARCE to the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill, providing for the payment of the Creditors of the late Republic of Texas.

Mr. SEWARD said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: At the epoch of annexation, 1845, the Republic of Texas possessed some property in public defenses, a large domain of unappropriated land, and revenues derived from customs. It owed a considerable debt which had been incurred in establishing independence and organizing civil government. That debt was divided into two classes: first, what has been called a domestic debt, not distinctly charged on the revenues from customs; second, what was secured to creditors by a pledge of those revenues.

Texas came into the Union as a State, under stipulations concerning her property and debts, namely: She ceded to the United States all public edifices, fortifications, and other property, pertaining to the public defense. She retained all her funds, and all of her public domain, but under a covenant that it should be applied to the payment of her debts, with the absolute right to any surplus; and it was agreed that in no event should those debts become a charge on the Government of the United States. Thus did the United States, in the very act of union with Texas, bind her to pay her creditors, at least as far as her domain would furnish resources for that purpose.

In 1850, five years after the annexation of Texas to the United States, all those debts remained unpaid; and, adding interest thereto, they stood, on the 1st of July in that year, as follows:

Domestic debt	$4,138,733 80
Debts secured by customs pledged	8,293,947 52
Total	$12,432,681 32

During that intervening period, there had been war between the United States and Mexico, which had resulted in the annexation, by conquest and purchase, of New Mexico, a State adjacent to Texas. A border dispute existed between those States, and it was supposed by Congress necessary to adjust that dispute, in order to restore civil government in New Mexico, and even to prevent armed collision between Texas and the military force of the United States, which, it was apprehended, might terminate in a general civil war, subversive even of the union of the States.

In the midst of this dispute the creditors of Texas appeared here, and urged the settlement of their claims as a condition of the proposed adjustment. They pleaded that the United States had become liable for those debts, by absorbing the sovereignty of Texas, and that at least they had become liable for them to the extent of the value of the revenue accruing from imposts, which, although they had been specifically pledged to the creditors, had been diverted into the Treasury of the United States by the act of annexation. Thus the debt of Texas became an element of the controversy which Congress undertook to settle in 1850. Congress settled it by compromise:

1. Texas ceded her claim to some of the lands before insisted on, and accommodated her boundary to the demands of the United States.

2. Texas relinquished all claim upon the United States for the debts of Texas, and all other claims for indemnity.

3. In consideration of these concessions, the United States stipulated to pay $10,000,000 to Texas, in five per cent. stock of fourteen years. But—

4. It was stipulated that the United States should not pay to Texas more than $5,000,000 of the said $10,000,000 until the creditors, who had taken pledges of her revenues from customs, should have filed releases of all their claims against Texas with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

Thus it appears that there were three parties to this compromise—the United States, Texas, and the creditors of Texas. The United States and Texas bound themselves then. The consent of creditors, whose debts were secured by customs, although postponed, was nevertheless necessary; and so they were a third party, whose consent was afterward to be given by releases. The domestic creditors, who had no specific lien, and in whose behalf the United States made no stipulation, were dismissed to the justice of Texas alone, and they disappeared at once and forever from this capital.

This is the starting-point in the present case. It is manifest that it was a cardinal object and design of that compromise that the creditors of Texas, whose debts were secured by pledges of the customs, should be satisfied by the extinguishment of their claims. The way in which it was to be done was by making that extinguishment, through the agency of Texas, a condition precedent of the payment to her of the last half of the $10,000,000.

It is manifest, also, now, that the compromise had inherent defects, which were these, viz:

1. That it did not ascertain and fix the amount which was to be paid to the creditors.

2. That it left that amount open to dispute between Texas and the creditors thus preferred.

Nevertheless, the ascertaining and establishing this amount was indispensable to the execution of the compromise. The United States were obliged to ascertain it before they could pay the five millions; and Texas was obliged to ascertain it, and see it extinguished, before she could demand the last five millions.

Each party, therefore, undertook to ascertain and fix the amount.

Texas has ascertained and fixed it at	$3,355,360 25
Which would leave to Texas of the five millions	1,644,639 75
On the other hand, the United States have ascertained and fixed the amount at	8,293,947, 55
A sum exceeding the five millions reserved for those creditors by	3,293,947 52
And exceeding the sum at which it is fixed by Texas by	4,938,587 27

It is manifest, also, that Texas holds the initiative in the action necessary to carry the compromise into effect. She must see that her creditors release herself and the United States. Moreover, not only cannot the United States pay all the creditors thus secured, but they cannot pay any until all of them shall, by the agency of Texas, have been brought to file releases. This dispute, full of loss and damage to the creditors, and of irritation between the United States and Texas, is now two years old. The debt to the creditors grows chiefly at the rate of ten per cent., while the fund is in the Treasury, drawing an interest against the United States of five per cent. It is manifest now that it is time, high time, that the controversy should be settled, and the compromise carried into effect. It is equally clear that unless Congress shall intervene, it will not be settled for an indefinite period.

The Committee on Finance proposes a plan of settlement, which is, that in lieu of the five millions of five per cent. of fourteen years, the United States shall issue stock to the amount of $8,333,333 33, at three per cent., redeemable in twenty years, and deliver it to the creditors, taking assignments for their claims, (the small excess of their claims being paid in money at the Treasury,) and that the United States shall hold the assigned claims as a bar to the claim of Texas for these five millions.

I. I consider this plan commended by its convenience.

1. In the first place, the creditors of Texas, for whose protection the United States, with her own consent, has intervened, will be promptly paid. Their claims will be extinguished, and this is a cardinal point.

2. The whole claim of Texas on the United States, under the compromise of 1850, will be virtually paid, which is another cardinal point.

In any event, and by her own showing, Texas will be paid to within the sum of $1,164,639 75. The difference which will remain to be adjusted, if any, will be one between the United States and Texas, which will involve no injustice to individuals—another cardinal point.

3. The expense to the United States will not be materially increased. The interest of $5,000,000 at five per cent., and of $8,333,333 at three per cent., are equal. There will be still the difference of $3,333,333 between the principal sums, to be borne by the Treasury. But we have now, and, for some time to come, are likely to have, a surplus in the Treasury, and so can buy up these $8,000,000; or, if you please, the whole $13,000,000, in one or two years, and so indemnify ourselves, in a great measure, for the additional sum advanced to settle the controversy.

II. I consider the plan, in the next place, commended by its harmony with the principles of the compromise of 1850.

The United States, by that compromise, assumed to guaranty ample satisfaction to the creditors in question. The sum appropriated (five millions of dollars) was appropriated because it was thought adequate to that object. The United States would then have appropriated $8,000,000, if it had been understood that the debts in question amounted to that sum; and there is no reason to doubt that Texas would have as promptly agreed to that sum as to the lesser one. However this may be, the fact now is that the compromise of 1850 has failed, for the reason that the sum assigned for the indemnity of the creditors was too small by the difference of $3,333,333. I am sure that the sum would have been fixed at what now is proposed, if it had been understood that otherwise the compromise would fail of effect for the reason that it has failed.

III. I consider that the plan of the committee is recommended by justice.

Justice is the basis of moral obligation. Whether there is a moral obligation between the United States and these creditors, is a question concluded by the act of annexation of 1845, and the compromise act of 1850. On what ground, other than such an obligation, did the United States, in 1845, leave to Texas a peculiar national fund, and bind her to use it to pay her creditors generally, and stipulate with her for the indemnity of the United States against those debts? On what other ground did the United States, in 1850, reserve in their own Treasury five millions of the sum to be paid to Texas, until her creditors should file their releases in the Federal Treasury? It is clear, then, that it is just, and the United States are bound to the creditors by a moral obligation to see their debts extinguished, at least as far as the sum of five millions would go. Under just such circumstances, a court of equity would, on a bill of interpleader, direct the United States to pay that fund to those creditors.

But the moral obligation under which the United States assumed to indemnify the creditors for five millions, equally holds for their indemnity to the whole amount of their claims; that is, for $8,293,947 50. If we were under no moral obligation to pay that sum, then the stipulation to pay five millions was a wanton waste of that sum without adequate consideration—a position which no one here will assume.

Such are the grounds on which the plan of the committee is defended. I proceed to consider the objections raised against it. The honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] says that we are under no obligations to pay these creditors, because, in the act of annexation, Texas agreed that we should not be liable, and that she would pay them, and that the creditors had notice of that annexation on those terms, and did not protest, and therefore impliedly consented. But the honorable Senator was understood to waive this point of implied consent by the creditors.

I take the objection, however, in whatever form, and say in reply:

1. That all the world knows that a protest by the creditors against the act of annexation, would have been not more impertinent than unavailing.

2. That it may well be supposed that the creditors concerned may, in 1845, have foreseen that although the United States then refused, yet in 1850 they would assume the debts of Texas, to the amount supposed to be secured by the revenues of Texas, diverted into the Federal Treasury.

The Senator from Virginia objects, secondly, that the sovereignty of Texas was not, by the act of annexation, merged in the United States; but that, on the contrary, she still remains a sovereign State, and in the enjoyment of adequate and ample resources, viz: her public domain and capacity for direct taxation to pay the creditors.

I reply, first, that while the public domain of Texas, like our own, and her capacity for direct taxation, like our own, are valuable resources for credit, and to some extent for expenses of current administration, they are practically unavailing for the payment of a large funded debt. The resources of Texas for that purpose were her customs, which we have diverted, and so annexation, instead of increasing, has impaired the practical ability of Texas to pay her debts.

2. This objection is foreclosed by the compromise of 1850.

The Senator from Virginia objects, thirdly, that the plan proposed is a departure from the theory of annexation, which theory was that Texas should pay her own debt. And the Senator insists that the compromise of 1850 adhered to that supposed theory of the act of annexation, because it directed the $5,000,000 to be paid, not to the creditors, but to Texas herself.

I reply, that the imagined adherence in the compromise of 1850 to the theory of annexation, is an adherence in form only and not in fact, because the $5,000,000 are to be paid to Texas when she procures releases from her creditors, and never to be paid if they will never give the releases. So the stipulation is exactly the same thing as would have been a stipulation for paying the $5,000,000, or so much as should be due directly to the creditors. The departure from the supposed theory, then, was made in 1850, and is not to be made in 1853. We must keep on in the course of 1850 till we reach the goal.

The honorable Senator objects further that this plan of the committee to pay $8,333,333 at three per cent., being less than the usual rate of interest on public stocks, is a scaling of the debts, so that creditors will not get dollar for dollar, and is therefore objectionable on the same ground that Texas is complained of. Grant this to be true, still I reply that we scale less deeply than Texas. Secondly, that we are mediating between the proper parties; and thirdly, who can complain? Not Texas, for we take nothing from her, and do not divert any fund in which she has a claim. Not the creditors, for they assent.

The Senator further objects that Texas will nevertheless come back for the $5,000,000, and will be entitled to it. I reply that Texas has already declared, by an act of January 31, 1852, that $3,355,360 25 of this same $5,000,000 is justly due to these creditors, and shall be paid to them. At the very worst, Texas will not come back for that sum. Will Texas come back for the remaining $1,644,639 75? She must produce releases from the creditors for it. They will have already released, upon a just consideration paid, not by Texas but by the United States, and after Texas had had ample time to obtain releases, and had failed, because she exacted what the creditors were neither legally nor equitably bound to yield.

The Senator from Virginia objects further that the $8,333,333, at three per cent., will cost the Treasury more than five millions at five per cent. It will cost exactly $3,333,333 more. But that is no good objection, if, first, it is necessary to pay that sum to discharge these debts; and if, secondly, it is just, both of which points have been demonstrated.

The Senator at last falls back on his original ground, that the United States are not liable for the debt of Texas, according to the law of nature or of nations. It is quite too late to raise the question after the act of annexation of 1845, and the compromise of 1850.

Nevertheless, I will briefly consider the Senator's argument.

The United States derived advantages from the annexation of Texas, and creditors had aided Texas to rise to the condition in which her union was thus advantageous. They did not give her a dowry, but they enabled her to assume her own. The union of Texas with the United States and division of her revenues were a division of her sovereignty, rendering her less fully and exclusively approachable by creditors. Was there not in these circumstances sufficient consideration to sustain the agreements between Texas and the United States for the benefit of the creditors?

Bynkershock teaches us so, (p. 191.)

Again: Texas by annexation became subject to the debts of the United States. How is it, then, that the United States could acquire Texas without coming under some moral obligation to guaranty the debts of Texas?

It remains only to notice the argument of the honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. HOUSTON,] which seems to result in this: that Texas had a right to ascertain and fix the amount of her liabilities, and she has fixed it at $3,355,360 25, and the United States and the creditors are concluded by that decision.

I reply, that was not the agreement in the compromise. It was that the creditors should release their claims. If they will release for the $3,355,360 25 it is enough. But they have not released for that sum, and they will not.

Then the Senator insists that Texas is just and they unreasonable. I do not think so. The principle assumed by Texas is that she owes her creditors not what she agreed to pay, but the value of what she received from them. It needs only that this proposition should be stated to secure its rejection. It can be no more put in the case of Texas in regard to these debts than in any other case of public and even private indebtedness.

The argument, however, is attempted to be sustained by precedents. I reply, if sound, it needs no aid from precedents. If unsound, then no precedents can make it sound.

There is only one ground on which a Government can justly scale its debts—that is the ground of absolute inability or bankruptcy, and then there must be a devotion of all its wealth. Neither Texas nor the United States can adopt that ground. Each of the parties is prosperous, each is rich, and they can neither assume the condition nor interpose the plea of insolvency.

SENATE SPECIAL SESSION.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 4, 1853.

In pursuance of the proclamation of the President of the United States, the Senate of the United States assembled in the Senate Chamber at twelve o'clock, m.

After prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER,

Mr. CASS rose and said: I have been requested to ask the Senators to come to order.

NEW MEMBERS.

Mr. BADGER. I submit this resolution, which I hope will be adopted:

Resolved, That the oath prescribed by the Constitution be administered to the new members of the Senate by the Hon. LEWIS CASS, the oldest member of the Senate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. BADGER. I move that the roll of new Senators be now called.

The motion was agreed to.

The Secretary read the list, as follows:

Hon. C. G. ATHERTON, of New Hampshire.
Hon. JUDAH P. BENJAMIN, of Louisiana.
Hon. JOHN M. CLAYTON, of Delaware.
Hon. STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, of Illinois.
Hon. JOSIAH J. EVANS, of South Carolina.
Hon. EDWARD EVERETT, of Massachusetts.
Hon. SAM HOUSTON, of Texas.
Hon. ROBERT M. T. HUNTER, of Virginia.
Hon. GEORGE W. JONES, of Iowa.
Hon. WILLIAM K. SEBASTIAN, of Arkansas.
Hon. CHARLES E. STUART, of Michigan.
Hon. JOHN B. THOMPSON, of Kentucky.
Hon. JOHN R. THOMSON, of New Jersey.
Hon. WILLIAM WRIGHT, of New Jersey.

Each of these gentlemen, as his name was called, came forward, and the oath prescribed by the Constitution having been administered to him by the Hon. LEWIS CASS, took his seat in the Senate.

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. SHIELDS. With the unanimous consent of the Senate, I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. DAVID R. ATCHISON continue President pro tempore of the Senate.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

Mr. ATCHISON, on taking the chair, addressed the Senate as follows:

SENATORS: Permit me to return my sincere thanks for the honor that you have again conferred on me, and the evidence of your kind personal consideration, and also for your confidence in my integrity and impartiality.

INAUGURATION CEREMONIES.

The PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms will proceed to carry out the arrangements made by the committee for the inauguration of the President elect of the United States, so far as the positions in this Chamber are concerned.

The Sergeant-at-Arms proceeded to introduce gentlemen to the floor of the Senate, in accordance with the arrangements which were prescribed by the appropriate committee.

At half-past one o'clock, the President elect entered the Senate Chamber, leaning on the arm of the Hon. JESSE D. BRIGHT, chairman of the Committee of Arrangements. They were followed by the outgoing President, who was supported by the Hon. THOMAS G. PRATT, and the Hon. HANNIBAL HAMLIN, members of the Committee of Arrangments. MILLARD P. FILLMORE, Esq., Private Secretary of the retiring President, succeeded, accompanied by SIDNEY WEBSTER, Esq., the Private Secretary of the President elect. They were conducted to seats in front of the President's chair.

Amongst the other gentlemen who accompanied the President elect to the Senate Chamber, were the Hon. WILLIAM L. MARCY, of New York; Hon. JAMES C. DOBBIN, of North Carolina; Hon. JAMES GUTHRIE, of Kentucky; Hon. ROBERT McCLELLAND, of Michigan; and the Hon. JAMES CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania.

The preparations being complete, those assembled in the Senate Chamber proceeded to the eastern portico of the Capitol, in the following order:

The Marshal of the District of Columbia.
The Supreme Court of the United States.
The Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate.
The Committee of Arrangements.
The President elect and the ex-President.
The President pro tempore and the Secretary of the Senate.
The Members of the Senate.
The Diplomatic Corps.
Heads of Departments, Governors of States and Territories, the Mayors of Washington and Georgetown, and other persons who had been admitted into the Senate Chamber.

After the oath of office had been administered the President delivered the following

INAUGURAL ADDRESS:

MY COUNTRYMEN: It is a relief to feel that no heart but my own can know the personal regret and bitter sorrow over which I have been borne to a position so suitable for others rather than desirable for myself.

The circumstances under which I have been called, for a limited period, to preside over the destinies of the Republic, fill me with a profound sense of responsibility, but with nothing like shrinking apprehension. I repair to the post assigned me, not as to one sought, but in obedience to the unsolicited expression of your will, answerable only for a fearless, faithful, and diligent exercise of my best powers. I ought to be, and am, truly grateful for the rare manifestation of the nation's confidence; but this, so far from lightening my obligations, only adds to their weight. You have summoned me in my weakness: you must sustain me by your strength. When looking for the fulfillment of reasonable requirements, you will not be unmindful of the great changes which have occurred, even within the last quarter of a century, and the consequent augmentation and complexity of duties imposed in the administration both of your home and foreign affairs.

Whether the elements of inherent force in the Republic have kept pace with its unparalleled progression in territory, population, and wealth, has been the subject of earnest thought and discussion on both sides of the ocean. Less than sixty-four years ago the Father of his Country made the then "recent accession of the important State of North Carolina to the Constitution of the United States" one of the subjects of his special congratulation. At that moment, however, when the agitation consequent upon the revolutionary struggle had hardly subsided, when we were just emerging from the weakness and embarrassments of the Confederation, there was an evident consciousness of vigor, equal to the great mission so wisely and bravely fulfilled by our fathers. It was not a presumptuous assurance, but a calm faith, springing from a clear view of the sources of power in a Government constituted like ours. It is no paradox to say, that although comparatively weak, the new-born nation was intrinsically strong. Inconsiderable in population and apparent resources, it was upheld by a broad and intelligent comprehension of rights, and an all-pervading purpose to maintain them, stronger than armaments. It came from the furnace of the Revolution, tempered to the necessities of the times. The thoughts of the men of that day were as practical as their sentiments were patriotic. They wasted no portion of their energies upon idle and delusive speculations, but with a firm and fearless step advanced beyond the governmental landmarks which had hitherto circumscribed the limits of human freedom, and planted their standard where it has stood against dangers which have threatened from abroad, and internal agitation which has at times fearfully menaced at home. They approved themselves equal to the solution of the great problem, to understand which their minds had been illuminated by the dawning lights of the Revolution. The object sought was not a thing dreamed of: it was a thing realized. They had exhibited not only the power to achieve, but what all history affirms to be so much more unusual, the capacity to maintain. The oppressed throughout the world, from that day to the present, have turned their eyes hitherward, not to find those lights extinguished, or to fear lest they should wane, but to be constantly cheered by their steady and increasing radiance.

In this, our country has, in my judgment, thus far fulfilled its highest duty to suffering humanity. It has spoken, and will continue to speak, not only by its words, but by its acts, the language of sympathy, encouragement, and hope to those who earnestly listen to tones which pronounce for the largest rational liberty. But, after all, the most animating encouragement and potent appeal for freedom will be its own history, its trials, and its triumphs. Preëminently the power of our advocacy reposes in our example; but no example, be it remembered, can be powerful for lasting good, whatever apparent advantages may be gained, which is not based upon eternal principles of right and justice. Our fathers decided for themselves, both upon the hour to declare and the hour to strike. They were their own judges of the circumstances under which it became them to pledge to each other "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor," for the acquisition of the priceless inheritance transmitted to us. The energy with which that great conflict was opened, and, under the guidance of a manifest and beneficent Providence, the uncomplaining endurance with which it was prosecuted to its consummation, were only surpassed by the wisdom and patriotic spirit of concession which characterized all the counsels of the early fathers.

One of the most impressive evidences of that wisdom is to be found in the fact that the actual working of our system has dispelled a degree of solicitude which, at the outset, disturbed bold hearts and far-reaching intellects. The apprehension of dangers from extended territory, multiplied States, accumulated wealth, and augmented population, has proved to be unfounded. The stars upon you banner have become nearly threefold their original number, your densely populated possessions skirt the shores of the two great oceans, and yet this vast increase of people and territory has not only shown itself compatible with the harmonious action of the States and the Federal Government in their respective constitutional spheres, but has afforded an additional guarantee of the strength and integrity of both.

With an experience thus suggestive and cheering, the policy of my administration will not be controlled by any timid forebodings of evil from expansion. Indeed, it is not to be disguised that our attitude as a nation, and our position on the globe, render the acquisition of certain possessions not within our jurisdiction, eminently important for our protection, if not, in the future, essential for the preservation of the rights of commerce and the peace of the world. Should they be obtained, it will be through no grasping spirit, but with a view to obvious national interest and security, and in a manner entirely consistent with the strictest observance of national faith. We have nothing in our history or position to invite aggression; we have everything to beckon us to the cultivation of relations of peace and amity with all nations. Purposes, therefore, at once just and pacific, will be significantly marked in the conduct of our foreign affairs. I intend that my administration shall leave no blot upon our fair record, and trust I may safely give the assurance that no act within the legitimate scope of my constitutional control will be tolerated on the part of any portion of our citizens which cannot challenge a ready justification before the tribunal of the civilized world. An Administration would be unworthy of confidence at home, or respect abroad, should it cease to be influenced by the conviction that no apparent advantage can be purchased at a price so dear as that of national wrong or dishonor. It is not your privilege, as a nation, to speak of a distant past. The striking incidents of your history, replete with instruction, and furnishing abundant grounds for hopeful confidence, are comprised in a period comparatively brief. But if your past is limited, your future is boundless. Its obligations throng the unexplored pathway of advancement, and will be limitless as duration. Hence a sound and comprehensive policy should embrace not less the distant future than the urgent present.

The great objects of our pursuit, as a people, are best to be attained by peace, and are entirely consistent with the tranquillity and interests of the rest of mankind. With the neighboring nations upon our continent we should cultivate kindly and fraternal relations. We can desire nothing in regard to them so much as to see them consolidate their strength, and pursue the paths of prosperity and happiness. If, in the course of their growth, we should open new channels of trade, and create additional facilities for friendly intercourse, the benefits realized will be equal and mutual. Of the complicated European systems of national policy we have heretofore been independent. From their wars, their tumults, and anxieties, we have been, happily, almost entirely exempt. Whilst these are confined to the nations which gave them existence, and within their legitimate jurisdiction, they cannot affect us, except as they appeal to our sympathies in the cause of human freedom and universal advancement. But the vast interests of commerce are common to all mankind, and the advantages of trade and international intercourse must always present a noble field for the moral influence of a great people.

With these views firmly and honestly carried out, we have a right to expect, and shall, under all circumstances, require prompt reciprocity. The rights which belong to us as a nation are not alone to be regarded, but those which pertain to every citizen in his individual capacity, at home and abroad, must be sacredly maintained. So long as he can discern every star in its place upon that ensign, without wealth to purchase for him preferment, or title to secure for him place, it will be his privilege, and must be his acknowledged right, to stand unabashed, even in the presence of princes, with a proud consciousness that he is himself one of a nation of sovereigns, and that he cannot, in legitimate pursuit, wander so far from home that the agent whom he shall leave behind in the place I now occupy, will not see that no rude hand of power or tyrannical passion is laid upon him with impunity. He must realize that upon every sea, and on every soil, where our enterprise may rightfully seek the protection of our flag, American citizenship is an inviolable panoply for the security of American rights. And, in this connection, it can hardly be necessary to reaffirm a principle which should now be regarded as fundamental. The rights, security, and repose of this Confederacy reject the idea of interference or colonization, on this side of the ocean, by any foreign Power, beyond present jurisdiction, as utterly inadmissible.

The opportunities of observation, furnished by my brief experience as a soldier, confirmed in my own mind the opinion, entertained and acted upon by others from the formation of the Government, that the maintenance of large standing armies in our country would be not only dangerous, but unnecessary. They also illustrated the importance, I might well say the absolute necessity, of the military science and practical skill furnished, in such an eminent degree, by the institution which has made your Army what it is, under the discipline and instruction of officers not more distinguished for their solid attainments, gallantry, and devotion to the public service, than for unobtrusive bearing and high moral tone. The Army, as organized, must be the nucleus around which, in every time of need, the strength of your military power, the sure bulwark of your defense—a national militia—may be readily formed into a well disciplined and efficient organization. And the skill and self-devotion of the Navy assure you that you may take the performance of the past as a pledge for the future, and may confidently expect that the flag which has waved its untarnished folds over every sea, will still float in undiminished honor. But these, like many other subjects, will be appropriately brought, at a future time, to the attention of the coödinate branches of the Government, to which I shall always look with profound respect, and with trustful confidence that they will accord to me the aid and support which I shall so much need, and which their experience and wisdom will readily suggest.

In the administration of domestic affairs you expect a devoted integrity in the public service, and an observance of rigid economy in all departments, so marked as never justly to be questioned. If this reasonable expectation be not realized, I frankly confess that one of your leading hopes is doomed to disappointment, and that my efforts, in a very important particular, must result in a humiliating failure. Offices can be properly regarded only in the light of aids for the accomplishment of these objects; and as occupancy can confer no prerogative, nor importunate desire for preferment any claim, the public interest imperatively demands that they be considered with sole reference to the duties to be performed. Good citizens may well claim the protection of good laws and the benign influence of good government; but a claim for office is what the people of a Republic should never recognize. No reasonable man of any party will expect the Administration to be so regardless of its responsibility, and of the obvious elements of success, as to retain persons, known to be under the influence of political hostility and partisan prejudice, in positions which will require not only severe labor, but cordial coöperation. Having no implied engagements to ratify, no rewards to bestow, no resentments to remember, and no personal wishes to consult, in selections for official station, I shall fulfill this difficult and delicate trust, admitting no motive as worthy either of my character or position which does not contemplate an efficient discharge of duty and the best interests of my country. I acknowledge my obligations to the masses of my countrymen, and to them alone. Higher objects than personal aggrandizement gave direction and energy to their exertions in the late canvass, and they shall not be disappointed. They require at my hands diligence, integrity, and capacity, wherever there are duties to be performed. Without these qualities in their public servants, more stringent laws for the prevention or punishment of fraud, negligence, and peculation will be vain. With them, they will be unnecessary.

But these are not the only points to which you look for vigilant watchfulness. The dangers of a concentration of all power in the General Government of a Confederacy so vast as ours, are too obvious to be disregarded. You have a right, therefore, to expect your agents, in every Department, to regard strictly the limits imposed upon them by the Constitution of the United States. The great scheme of our constitutional liberty rests upon a proper distribution of power between the State and Federal authorities; and experience has shown that the harmony and happiness of our people must depend upon a just discrimination between the separate rights and responsibilities of the States and your common rights and obligations under the General Government. And here, in my opinion, are the considerations which should form the true basis of future concord, in regard to the questions which have most seriously disturbed public tranquillity. If the Federal Government will confine itself to the exercise of powers clearly granted by the Constitution, it can hardly happen that its action upon any question should endanger the institutions of the States, or interfere with their right to manage matters strictly domestic according to the will of their own people.

In expressing briefly my views upon an important subject which has recently agitated the nation to almost a fearful degree, I am moved by no other impulse than a most earnest desire for the perpetuation of that Union which has made us what we are, showering upon us blessings, and conferring a power and influence which our fathers could hardly have anticipated, even with their most sanguine hopes directed to a far-off future. The sentiments I now announce were not unknown before the expression of the voice which called me here. My own position upon this subject was clear and unequivocal, upon the record of my words and my acts; and it is only recurred to at this time because silence might perhaps be misconstrued. With the Union my best and dearest earthly hopes are entwined. Without it, what are we, individually or collectively? What becomes of the noblest field ever opened for the advancement of our race, in religion, in government, in the arts, and in all that dignifies and adorns mankind? From that radiant constellation, which both illumes our own way and points out to struggling nations their course, let but a single star be lost, and, if there be not utter darkness, the luster of the whole is dimmed. Do my countrymen need any assurance that such a catastrophe is not to overtake them while I possess the power to stay it?

It is with me an earnest and vital belief, that as the Union has been the source, under Providence, of our prosperity to this time, so it is the surest pledge of the continuance of the blessings we have enjoyed, and which we are sacredly bound to transmit undiminished to our children. The field of calm and free discussion in our country is open, and will always be so, but it never has been and never can be traversed for good in a spirit of sectionalism and uncharitableness. The founders of the Republic dealt with things as they were presented to them, in a spirit of self-sacrificing patriotism, and, as time has proved, with a comprehensive wisdom which it will always be safe for us to consult. Every measure tending to strengthen the fraternal feelings of all the members of our Union has had my heartfelt approbation. To every theory of society or government, whether the offspring of feverish ambition or of morbid enthusiasm, calculated to dissolve the bonds of law and affection which unite us, I shall interpose a ready and stern resistance. I believe that involuntary servitude, as it exists in different States of this Confederacy, is recognized by the Constitution. I believe that it stands like any other admitted right, and that the States where it exists are entitled to efficient remedies to enforce the constitutional provisions. I hold that the laws of 1850, commonly called the "compromise measures," are strictly constitutional, and to be unhesitatingly carried into effect. I believe that the constituted authorities of this Republic are bound to regard the rights of the South in this respect as they would view any other legal and constitutional right, and that the laws to enforce them should be respected and obeyed, not with a reluctance encouraged by abstract opinions as to their propriety in a different state of society, but cheerfully, and according to the decisions of the tribunal to which their exposition belongs. Such have been and are my convictions, and upon them I shall act. I fervently hope that the question is at rest, and that no sectional, or ambitious, or fanatical excitement may again threaten the durability of our institutions, or obscure the light of our prosperity.

But let not the foundation of our hope rest upon man's wisdom. It will not be sufficient that sectional prejudices find no place in the public deliberations. It will not be sufficient that the rash counsels of human passion are rejected. It must be felt that there is no national security but in the nation's humble, acknowledged dependence upon God and his overruling providence.

We have been carried in safety through a perilous crisis. Wise counsels, like those which gave us the Constitution, prevailed to uphold it. Let the period be remembered as an admonition, and not as an encouragement, in any section of the Union, to make experiments where experiments are fraught with such fearful hazard. Let it be impressed upon all hearts, that, beautiful as our fabric is, no earthly power or wisdom could ever reunite its broken fragments. Standing as I do almost within view of the green slopes of Monticello, and, as it were, within reach of the tomb of Washington, with all the cherished memories of the past gathering around me, like so many eloquent voices of exhortation from Heaven, I can express no better hope for my country than that the kind Providence which smiled upon our fathers may enable their children to preserve the blessings they have inherited.

The President having concluded his address, the Senate returned to its Chamber, and resumed its business.*

* THE INAUGURATION attracted to the metropolis a greater number of persons from places more or less remote than any previous occasion of the kind, or indeed any ceremonial whatever. Possibly the census of our district cities has been increased within a week upwards of twenty thousand, so that all our hotels, boarding-houses, and places of public entertainment, not to mention the great extension of private hospitalities, have been crowded as never before. Every contrivance that ingenuity and a spirit of accommodation could devise has been put into requisition, in many establishments, to render the vast and sudden influx of strangers all the comfort possible. Though many persons residing within moderate distances from the city returned home after the conclusion of the ceremonies, by railroad and private vehicles, still the places of public entertainment are fully occupied.

At an early hour this morning drums beat and music resounded in various parts of the city, as it were to arouse and prepare the people for the pageant of the day. The country adjacent poured in upon us from every point of the compass, by carriage, horse, and foot, until at length there must have been for a time approximating seventy or eighty thousand persons within our city limits. During the forenoon, Pennsylvania avenue was lined with patiently-expectant spectators, either standing at favorable positions on the sidewalks, or thronging the windows commanding the line of procession. The weather was not pleasant; a raw northeasterly wind, wafting a pretty continuous, though fast melting snow, made its effects felt.

As per programme, the military companies of our own and other places (eighteen in number) met on the parade ground in front of the City Hall, where they were organized under the command of Colonel William Hickey, commanding the volunteer regiment of the District of Columbia. The other constituent parts of the procession took position upon the same ground. They then, about noon, marched thence down Louisiana to Pennsylvania avenue, to escort the President elect from his lodgings (Willard's Hotel) to the Capitol. Arrived at the hotel, the procession was joined by an open barouche, containing the President and President elect, the Hons. Jesse D. Bright and Hannibal Hamlin, of the Committee of Arrangements; the barouche being surrounded by the Marshal of the District of Columbia and his Aids, and followed by several Democratic and Firemen's associations.

By prior arrangement, in order to accommodate the people as much as possible in their view of the ceremony of the inauguration, the large gates of the Capitol yard were closed to carriages. The President's party and the diplomatic corps were admitted by the north side gate, and a covered way to the north door of the Capitol. The remaining (pedestrian) portion of the procession, with the people at large, entered by the northern side gate.

The President, President elect, and Committee of Arrangements, Marshals, &c., having arrived in the Senate Chamber, after the usual formalities there, they proceeded thence to the platform erected for the occasion over the steps leading up to the eastern portico. The President elect then stood forward, and, holding up his right hand, took the oath of office, which was administered by the Chief Justice of the United States. The new President then delivered his Inaugural Address.—National Intelligencer.

HOUR OF MEETING.

On the motion of Mr. RUSK, it was ordered that the daily hour of meeting shall be twelve o'clock, m.

RECESS.

On motion by Mr. WELLER, it was ordered that when the Senate adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

On motion by Mr. PETTIT, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, March 7, 1853.

Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of the proceedings in the special session on Friday last, embracing the proclamation of the President of the United States by which it was convened, was read.

On the motion of Mr. FISH, the Journal was corrected. It was stated that his colleague [Mr. SEWARD] was present on Friday last, whereas he had been temporarily called home by indisposition in his family.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of two members, be appointed by the President of the Senate to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the Senate is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make.

Mr. WALKER and Mr. PHELPS were appointed the committee.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

Mr. CLAYTON. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested, if compatible in his opinion with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate the propositions mentioned in the letter of the Secretary of State accompanying the Executive message to the Senate of the 18th February last, as having been agreed upon by the Department of State, the British Minister, and the State of Costa Rica, on the 30th of April, 1852, having for their object the settlement of the territorial controversies between the States and Governments bordering on the river San Juan.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the Senate such information as it may be in the power of his Department to furnish, in regard to the conflicting claims of Great Britain and the State of Honduras to the Islands of Roatan, Bonacca, Utilla, Barbarat Helene, and Morat, in or near the Bay of Honduras.

I desire to say, that whenever that resolution can come before the Senate without interfering with the necessary business of the Senate at this time, it is my purpose to discuss the topics which are suggested by the resolution. I hope to have the opportunity of doing so at an early period.

HON. DAVID L. YULEE.

Mr. MORTON submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to the honorable David L. Yulee, a sum equal to the amount of mileage and per diem compensation of a Senator, from the commencement of the first session of the Thirty-second Congress to the 27th of August, 1852, the day on which the Senate decided that the honorable Stephen R. Mallory, whose seat in the Senate was claimed by him, was duly elected a member of the Senate from the State of Florida.

REPAIRING OF CAPITOL ROOMS.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate pay the amount which may be allowed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, for the expenses incurred during the last session, in repairing and fitting up for use two rooms in the basement of the Capitol.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. SOULE. I present to the Senate the memorial of several members of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, protesting against the action of the Legislature of that State in electing my present colleague [Mr. BENJAMIN] to the seat which he now occupies. The question raised is as to the legality of that election by the Legislature of 1852. The Legislature has this year declined going into a new election, thereby either indorsing the action of the Legislature in 1852, or conceding that they had no right to proceed to a new election. Such being the circumstances under which the memorial has been sent to me, I comply with the request directing me to present it to the Senate, but shall decline taking any further action upon the subject.

The memorial was received, and ordered to lie upon the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. MASON. I have been requested to ask leave to withdraw the petition and papers of the heir of William Lindsay, an officer in the Revolution, praying an allowance of five years' full pay on behalf of the lady who is his only heir. They were presented in 1843.

Leave was given.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WALKER. The Select Committee, whose duty it was made to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that the Senate had met and was ready to receive any communications which he had to make, has performed that duty, and received for answer that he would forthwith communicate to the Senate in writing.

Several messages in writing, which the President of the Senate announced to be Executive messages, were subsequently received from the President by Mr. SYDNEY WEBSTER, his Private Secretary.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 8, 1853.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. BRIGHT. It is necessary, to carry out the organization of the Executive session, to appoint committees. Each side of the Chamber has conferred and agreed upon the list which the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] holds in his hand. It requires unanimous consent to permit him to present that report, and to have it acted upon. The report which he makes will be temporary—for this session only; and at the next session of Congress there will be a reorganization. I move that he have unanimous consent to present that list, and that it be acted upon without proceeding to ballot, as is prescribed by the rules of the Senate.

Unanimous consent was given.

Mr. BADGER. I believe, since I have been a member of this Senate, this has been the usual custom which has been pursued. This list has necessarily been prepared in great haste, and, as stated by the honorable Senator from Indiana, for the purposes of the present session. The list is as follows.

On Foreign Relations.—Mr. Mason, chairman; Messrs. Douglas, Clayton, Norris, and Everett.

On Finance.—Mr. Hunter, chairman; Messrs. Bright, Pearce, Gwin, and Badger.

On Commerce.—Mr. Hamlin, chairman; Messrs. Soulé, Seward, Dodge of Wisconsin, and Benjamin.

On Military Affairs.—Mr. Shields, chairman; Messrs. Borland, Dawson, Fitzpatrick, and Jones of Tennessee.

On Naval Affairs.—Mr. Gwin, chairman; Messrs. Mallory, Fish, Thomson of New Jersey, and Toombs.

On Public Lands.—Mr. Borland, chairman; Messrs. Dodge of Iowa, Pratt, Pettit, and Thompson of Kentucky.

On Indian Affairs.—Mr. Sebastian, chairman; Messrs. Walker, Cooper, Rusk, and Smith.

On Claims.—Mr. Brodhead, chairman; Messrs. Adams, Pratt, Chase, and Wade.

On the Judiciary.—Mr. Butler, chairman; Messrs. Toucey, Geyer, Stuart, and Phelps.

On the Post Office and Post Roads.—Mr. Rusk, chairman; Messrs. Soulé, Morton, Hamlin, and Smith.

On Roads and Canals.—Mr. Bright, chairman; Messrs. Douglas, Geyer, Adams, and Sumner.

On Pensions.—Mr. Jones, of Iowa, chairman; Messrs. Weller, Foot, Evans, and Toombs.

On the District of Columbia.—Mr. Shields, chairman; Messrs. Norris, Badger, Mallory, and Cooper.

On Patents and the Patent Office.—Mr. James, chairman; Messrs. Evans, Dawson, Stuart, and Smith.

On Territories.—Mr. Douglas, chairman;

Messrs. Weller, Cooper, Houston, and Jones of Tennessee.

To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.—Mr. Dodge, of Iowa, chairman; Messrs. Foot and Bright.

On Public Buildings.—Mr. James, chairman; Messrs. Badger and Hunter.

On the Library.—Mr. Pearce, chairman; Messrs. Bayard and Atherton.

The committees were agreed to.

HON. DAVID L. YULEE.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to ask the Senate to take up for consideration the resolution which I submitted yesterday, in relation to the per diem and mileage of my late colleague, [Mr. YULEE.] I am anxious that it should receive the action of the Senate, one way or the other.

Mr. CLAYTON. I hope the Senator will not press his request now.

Mr. MORTON. If there are any other matters before the Senate, I will not press it this morning.

Mr. CLAYTON. I hope the Senator will permit the resolutions I submitted yesterday, to be taken up.

Mr. MORTON. I withdraw my request.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolutions submitted yesterday by Mr. CLAYTON, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested, if compatible, in his opinion, with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate the propositions mentioned in the letter of the Secretary of State accompanying the Executive message to the Senate of the 18th February last, as having been agreed upon by the Department of State, the British Minister, and the State of Costa Rica, on the 30th of April, 1852, having for their object the settlement of the territorial controversies between the States and Governments bordering on the river San Juan.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the Senate such information as it may be in the power of his Department to furnish, in regard to the conflicting claims of Great Britain and the State of Honduras to the islands of Roatan, Bonacca, Utilla, Barbarat, Helene, and Morat, in or near the Bay of Honduras.

Mr. CLAYTON addressed the Senate for more than two hours upon the resolutions, and without concluding, gave way to a motion to postpone the further consideration of the resolutions until to-morrow; which was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were re-opened, and

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 9, 1853.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. BADGER. In proposing the committees yesterday, an oversight was made in regard to the Committee on Printing, which, as it may be necessary in the course of the Executive session, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to have now appointed. I propose that the following be the members of that committee: Mr. BORLAND, chairman; Messrs. HAMLIN and SMITH.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BADGER. I desire to ask a few minutes of the time of the Senate this morning, for the purpose of making what is commonly called a personal explanation. It is the first time in the course of my service in the Senate—which has now extended into the seventh session—that I have ever troubled myself with any matters which happen outside of the Chamber, and have ever thought any personal concern of mine important enough to excite the attention of this body. I am in the habit of looking on every assault made against me in the public press with indifference, bordering very strongly on contempt, and perhaps have carried the matter rather further than a just consideration of what is due to my position and to my constituents exactly warranted. But a case has now arisen which I feel myself bound to make an exception to the general rule of silence, indifference, and contempt, which I have observed, because it is necessary to do so, both in justice to myself and to Mr. MANGUM, my late colleague in this body. A friend has transmitted to me a slip which I hold in my hand, taken from a political newspaper printed in the town of Wilmington, North Carolina, which I ask may be read as the basis of the observations which I have to submit to the Senate.

The Secretary read it as follows:

"THIS WEEK.—The close of business on Thursday night virtually concludes the present Administration of national affairs. At twelve o'clock on Friday, Franklin Pierce will take the oath of office as President of the United States.

"The present Congress will also end at the same time, and there is great reason to fear that it will go out without having done anything for our river or bars. The only chance now is with the Senate, and both the Senators from this State turn their backs upon the affair and upon us. Whig or Democrat, Federalist or Republican, we must have a Cape Fear Senator, if we hope to have anything done for the interests of this portion of the State. Messrs. Badger and Mangum care for us about the value of a chew of tobacco. Perhaps, however, Mr. Ashe may yet be able to effect something through others; but it is an up-hill business, when even the urgent resolutions of the Legislature of their own State cannot induce our North Carolina Senators to coöperate with him. That they have refused to do so, we know."

Mr. BADGER. The second session which I served in this body, I was called upon by the inhabitants of Wilmington, and others who were immediately interested in the navigation of Cape Fear river at and below that town, to endeavor to secure some appropriation furnishing lights and buoys for that river. I set myself to work, as of course I was bound to do, and endeavored to have that measure of just relief extended to the people of that portion of the State; and I was successful in procuring the first and, so far as I know, the only effectual measure for giving security to the navigation of that stream. On that and on every occasion, it has been my custom rather to endeavor to do what the interests of my constituents required, than to make a public exhibition of myself on this floor as their friend, always preferring to have measures adopted for their relief rather than to make speeches by which I might hold myself forth as their special champion. This winter my attention was early called to the necessity for an appropriation in respect to the entrance of Cape Fear river, the case made being this: The Government of the United States had established certain jetties to protect the site of Fort Caswell, the effect of which had been to make that side of the entrance firm, but to turn the current to Bald Head, on the opposite point; and by washing loose sands to precipitate them into the channels, and so to promote a rapid filling up, the consequence of which was that the channel was shallowed from twenty to twelve feet, and was losing its present depth at the rate of nine inches a year. The Legislature of the State adopted a resolution on the subject, which I had the honor to present here, and had referred to the Committee on Commerce. I felt the absolute necessity for something being done, and done promptly; that it was a condition of things not only that required relief, but which did not admit of delay in affording that relief.

I learned afterwards, from my friend who is at the head of the Committee of Commerce, [Mr. HAMLIN,] that the committee had declined to report any separate measure, and would allow these things to be considered only upon a general bill. I thought that was unjust to the particular locality of which I have spoken, and having provided myself with a communication from Professor Bache, showing not only the necessity of the work, but that it was indispensable that it should be immediately commenced, I procured the unanimous consent of the Committee on Naval Affairs to report an amendment proposing an appropriation of $50,000 for the object. At the same time the committee unanimously concurred in reporting a similar amendment for removing wrecks from the Savannah river, in the State of Georgia; and as I was called upon by you, sir, to relieve you in part from the oppressive labors brought upon the Chair by the close of the session, it was agreed between me and the late Senator from Georgia (Mr. CHARLTON) that the amendment should be offered by him. I signified to several of my friends on this floor, particularly my friends on the Democratic side of the Chamber—among whom it gives me great satisfaction to say that I have many warm ones—that this was a measure not only right and proper in itself; not only requiring immediate provisions by law, but that I felt a personal interest and anxious personal desire that the amendment should be adopted. The two amendments were proposed by the late Senator from Georgia. They were adopted. They were sent to the House of Representatives, which refused its concurrence. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. GWIN,] who was upon the two Committees of Conference between the two Houses upon the Navy appropriation bill, knows, that at my earnest instance, he made it a point to insist upon those amendments; and my friend from Georgia, also, [Mr. DAWSON,] a member of the committee, who is not now present, joined him in insisting upon it; and feeling the present necessity, as well as yielding to my personal wishes and solicitation on the subject, offered in committee that he would surrender the appropriation for the river in his own State, if the House committee would agree to permit this appropriation for Cape Fear to pass.

In all these proceedings I had the cheerful, hearty, and anxious concurrence of Mr. MANGUM, my late colleague, who in each and every respect acted as became an American Senator and as a North Carolinian, feeling it his special duty to provide for what was necessary for any and every portion of the State which jointly with me he represented on this floor.

In these proceedings, Mr. President, I discharged nothing more than I felt to be my duty. I desired no thanks. I expected no commendation. At least I knew I should receive none from the quarter from which the extract which has been read comes. But I did think, and do think, that it is a little hard, when a gentleman has thus endeavored to procure what is desired for a particular locality in his State, that he should be falsly denounced as having utterly refused to coöporate with the gentleman who represents that district in the other House, in endeavoring to procure this relief, and turned his back as in scorn and contempt to the application.

Mr. President, I feel desirous, now and ever, to vindicate myself from the suspicion that under any circumstances I could permit personal or political considerations, public or private griefs, to induce me to neglect any duty which belongs to me as an American Senator, and especially any duty which belongs to me as a Senator from the State of North Carolina. This communication remarks, that it is absolutely necessary, in order to have these things done, that the Cape Fear portion of the State shall have a Senator upon this floor. I have no doubt that there are many gentlemen there who could represent the State on this floor with far greater ability than myself, and possibly with greater ability than my late colleague; but this I venture to assert, that no man from that or any other section of the State, can ever represent it with truer devotion, and more earnest and unfaltering attention to the promotion of every interest of North Carolina of which the General Government has charge; and I will add another thing, that, if any gentleman shall be sent here from the Cape Fear region, and he expects to procure the aid or assistance of the Senate in promoting measures of internal improvements, whether of harbors or rivers, which he may deem essential in his own State, he will have to adopt a different system of tactics, and avow a different system of principles from those which have generally been avowed by the representatives of that portion of the State. It is not the most persuasive method of getting gentlemen who represent other portions of the country to do anything for North Carolina, to announce that he who asks the assistance or favor is utterly opposed to doing anything for any other portions of the country.

Mr. President, I am sorry to have trespassed upon the Senate, and especially that I have been obliged to make this statement, containing necessarily so much of egotism; but I felt that it was due to myself. I did not choose that my constituents in North Carolina, my Democratic constituents, who are just and honorable men, should, by anything in the party press, suppose me to be the unworthy person which I am represented in that publication to be. I take this method, in justice to my late colleague and myself, of putting this matter right, because the leading Democratic journal here, being one of the official reporters of the Senate, this explanation will appear in its columns, and be read by hundreds in North Carolina who never otherwise would see it. I believe I might appeal, if necessary, for confirmation of what I have said to the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. HAMLIN,] and to other Senators, but I have done.

Mr. GWIN. I consider it an act of duty to the honorable Senator from North Carolina, to corroborate every word he has stated with regard to this matter. He brought that subject to the notice of the Committee on Naval Affairs before the naval appropriation bill had come from the House of Representatives, and he always pressed it upon me as an important measure, and manifested an earnest desire to have the subject considered when we met at the proper time. When the naval appropriation bill came from the House of Representatives, it was at so late a period in the session, that without being fully considered, I am sure without being considered at all in the Committee on Finance, it was reported without amendment, and the responsibility was thrown upon the Naval Committee, of proposing amendments to it. And I will say that when the Naval Committee met for the purpose of proposing amendments which they had prepared to the bill, the first one that came up was the amendment for the appropriation for the improvement of Cape Fear river, and in order that it should have that consideration to which the committee thought it entitled, when the bill came up for consideration in the Senate, I gave way, as chairman of the Naval Committee, to allow the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. CHARLTON]—the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] being in the chair—to make a motion to consider this amendment first, so that if there was any contest with regard to it, there might be a full and fair opportunity of discussing it, in order to show the necessity of the appropriation.

Further than that: the amendment passed this body, as is known, without any serious opposition; and when the Committee of Conference was raised, the Senator from North Carolina came to me, and I believe to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] also, who was a member of the Committee of Conference, and urged, with all the earnestness and power he possessed, the necessity of this appropriation, and he brought reasons to bear on my mind which were imperative, for insisting upon it. It is well known that I voted against the river and harbor bill on account of its partial operation. I looked upon this as an improvement that was necessary, because the obstruction was created by the Government itself. Not only did I advocate it in the Committee of Conference, as I stated to the Senator that I would, but the committee broke up on this especial item, and the one connected with the naval depôt at New Orleans. And when a second Committee of Conference was called, of which I was a member, that committee on three different occasions were prepared to separate, because the Senators from Georgia and Louisiana refused peremptorily to give up this appropriation at the earnest suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina. There never was a greater injustice done to any man than that of saying that he has not exerted himself, from the beginning to the end, in order to get the appropriation. He may not have spoken in the Senate on this subject, it is true, but he did speak to that portion of this body to whom the power of bringing the measure forward was intrusted—the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BADGER. I was in the chair.

Mr. GWIN. I will say further, that when the first committee broke up, and we came back and reported that we could not agree, it is well known that the Senator from North Carolina moved that we should adhere to our amendments; and he withdrew that motion at my solicitation, in order that we might agree with the House on all the amendments which we were willing to give up. And then he intended to move to adhere, and make it imperative upon the House of Representatives to reject the bill, or agree to this amendment. But, at the earnest solicitation of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and other members of the Senate, I retained the floor, and made the motion to insist, and agree to another committee of conference. The Senator from North Carolina voted against that motion, because he wanted to adhere, and make it imperative upon the House of Representatives to lose the bill, or else give this appropriation among others which they had refused. I have always said, and always will say, that although the Senator from North Carolina does not make much noise about his State here in the Senate, yet, whenever the interests of his State are before a committee, he attends to them with as much zeal and fidelity as any member of the body attends to the interests of his constituents. I have never known him to be wanting on any proper occasion.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think it but just that I should bear testimony to what has fallen from the Senator from North Carolina, so far as the action of the Committee on Commerce is concerned, and so far as his application in relation to the subject before the committee is concerned. An actual report was made to the Senate, embracing estimates for all appropriations for harbors, rivers, and lakes; and in that communication were estimates for the two places he has named: Cape Fear river and the Savannah river. So earnest was the Senator from North Carolina to have these subjects separate and distinct from all others, that he came personally before the Committee on Commerce and solicited its separate action. In the judgment of the committee, there was no difference between these cases and others contained in the general estimates, except in degree; and if there was a more urgent necessity for these cases, there was still an urgent necessity for other cases; and while I, as chairman of the committee, was in favor of separate reports in the case, the committee overruled me, and were unwilling to separate it from a general bill. I think the Senator from North Carolina has erred in one particular, and I think the Senate has a right to complain, but not his constituents; and that was, taking the matter from the appropriate committee to which it belonged and carrying it to a committee which had not the subject before them, and getting an appropriation here somewhat by indirection. I do not find fault with him. I did not know that the recommendation of the Committee on Naval Affairs had been made until it was adopted. The Senator from North Carolina knows very well that I opposed a similar appropriation when offered by the Senator from New York; and he also knows very well that I would have opposed his proposition if I had been in my place when it was offered. But inasmuch as it was adopted by the Senate at the earnest solicitation of the Senator from North Carolina, I withdrew the motion to reconsider it.

Mr. BORLAND. I hope I will be permitted to say one word in connection with this subject. As is well known, I have as little political sympathy with the Senator from North Carolina as any other member of this body. I am proud to say, however, that personally our relations are, and always have been, of the most pleasant character. In regard to this particular matter, it so happens that I can speak to one point of some importance. When the appropriation came before the Senate, or rather when I knew it was coming before the Senate, I expressed an opposition to it; not that I objected to the removal of the obstructions, but I objected to it as a separate measure, and insisted that it should take its stand among the appropriations for removing obstructions in other rivers and harbors. The Senator from North Carolina came to me, and made an appeal in behalf of this particular work, and put its character and its necessity in such a light before me, that I yielded to his request; and I must be permitted to say, however it may reflect on me generally as a legislator, that I was as much influenced by my personal relations and kindness for him as any conviction of the importance of the work.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions submitted on Monday last by Mr. CLAYTON.

Mr. CLAYTON concluded the remarks which he commenced yesterday. His speech is as follows:

Mr. CLAYTON. In rising for the first time, after a long absence, to address the Senate, I labor under some embarrassment, from observing that the gentlemen around me are generally strangers to me, and that not a single individual of all my ancient associates who served with me in this body twenty-four years ago is now present. I am irresistibly led back to the events of a period over which nearly a quarter of a century has spread its mantle, when those who filled this Chamber as the representatives of the sovereign States of this Union mingled in discussion on the great issues then before the country, and when the walls of this Chamber daily rung with the echoes of their voices, as they poured forth "the logic and the wisdom and the wit" for which they were so pre-eminently distinguished. Their debates were but justly compared to the procession of a Roman triumph moving in dignity and order to the lofty music of its march, and glittering all over with the spoils of the civilized world. They are gone; and I, the youngest and humblest of their body, am left to tell the tale. The last of them who left this scene of their strifes and contentions, was the present Vice President of the United States, the Hon. William R. King, who presided over the deliberations of the Senate nearly twenty years with unsurpassed ability and impartiality, and who, during a long period, occupied the post of chief distinction here as the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

"Statesman, yet friend to truth, of soul sincere,
In action faithful, and in honor clear!"

I confess, also, a feeling of embarrassment from another source. I am called upon to vindicate myself against charges of the grossest character preferred against me here during my absence. It is the first time in the course of a long life that I have found it necessary to defend myself against degrading imputations before any public tribunal. The calumnies which have been uttered here, were all made in connection with the treaty of the 19th of April, 1850; and I intend, if health and strength permit, to vindicate the course which I adopted while acting as Secretary of State under the administration of the lamented Taylor, in regard to the negotiation of that treaty. It is a duty incumbent on me to speak; not, however, merely for my own vindication, but to enable others now in the administration of the Government to understand a subject upon which truth has been more perverted, and falsehood more industriously propagated, than on any other topic of the day. In discharging this duty, I shall endeavor to speak of others with all possible respect, consistently with what I owe to truth, to the country, and to myself. All who recollect my course of conduct while I occupied a seat in this Chamber, will bear me witness that I never assailed any man personally in debate—never was engaged in any controversy, personal in its character, with any one unless it was previously provoked by him. Odi accipitrem. But now let it be well understood by all here, that for every word I utter in debate, I hold myself personally responsible everywhere, as a gentleman and a man of honor. I have very great contempt for that class of puppies whose courage is evinced by their silence when they are hung up by the ear. When attacked, I will defend myself without the slightest regard to consequences; and in doing that, as I am liable to the infirmities of other men, I will carry the war into Africa whenever I think the assailant worthy of my notice. On this occasion much of what I intended to say must be omitted, in consequence of the absence of the distinguished Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] who introduced the discussion in this Chamber of Thursday, the 6th of January last. I regret his absence, and the cause of it. I cannot say those things which I had intended to say to him if he were here, for I do not much approve of the modern plan of attacking absent men, who can have no opportunity of defending themselves on the spot. However, in speaking of the subjects referred to in that debate, in which that Senator was my principal accuser during my absence, I must necessarily speak of him, because my own defense, for which I have demanded liberty of speech at the first moment after the Senate could possibly hear me, would otherwise be unintelligible. And I will say further, that I am willing to remain here till harvest if necessary, in order that all others who may choose to reply to anything I shall say, may have full and ample opportunity of doing so.

At the time to which I have referred, the 6th of January last, the Senator from Michigan rose in his place, and demanded an opportunity to make a personal explanation. In the course of that explanation he distinctly charged me, as all the reports of his remarks which appeared in the public prints on that and the succeeding day will show, with having recognized the British title in Honduras, commonly called the Balize. My letter to Mr. Bulwer, on the 4th of July, 1850, completely disproves this accusation, and shows that I carefully avoided the very thing of which he accused me. Another version of his speech afterwards appeared, charging me with having admitted by my letter that Central America was not Central America at all, and that the treaty did not apply to any territory where Great Britain had any sort of claim. This also is disproved by the letter. Both these statements did me gross injustice, and they went on the wings of the lightning to all parts of the country before I could possibly refute them. It is said falsehood will travel a league before truth can put on his boots, and so I found it.

But, sir, there was a much more grave and serious accusation than that. If I understand it at all, it was a charge that I had inserted in the letter to Sir Henry L. Bulwer a direct falsehood; that I had stated that Mr. King, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the chosen organ of the Senate to communicate with me—as much the organ of this body as I was the organ of the President to communicate to the Senate through him—had informed me that the Senate perfectly understood at the time they voted upon the treaty of the 19th of April, 1850, that British Honduras was not included in that treaty. The Senator from Michigan declared in the presence of the American Senate, that he had that very morning himself waited on Mr. King, and had received from Mr. King's own lips the positive denial of the assertion. Now, Mr. President, I can understand this: a man of hasty impulses might make a great mistake even in reference to a subject of that character, and might misunderstand Mr. King.

But on the Saturday succeeding that debate there appeared in the public papers of this city, under my own hand, a vindication of myself against the charge, and Mr. King's own letter, dated at the very time I was writing the letter to Sir Henry L. Bulwer, informing me, in the very words used by me in the letter to Sir Henry, "that the Senate perfectly understood that British Honduras was not included in the treaty." I have the original letter now before me. The Senator from Michigan surely saw that letter in the newspaper, or he heard it here in debate; for some of my friends, to whom I owe great acknowledgments for their defense of me on the occasion, brought that letter to the notice of the Senator; and it appears from the card of Mr. Bragg, a gentleman of the other House and a friend of Mr. King, published on the Tuesday succeeding, in the public papers of the city, that the honorable Senator from Michigan must himself have seen Mr. King after the morning on which he made his accusation against me, and received from Mr. King's own lips a denial of the statement which the Senator made on this floor. And, sir, what follows that? The Senator came into the Senate on the Monday following, and, as Mr. Bragg tates in his letter, reiterated the accusation against me. It does not appear upon the debates that he did so; but this did appear: that he was entirely silent in regard to the whole matter of his charge. In referring to the letter of Mr. King, he only said that he had nothing to do with it. This left Mr. King in an unpleasant position as well as myself; and the Senator never did me the justice on any occasion to retract the statement which he had made here on the 6th day of January. Of that I feel that I have great cause to complain. There was nothing in the personal relations of the Senator from Michigan with myself to warrant me in the expectation that he would make such an assault upon me. So far as I understood those relations we had been very friendly. He had been kind to one who was dear to me, and I thought I had repaid the obligation by being as kind to one who stood in the same relation to him. In all the intercourse which I had with him there was no evidence whatever of personal hostility, and I should as soon have suspected any other man of doing me injustice as the Senator from Michigan. It is for that reason that I regret he is not here to-day, that we cannot come to an understanding in relation to these matters.

The correspondence of Mr. King, and his whole conduct towards me while I was acting as Secretary of State, were worthy of my highest respect. He was frank, open, and manly, in all his communications with me on all occasions: He was ever true to his word. I consulted him as one of the fathers of the Senate, and as one of the chief constitutional advisers of the Presidents in reference to the treaty, as it progressed from time to time. We both agreed that we never could, and never would recognize any title to the eminent domain, as existing in Great Britain, in what was called British Honduras or Balize. We concurred exactly with the report of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that all the title that Great Britain had in the territory called Balize, was the right of occupancy in the territory pointed out in the treaty of 1786 between Great Britain and Spain.

Sir, there were other extraordinary statements made on that occasion. It was stated by some one in debate that General Taylor's executive message to the Senate, communicating the treaty of the 19th of April, 1850, had described the country within which the British were not to occupy, fortify, colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion, as extending from the southern part of Mexico to the interior of New Granada. The President had stated in that executive message, that the treaty provided for the protection of all the routes between the points which I have just named; but the country from which the British were excluded by the treaty, was the country described in the first article. The eighth article speaks of protection to be given to the Tehuantepec route and the Panama route; and a sad blunder was made by somebody in quoting that passage to show that British Honduras was included in that treaty. It is unnecessary for me to expose what is at once made palpable to every one who will look at the eighth section of the treaty.

Again: it was insinuated in debate, if I understood it, that the President and Cabinet had not been informed of my proceedings at the time of the exchange of the ratifications. On what authority such an insinuation may have been made, it is impossible for me to conjecture, for I think at this very moment one of the Cabinet of President Taylor is within hearing of my voice, and will bear testimony with me, as every other member would, that the whole subject was referred to the President, and perfectly understood by every Cabinet minister, as well as by the President himself. It is only necessary to mention these things, and I have done with them. It is painful to allude to accusations built upon such miserable statements as this.

At the instance of the Senator from Michigan, a resolution was adopted by the Senate on the 27th of January last, referring my correspondence with Sir H. L. Bulwer, at the time of exchanging ratifications, to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions to that committee to inquire what measures were necessary on the part of the Senate to be taken on account of it. On the 11th of February, the committee reported a resolution that Mr. Bulwer's declaration and my reply to it "import nothing more than an admis-'sion on the part of the two Governments, or 'their functionaries, at the time of exchanging 'ratifications, that nothing contained in the treaty 'was to be considered as affecting the title or ex-'isting rights of Great Britain to the English set-'tlements in Honduras Bay, and consequently, 'that no measures are necessary on the part of the 'Senate to be taken because of Sir Henry's dec-'laration and my reply."

To this part of the report, which acquitted me of the imputations cast upon me, I of course do not object. The committee have negatived all the statements of those who declared that the Senate did not understand the treaty as I had explained it to Mr. Bulwer, or have deemed them unworthy of their notice. My triumph over these accusations is completed by the report of the very tribunal selected by my accusers in my absence to try me. But there is one part of the committee's report, which, although it is not necessary for my justification to refute it, yet is indispensable as an excuse for those who assailed me. My attitude is, therefore, in this respect, no longer merely defensive. I deny the statements of the committee so far as they go to excuse those who assailed me, and I become the accuser in my turn. The statement of the committee to which I mean to except is, that "the boundaries allotted to the British 'settlements on the Balize by the treaties of 1783 'and 1786, lie altogether within the territory of 'the Republic of Guatemala." I mean to maintain that this opinion or statement of the committee, whether considered politically, geographically, or historically, is utterly and absolutely erroneous; and that the British settlements within the boundaries allotted to them by the treaties of 1783 and 1786 are and ever have been, from the earliest history of that country, within that intendency of Mexico called Yucatan, or Merida, and never formed a portion, and do not at this day form a portion, either of the State of Guatemala, or of the ancient viceroyalty of Guatemala, or of that country which is known among statesmen by the name of Central America.

The term Central America has been used among some blundering geographers and careless travelers as applicable to many different parts of this hemisphere. I can supply the committee with several such books as "Johnson's Gazetteer," which was quoted in debate, and which describes it as containing a large portion of Mexico and the whole Republic of New Granada. Such was the character of the authority relied upon in debate here by some Senators, to prove that they understood, when they voted on the treaty of the 19th of April, 1850, that British Honduras was included in that treaty. Of course, then, they understood that the treaty covered not only a large portion of Mexico, but the whole Republic of New Granada! Now, among statesmen and legislators, the boundaries of a country designated by a particular phrase are those which their own Governments have recognized under that designation. We made a treaty, on the 5th of December, 1825, with Central America, or "Centro-America," and we have repeatedly accredited ministers, for whose missions Congress has made appropriations from time to time, to the Government of Central America. At the same time we have sent other men as ministers to New Granada as a separate Government—to Mexico as another Government—special agents to Yucatan, and consuls to British Honduras. The writers of gazetteers and careless travelers may classify countries according to fancy, and nobody is hurt by it if they happen to extend the name of Central America to the whole isthmus between North and South America, or even to the arctic circle; but a statesman is expected to speak, when writing a treaty, in the language and according to the meaning of the terms employed by his own Government in former treaties and laws. Our treaty with "Centro-America," or Central America, of December 5th, 1825, was a treaty with the confederated States of Guatemala, San Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica; and the constitution of the Republic of Central America, adopted on the 22d of November, 1824, and officially communicated to our Government before we made the treaty with that Republic, described its territories as embracing only the ancient viceroyalty of Guatemala, with the exception of the province of Chiapas. Whatever was excluded by Central America from her own limits, could not be embraced in any treaty with that Government, or any treaty respecting its territories with any other Government. So far, the committee and I agree. They have repudiated the preposterous and silly conclusions arrived at by certain gentlemen in the debate of the 6th of January. These are errors of which a schoolboy ought to be ashamed, and I content myself with referring to the facility with which the committee have rejected the geography of such learned Thebans, and adopted the conclusion that the treaty of 1850 includes nothing more than the Central America embraced in her own constitution. But the report of the committee shall not cover the ignorance of others, who asserted with so much confidence here that British Honduras was included in the treaty. I shall proceed to prove, beyond the power of successful denial, that the settlements at Balize, within the limits of the treaty of 1786, could not by possibility be included in the territory of Central America; and I now throw down the gauntlet, not only to all these wise men who thought me so silly for admitting that these settlements were not within the treaty, but even to this Committee on Foreign Relations, and invite them to defend this part of their report if they can.

I shall prove them to have been guilty of a gross error, first, by the authorities which they themselves have relied upon, and then by every authority, whether political, geographical, or historical, which is worthy of respect.

And first, as to the authorities relied upon by the committee. The report states that the Rio Hondo, the northern limit of the Balize settlement, is claimed by Guatemala to be wholly within its territory. Even if this were true, it would prove nothing; for no impartial judge ever admits a party on his own mere assertion to be the owner of any property out of his possession, and in the possession of another who claims it, as is the case here. But it is not true that Guatemala claims or ever has claimed the territory marked out for the Balize by the treaty of 1786. To sustain their assertion, the committee first quote Captain Bonnycastle's description of the boundaries of Vera Paz, which literally proves nothing at all; then they refer to the map which accompanies the work, and say that "on that, which (they admit) is upon too 'small a scale distinctly to mark the boundaries, 'the river 'Wallys' or Balize would appear marked 'in the province of Vera Paz." For the boundaries extracted from Captain Bonnycastle's "Spanish America," we are referred by the committee to vol. 1, page 165. Any man who will look at them will see that they are perfectly consistent with what that author had said before, which completely oversets the committee, and which I now proceed to quote. First:

"Yucatan is the most easterly province of the kingdom of New Spain, and is in the form of a peninsula jutting out into the Gulf of Mexico from the main land of the isthmus; it is surrounded on the northwest by the waters of the Mexican Gulf; by the Bay or Gulf or Honduras on the southeast; the province of Vera Cruz bounds it on the southwest, and Vera Paz, in Guatemala, on the south. HERE it is connected with the continent of North America by an isthmus of about one hundred and twenty miles in breadth. THE ENGLISH HAVE SETTLEMENTS EXTENDING A SHORT DISTANCE ALONG THE EAST COAST OF YUCATAN, OPPOSITE AMBURGOS KEY."—P. 122.

Then again:

"The eastern coast of Yucatan is not inhabited by Spanish colonists, the English alone appearing there, except in the small fort of Bacalar, which has been built to prevent the British from going into the interior."—P. 123.

So we see that the first authority cited by the committee entirely fails them, and proves that the British settlements are in Yucatan.

The next authority relied on by the committee is "an atlas of Guatemala, in eight maps, prepared and engraved in Guatemala, by order of the Chief of the State, C. D. Mariano Galves," in 1832, on which the committee say "the northern and west-'ern boundary of Guatemala, although called ''Lindero Indefinido,' (line undefined,) is thrown 'north of the Rio Hondo; which river, both on 'the map of the Republic of Guatemala and on 'that of the department of Vera Paz, contained in 'the atlas, is altogether within the limits of Vera 'Paz." Now, the first observation which I have to make in regard to this authority is, that a map engraved by order of the President of the United States, including the Canadas within our own limits, would not be regarded by any sensible man in a foreign nation as much proof to show that we were entitled to the Canadas; and the next remark I have to make is, that no northern and western boundary of Guatemala is laid down on these maps. The undefined line proves nothing, and the pretension that the Rio Hondo was in the department of Vera Paz is too absurb in the eyes of any man acquainted even with the pretensions of Guatemala to be credited for a moment. The map itself shows that Balize is not in Guatemala. In the State Department was a map to which this committee ought to have had access, but of which they knew nothing, which proves that the British had obtained the survey of Guatemala, found in her own archives in 1826, that is, six years before the maps relied on were made. It is entitled "Map of Guatemala, reduced from the survey in the archives of that country." It was published January 13, 1826, by Arrowsmith, the royal hydrographer. Great Britain was about to make a treaty with Mexico, and to obtain from Mexico a confirmation of her title to the settlements at Balize, derived from the Spanish treaty of 1786. It was important for Great Britain to ascertain how far Guatemala might have any claim to the Balize territory. Both Guatemala and Mexico had revolted from Spain, and Great Britain had equally recognized and favored them both. It was immaterial to her whether the Balize was situated in Mexico or Guatemala, as either of them would unhesitatingly have recognized the grant made by Spain of the "useful domain" in British Honduras, granted by the treaty with Spain of 1786. She sought to know only which had the right to grant it, and she ascertained beyond all possible doubt from the archives, not only of Mexico, but of Guatemala herself, that the British settlements at the Balize were in Yucatan. Arrowsmith's map, reduced from the survey, in the archives of Guatemala, to which I have referred, shows that Vera Paz is about one hundred and thirty miles south of the Rio Hondo and the Balize river, and that "Peten," and not Vera Paz, is the northern province of Guatemala. Vera Paz is far south of the "Wallys," or Balize, so called from the old English buccaneer Wallace, who first harbored in British Honduras. On that map, furnished from the survey of Guatemala herself, the Balize settlement extends at least fifty miles south of the river "Wallys," and no part of Guatemala is nearer than eighty miles south of the mouth of the Rio Hondo. Like every other map made by Guatemala or under her surveys, it has but little pretension to scientific arrangement; but it is represented as conveying a just idea of the then existing state of geography in Guatemala, and of her own claims as exhibited by her own original survey. I will send the map to the chairman of the committee, if he requests it; and as it is said to have been one of the very maps made by order of the British Government to ascertain from what country they should obtain a confirmation of the Spanish title of occupancy granted to the British settlers by the treaty of 1786, it is the very best evidence that Guatemala had no claims whatever to the Balize; for Great Britain could, I repeat, as easily have obtained the grant of the useful domain in the Balize from Guatemala as from Mexico. Having thus ascertained that Guatemala had no claims, she proceeded to negotiate with Mexico; and on the 26th of December afterwards, she made a treaty with Mexico, of which the following is the 14th article:

"ARTICLE XIV. The subjects of his Britannic Majesty shall, on no account or pretext whatsoever, be disturbed or molested in the peaceable possession and exercise of whatever rights, privileges, and immunities they have at any time enjoyed within the limits described and laid down in a convention, signed between his said Majesty and the King of Spain, on the 14th of July, 1786, whether such rights, privileges, and immunities shall be derived from the stipulations of the said convention, or from any other concession which may at any time have been made by the King of Spain, or his predecessors, to British subjects and settlers residing and following their lawful occupations within the limits aforesaid; the two contracting parties reserving, however, for some more fitting opportunity, the further arrangements of this article."

No such treaty was made with Guatemala that we ever heard of. We see by this treaty that Great Britain admitted that the eminent domain which Spain had lost by the revolution had descended upon Mexico. She did not seek to rob Mexico of the sovereignty over the country; she gained nothing by the treaty which Spain had not before granted to her; and as she sought only the grant of the useful domain, or merely the rights of an old settler, there was not a civilized nation on earth that would have refused to concede as much as Mexico did. If she had thought Guatemala had any right to the territory she would have applied to her to make the same grant, and that State could as well have refused to confirm the grant of lands held under her limits for any other private or special purposes as she could have refused to make the same concession which Mexico made. The rights of Great Britain, under the treaty of 1786, to occupy the land and to cut dye-wood and mahogany, to erect mills to saw it, to fish upon the coast, to refit their ships at the adjoining islands and territories embraced in the triangle described in that treaty, and to occupy those islands when the vomito would not permit them to remain on the main land, were rights which could not be divested by that very revolution which Great Britain had encouraged without manifest dishonor to the local Government. If Great Britain had sought to seize upon the territory, she could much more easily have forced the concession of it from the little State of Guatemala than from Mexico, a greatly superior Power.

The next authority relied upon by the committee is hearsay evidence, and we are not allowed to know the name of the witness. The report says:

"And the committee are informed that on the official map of Yucatan, subscribed by Señor Negra, as commissioner of that province, published in 1848, the southern boundary of that State is established on the parallel of eighteen degrees north latitude."

If this be true, it only proves that the British settlements at the Balize had encroached further upon Yucatan and Mexico than we had supposed. If, however, this fact is adduced to prove that Guatemala extends to the eighteenth degree of north latitude, it proves too much, and it cannot possibly be true, for then Guatemala would include the celebrated Bacalar, and the fort there established as the northern limit of the British settlers. It is not pretended that on this map, which the committee never saw, Yucatan is bounded by Guatemala; and if the man who gave this information will produce the map, I will stake the whole issue between the committee and myself on the fact that the southern boundary of Yucatan will appear by it to be on British Honduras, or Balize.

The next and last authorities relied upon by this committee to prove that British Honduras lies in the State of Guatemala are still more remarkable. This part of the report is so extraordinary in its character that I dare not attempt to state the mere substance of it lest I should do the committee injustice. I will "speak by the book lest equivocation should undo me." It is, literally, as follows:

"In 1834 the State of Guatemala, made a large grant of land to a company, on condition of actual settlement, in the neighborhood of the 'Bay of Honduras,' when the British authorities at Balize interposed and forbid the settlement, claiming that the grant was within their boundaries. This collision led the Government of Central America to make it the occasion of a special commission to England to settle and adjust the respective rights of the Republic of Guatemala and of Great Britain, in reference to the British settlements in this quarter. This fact was communicated to the Government of the United States by M. Alvarez, Secretary for Foreign Affairs of the Central American Confederation, in a dispatch to the Secretary of State, dated December 30, 1834, and the good offices of this Government with the British Court were solicited in the proposed negotiation. In that dispatch the Secretary of State, reminded of the avowed policy of this Government concerning European colonization on the American continents, is referred to the aggressions and encroachments at Balize upon the territory of Central America. The mission, it appears, was fruitless.

"The British Government, claiming that Don Juan Galindo, the Minister, was a British subject by birth, refused to accredit him as the Minister of Central America. In one of the letters of this Minister, Don Galindo, whilst in Washington, to the Secretary of State, dated June 3, 1835, he communicates a paper, prepared and published in Guatemala, by Señor Annitia, a member of the Federal Congress of Central America for the State of Guatemala, in which, reciting that 'the English settlements between the Rio Hondo and the Balize are in our territory,' an able and forcible exposition is made of the injury resulting to Central America by the smuggling openly carried on at the Balize, in defiance of the revenue laws of the Confederation; and a strong remonstrance against the pretensions of the authorities there claiming a right to occupy as they held in 1821, (the date of the revolution,) and regardless of the treaty limits with Spain. In the letter of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, before referred to, this encroachment is stated at more than forty-five leagues."

The only thing in all this statement of the committee which can be relied upon as the claim of Guatemala herself, in regard to the extent of her own territories, is the letter of Alvarez, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs of the Government of Central America. The letters of John Galindo, an Irishman, who came here merely as a bearer of dispatches, and so states in his letter of the 22d of May, 1835, and whom the British Government refused to receive as a commissioner to remonstrate against the alleged British encroachments on Guatemala, and the paper of Señor Annitia, which is a magniloquent address or speech by a member of Congress of Central America to the people there, (never intended for us,) from which he doubtless expected to derive much petty local popularity, do not bind the Government of Guatemala, are not uttered by her authority, and are worth about as much as the letters of one of our own bearer of dispatches abroad setting forth the claims of our Government, or the speeches of one of our modern advocates of the Monroe doctrine, when threatening here among us quiet old gentlemen to sweep the British from all the country north of 49°, or to annex all Central America to the United States. We know, from the letter of Mr. Dickens, Acting Secretary of State, of the 10th of June, 1835, to this John Galindo, that the subject of the letter of Alvarez must have been made a Cabinet question; for the Secretary pledged himself in that letter that it should be brought to the consideration of the President. Picture to yourself, then, General Jackson and his Cabinet in session; the Senator from Michigan, then being Secretary of War, occupies the third seat at the cabinet table; John Forsyth produces the letter of Alvarez and reads it. I do not believe he soiled his fingers with the speech of Señor Annitia to his constituents in Central America, or with the letters of John Galindo, whom the committee have dignified with the name of the "Minister" Don Galindo. When Mr. Forsyth read the passage of the letter of Alvarez, declaring that "it had always been the policy of the United States to prevent and resist European settlements in America, and that the aggressions and encroachments at Balize were a dangerous and alarming violation of this principle," what do you suppose was the appearance and language of General Jackson, who came into power upon the adverse principle, supported by a party which violently denounced the Monroe doctrines, Clay's instructions to Poinsett, and the authors of the Panama mission especially, and all their works? The Senator from Michigan no doubt sustained the Monroe doctrine and the principles of the Panama mission. But how came it about that the "mission" of John Galindo, the speech of Señor Annitia, and the letter of Secretary Alvarez, were all treated with perfect contempt, or at least passed over in perfect silence? We know that General Jackson refused to take any notice of the subject, as he did of the application of the Government of San Salvador asking admission into our Union.

But this letter of Alvarez, when carefully examined, conclusively shows that the Central American Government at the time did not pretend that the boundaries of the British settlement, under the treaty of 1786, were within their limits. All they claimed was that "the boundaries should be according to the letter of the convention of 1786." They did not complain of the British settlement within those limits, but they did complain "of an encroachment beyond those limits by more than forty-five leagues." They expressly admitted the limits of Balize, which, they said, were "definitely fixed by the treaty of 1786;" and they admitted the Mexican title or "high domain" over the territory of Balize, by saying that "the original 'treaty limits had been ratified in 1826, by the 'treaty between Great Britain and the Republic of 'Mexico." They sent John Galindo to England to complain, not of the settlement within the limits of the treaty, but of the encroachments beyond them; and the passage cited by the committee from the letter of Alvarez to prove that the settlement of Balize, within the treaty limits, was upon the territory of Central America, proves directly the reverse, as it shows that only the aggressions and encroachments at Balize were upon that territory. As I consider this dispatch of M. Alvarez as conclusively admitting that British Honduras, within the treaty limits, was not in Central America on the 30th of December, 1834, I ask the reading of that letter.

It was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
ST. SALVADOR, December 30, 1834.

SIR: A short time since the authorities of the State of Guatemala granted, for purposes of settlement, sundry lands situated in the neighborhood of the Bay of Honduras to a company, whose object was to form a national establishment upon them. As soon, however, as the authorities of Balize were informed of this grant, they declared that the lands in question were within their jurisdiction, were their property; and they positively refused to give the contractors possession of a right which now justly belongs to them.

This extravagant pretension is plainly contrary to the convention of 1786, based upon that of 1783, between their Britannic and Catholic Majesties, which definitively fixed the confines of Balize, within which the inhabitants were to keep themselves; which convention, having been ratified by the respective courts in 1814, and subsequently in 1826, by the treaty between Great Britain and the Republic of Mexico, it seems clear, without entering into questions of another description, that the boundaries should be according to the letter of that convention.

The inhabitants of Balize, who have exceeded the established limits by more than forty-five leagues, found their pretensions upon the circumstance of their having occupied the lands in controversy prior to the independence of Central America. But such a violation of existing treaties, persisted in despite the earnest and repeated remonstrances of the Spanish authorities, cannot give those of Balize a lawful right to consider that as their own which they have in fact usurped.

An affair of such magnitude has constrained the Government of Central America to accredit Colonel John Galindo to the British Cabinet; and the Vice President of this Republic does not doubt that, through your honorable conduct, the President of the United States may make the most pointed intimations to the court of his Majesty upon the subject, and that he will take a lively interest to the end that the rights of a nation, who is a sister and a friend of that of the North, may not be violated.

The mediation of the President will doubtless give greater weight to the representations which our Commissioner may make to the British Government; and this Republic would deem such a measure a most decided proof of friendship and of a concern for her rights. Suffer me, upon this occasion, to remind you that it has always been an object of the policy of the United States that there should be no European settlements upon the American continent, and that the aggressions and encroachments at Balize upon the territory of Central America are a dangerous and an alarming violation of this principle. It belongs to your great and happy Republic to place herself in the vanguard of a policy so interesting to the new American States, and to uphold with her name our rights in the presence of England.

Meanwhile I have the honor to tender to your Excellency the most distinguished sentiments of the consideration with which I am your Excellency's very devoted and obedient servant, M. ALVAREZ.

The SECRETARY OF STATE, of the Department of Foreign Affairs of the Government of the Republic of North America.

I will only add that even the letter of John Galindo admits that the British are entitled to occupy the town of Balize, though I do not consider his letter as compromitting any interest, for he disregarded all historical truth, and did not represent Central America or anything else. A letter of Mr. Murphy to the Secretary of State proves that he was an impostor, and was never accredited to England as a commissioner from Central America, but only from the little State of Guatemala.

I have now examined every authority cited by the committee, and by each of them I have proved that the report of the committee is erroneous. All these authorities prove the Balize to be in Yucatan, and nearly all contain the admissions of Guatemala herself, that the conclusion of the committee is utterly destitute of foundation.

Notwithstanding the committee state in one part of their report that "from the information before them, they entertain a decided opinion that the British settlements at Balize, as defined by the treaties with Spain, lie within the territory of the Republic of Guatemala, and so equally constitute a part of Central America," yet they evidently doubt whether "the information before them" was sufficient to establish that fact; for in the very next paragraph they add, that "in the event of its being ascertained hereafter that these British settlements on Honduras Bay lie in whole or in part north and west of the proper boundaries of Guatemala, though they would not, in such case, form any part of Central America, and thus are not within the strict engagements of the treaty, yet that any colonies or other permanent establishments there by Great Britain or any other European Power, must necessarily excite the most anxious concern of this Government, and would, if persisted in, lead to consequences of most unpleasant character."

As the committee thus avow themselves doubtful of the "decided opinion" they expressed, I will proceed to strengthen their doubts, and to refute their opinion, by giving them the information which was not before them. Their report says that "by some of the European geographers, [not Spanish,] these British settlements are spoken of as in Yucatan." The first authority to which I shall refer them, as they have denied that Spanish geographers have so spoken, is the "Dictionario Geographico" of Don Antonio de Alcedo, published at Madrid, in 1786. I quote from the English edition, translated by Thompson, in five volumes quarto, London, 1812:

"BALIS, RIO DE, a river in the province and Government of Yucatan, which runs into the sea upon the same coast near the strand of Bacalar, and into the bay which is formed by that strand and Long Island."—Vol. 1, p. 129.

After mentioning the thirteen provinces of Guatemala, Alcedo expressly mentions Yucatan among the provinces of "Nueva-Espanś," [Mexico.]—Vol. 2, p. 64, and vol. 3, p. 106. The authority is the more conclusive, as the writer, who was a Spaniard, published his work at Madrid in 1786, the date of the convention which fixed the limits of the Balize settlement. In volume 2, page 207, Alcedo says: "The kingdom of 'Guatemala' is bounded on the northeast by the province of Yucatan."

The next authority to which I refer is Humboldt's "Political Essay on the Kingdom of New Spain, containing researches relative to the Geography of Mexico," translated from the original French by John Black, published in New York in 1811. This work of Humboldt "underwent the examination of the Spanish Government before it was published in Paris in 1810." In vol. 1, p. 203, the intendency of Merida, or Yucatan, is included among the twelve intendencies of Mexico; and in vol. 2, p. 159, the author says: "The intendency of 'Merida comprehends the great peninsula of Yu-'catan, situated between the bays of Campeachy 'and Honduras." Observe, it comprehends the whole of the "peninsula," not merely a part of it. Again: Humboldt says on the same page:

"The province of Merida is bounded on the south by the kingdom of Guatemala, on the east by the intendency of Vera Cruz, on the west by the English establishments which extend from the mouth of the Rio Hondo to the north of the Bay of Hanover, opposite the island of Ubero, [Ambergris Key.] In this quarter, Salamanca, or the small fort of San Felipe de Bacalar, is the most southern point inhabited by the Spaniards."

Again, the author says, on page 160:

"Since the settlement of the English between Omo [Omoa] and the Rio Hondo, the Government, to diminish the contraband trade, concentrated the Spanish and Indian population in the part of the peninsula west from the mountains of Yucatan. Colonists are not permitted to settle on the western [error, for eastern] coast, on the branches of the Rio Bacalar and Rio Hondo. All this vast country remains uninhabited, with the exception of the military post [presidio] of Salamanca."

And on the map of Humboldt the British settlements are included in the peninsula of Yucatan.

The next work to which I refer is that of the celebrated French geographer, (the greatest of the age,) Malte-Brun, printed at Paris in 1847, p. 725, from which I make the following extract:

"COLONIE ANGLAISE.—Sur le territoire de l'ancien état Mexicain d'Yucatan, les Anglais possèdent à l'embouchure de la Balize, rivière qui se jette dans la baie de Honduras, une colonie composée de 4,000 habitans. Elle porte le nom de colonie de Honduras. Son chef lieu est Balize, petite ville avec un port situé à l'endroit où la rivière de ce nom se jette dans le mer."

Having thus described the British settlement as a British colony in the ancient State of Yucatan, in Mexico, at the Balize, a river which empties into the Bay of Honduras, which British colony is called the colony of Honduras, M. Malte-Brun says, p. 740, that the ancient captaincy general of Guatemala, or confederation of Central America, is bounded on the Gulf of Honduras and the Bay of Mosquitos. In the 3d volume of the American edition of 1827, p. 301, Malte-Brun speaks of "the peninsula of Yucatan, or the intendency of Merida," and says:

"We have distinguished on our maps, under the name of ENGLISH YUCATAN, that part of the peninsula which lies to the south of the river Honda, [Hondo,] and of the Spanish military post of Salamanca."

Domingo Juanos, a Spaniard, in his "History of Guatemala," says that "the jurisdiction of the 'Royal Audiencia and Chancery of Guatemala 'extended along the Atlantic from the coast of Ba-'lize, in the Bay of Honduras, to the Escudo de 'Veraguay."

In the third volume of the London Encyclopedia, page 419, we find that—

"Balize is a river in the peninsula of Yucatan, South America, which falls into the Bay of Honduras, in latitude 14° 69′ N. On its banks, and to the extent of two hundred miles up the stream, the English cut mahogany, and by the treaty of 1783 a right was guarantied to British subjects of cutting and carrying away logwood in the district between this river and the Rio Hondo. Beyond the scene of their operation the Balize is very imperfectly known."

Again:

"Balize, a sea-port town of Yucatan, South America, is an establishment chiefly composed of English settlers at the mouth of the above river."—Ibid.

I could fill a volume with British authorities, describing, at various periods during the last hundred years, their settlements in Honduras as being in Mexico or Yucatan. The committee avoided all these; and their report declares that "respect 'for the State of Guatemala requires of this Gov-'ernment to recognize the boundaries she has 'prescribed for herself, at least until they are 'successfully controverted by those territorially 'interested." Why did not respect for Great Britain equally require of this Government equally to recognize the boundaries she has prescribed for herself; or at least equally refer to her claims? With her we have an existing treaty of peace, amity, and commerce, and yet no English authorities are referred to for the purpose of showing her pretensions, although so much more easy of access. I shall not dwell upon them; but, having cited the French and Spanish authorities, I shall conclude my review of the report by referring to some of the leading American authorities on the subject.

Darby informs us that "Balize is a river of 'North America, in Yucatan, and on its banks 'the English have their principal settlements for 'cutting mahogany," &c.

The "Encyclopedia Americana" defines Balize as a "sea-port of Mexico, in Yucatan, at the mouth of the river Balize," and says "it is the only settlement belonging to the British on the coast." The character of Francis Leiber, the editor, as a man of science, can be stated by the Senators from South Carolina.

In the "Encyclopedia of Geography," by Hugh Murray, revised by Bradford, published in 1837, page 328, the author, after speaking of Merida and Campeachy, on the western side of the peninsula of Yucatan, says: "On the other side of 'the peninsula of Yucatan the British possess the 'settlement of Honduras, extending along the 'shore from the Rio Hondo to the Liburn."

I have no time to cite other geographical works to which I could readily refer, but I may be permitted to quote the instructions given by my immediate predecessor, Mr. Buchanan, who, as I think, was qualified to judge of this question, and who, in his letter to Mr. Hise, of the 3d of June, 1848, describes the country ceded by the treaties of 1783 and 1786, when referring to the British encroachments, as the "present British province of the Balize," and as the "established British colony of the Balize," to which he, under the direction of Mr. Polk, appointed a consul, thus directly recognizing the colony as a British colony long before the treaty of the 4th of July, 1850, and still longer before the 11th of February, 1853, when this committee declared that the whole territory was in Central America. If it were so, why did Mr. Polk and Mr. Buchanan seek and obtain the exequatur for Mr. Hempstead, our Consul at the Balize, from the British Government, and not from Guatemala? If there had been any foundation for the "decided opinion" of this committee, was NOT the course adopted by Mr. Polk and Mr. Buchanan a direct insult to Guatemala? And why did the members of this committee, who now show no respect for the rights of Great Britain, and refuse even to quote her pretensions to the territory, relying, as they have done, exclusively upon the mere claims of Guatemala, then pass over in silence all that was done by Mr. Polk's administration, acknowledging the domain to be in Great Britain by asking her consent to the consulate at Balize?

I now leave those gentlemen who were so confident that British Honduras was in Central America, on the 6th of January last, and who said they would not have voted for the treaty if they had not believed it was there, to the enjoyment of their own reflections.

My next object is to vindicate the treaty, which received the vote of forty-two Senators against ten. To do this I shall review the history of the principle on which it was negotiated.

The principle which for twenty years has governed all the negotiations of the American Government on the great subject of an interoceanic communication between the Atlantic and Pacific, across the isthmus which divides North from South America, was suggested by a unanimous vote of Senate, in Executive session, on the third day of March, 1835. The resolution then adopted by the Senate is in the following words:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of other nations, and particularly with the Governments of Central America and New Granada, for the purpose of effectually protecting, by suitable treaty stipulations with them, such individuals or companies as may undertake to open a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, by the construction of a ship canal across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever, by such stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations, on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established to compensate the capitalists who may engage in such undertaking and complete the work."

This resolution was at the time debated by Daniel Webster, John Forsyth, and myself. It had long been a cherished object with me to procure some communication across the isthmus which would bring this country nearer to the territories on the Pacific, and draw the treasures of that mighty ocean, with its ten thousand fertile and productive islands, into the ports of the United States. I thought then, and still think, that the opening of such a passage was of paramount importance not only to my own country but to all others; and that even if, in completing such a work, fifty or a hundred millions of dollars (ay, one half the money vainly expended in attempting to discover a northwest passage) should be expended, it would be a cheaper outlay, and render more benefits and blessings to the world, than an equal expenditure in any other enterprise that had ever been or could be undertaken by man. I introduced the resolution just eighteen years ago last Friday, and on the next day Congress adjourned, and John Forsyth entered upon the duties of Secretary of State, under the administration of President Jackson. The suggestion contained in the resolution met with a warm and hearty approval from the President; and on the first day of May, 1835, Charles Biddle was charged with the duty of making inquiries, with a view to enable the Executive to comply with it. Mr. Forsyth's instructions to Mr. Biddle direct him to proceed by the most direct route to Lake Nicaragua, to explore the contemplated communication by canal or railroad in that quarter, for which purpose every facility was granted to Mr. Biddle. He was afterwards directed to proceed to examine the Panama route, and such other points on the Atlantic side of the isthmus as would probably be fixed on for the termination of a road. I was anxious at the time that William Radcliff, the former consul at Chagres, who had devoted much of his life to the examination of the subject, should receive the appointment. But, unfortunately, he was no politician. Mr. Biddle disobeyed his instructions—never visited Nicaragua; and after having procured from the Government of New Granada an exclusive grant of the right of way across the isthmus of Panama, vesting in citizens of the United States the monopoly of the route, in direct opposition to the resolution of the Senate, he returned home, and then, for the first time, coolly informed Mr. Forsyth that it "appeared to him unnecessary at present to enter into any negotiations with foreign nations upon the subject."

His idea of an exclusive grant to our citizens of the right of way was in accordance with the opinion of Mr. Hise, subsequently appointed by Mr. Polk. Both negotiated for a monopoly of the passage in our own citizens. But there was this difference between them: that the grant negotiated by Mr. Biddle provided that two thirds of the stock created by it should be "the property of 'Charles Biddle and such citizens of the United 'States as he might associate with him, the office 'of the company to be in Philadelphia, and all 'installments to be paid there, and the number of 'directors to be in the same proportion as the 'quantity of stock." President Jackson was highly displeased with the result; and Mr. Forsyth, on the 23d of September, 1836, immediately after ascertaining the facts, in a dispatch to Robert B. McAfee, our Chargé d'Affaires at Bogota, disavowed and censured the whole proceeding, and directed him "to disclaim all connection with the 'project on the part of this Government, to pre-'vent any misunderstanding with the Govern-'ment of New Granada." The whole object of the Senate and the President was thus frustrated by the incompetency of the agent. President Jackson shortly after went out of office. But the subject was not permitted to sleep. The records of the State Department show that during every succeeding Administration that Department has been engaged in the consideration of this subject, and especially in the acquisition of information necessary to enable it to act with effect. In the admirable dispatch of Mr. Wheaton, of the 17th December, 1845, it is observed that, "in the letter 'of instructions given in 1826 by Mr. Clay, then 'Secretary of State, to our plenipotentiaries ap-'pointed to attend the Congress of Panama, ref-'erence is had to a correspondence on this subject 'between him and the Minister of Central Amer-'ica; and it was stated that if the work [a canal] 'should ever be executed so as to admit of the 'passage of sea vessels, the benefits of it ought 'not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, 'but should be extended to all parts of the globe, upon 'the payment of a just compensation or reason-'able tolls."

By recurring to the instructions given to our Minister to Panama by Mr. Clay in 1826, it will be seen that President Adams fully approved the principle subsequently adopted by the American Government, so far at least as to negative the idea that it was either the interest or the duty of the American people to obtain a monopoly of the right of way. Mr. Wheaton correctly observes that after the failure of Mr. Biddle's grant, and a subsequent similar grant of exclusive privileges to Baron Thierry, the subject was again taken up in 1839 in the House of Representatives of the United States, on the memorial of the merchants of New York and Philadelphia, on which a very elaborate report was made by Mr. Mercer, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, accompanied with documents and maps illustrative of this important subject. The report concluded with proposing a resolution that the President should be requested "to consider the expediency of opening 'or continuing negotiations with the Governments 'of other nations, and particularly with those the 'territorial jurisdiction of which comprehends the 'Isthmus of Panama, and to which the United 'States have accredited ministers or agents, for 'the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of 'effecting a communication between the Atlantic 'and Pacific oceans, by the construction of a ship 'canal across the isthmus, and of securing forever, 'by suitable treaty stipulations, the free and equal 'right of navigating such canal to all nations." This resolution was unanimously agreed to by the House. It will be seen that it is almost a literal copy of the Senate's resolution of the 3d of March, 1835.

It thus appears that the House of Representatives adopted the identical principle established by the President and Senate four years previously. Mr. Adams and Mr. Clay had merely proposed that the benefits of the communication between the two oceans should not be exclusively appropriated to one nation, and should be extended to all parts of the globe on the same terms. But during the administration of President Jackson, we see that our Government extended the principle to the length embraced in the resolution of the Senate; and during the administration of President Van Buren, the House of Representatives adopted the same principle by a resolution in nearly the same words. In 1847, President Polk carried the principle into practical execution by the treaty which was negotiated with the Government of New Granada. In his executive message to the Senate of the 10th of February, 1847, communicating the treaty with New Granada in regard to a canal or railroad across the Isthmus of Panama, he quotes at full length the resolution of the Senate of the 3d of March, 1835; approves of the policy adopted by President Jackson and the Senate at that period; denies the policy of obtaining an exclusive grant or monopoly of the right of way to the American people; and vindicates the principle of opening the communication to all nations on the same terms, and of constituting alliances by negotiation, not for political objects, but for purely commercial purposes, equally interesting to all the navigating nations of the world. I ask the Secretary to read the message:

"To the Senate of the United States:

"I transmit to the Senate, for their advice with regard to its ratification, 'a general treaty of peace, amity, navigation, and commerce, between the United States of America and the Republic of New Granada,' concluded at Bogota on the 12th of December last, by Benjamin A. Bidlack, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States, on their part, and by Manuel Maria Mallarino, Secretary of State and Foreign Relations, on the part of that Republic.

"It will be perceived by the thirty-fifth article of this treaty that New Granada proposes to guaranty to the Government and citizens of the United States the right of passage across the Isthmus of Panama, over the natural roads, and over any canal or railroad which may be constructed to unite the two seas, on condition that the United States shall make a similar guaranty to New Granada of the neutrality of this portion of her territory, and her sovereignty over the same.

"The reasons which caused the insertion of this important stipulation in the treaty will be fully made known to the Senate by the accompanying documents. From these it will appear that our chargé d'affaires acted, in this particular, upon his own responsibility, and without instructions. Under such circumstances, it became my duty to decide whether I would submit the treaty to the Senate; and, after mature consideration, I have determined to adopt this course.

"The importance of the concession to the commercial and political interests of the United States cannot easily be overrated. The route by the Isthmus of Panama is the shortest between the two oceans; and, from the information herewith communicated, it would seem to be the most practicable for a railroad or canal.

"The vast advantages to our commerce which would result from such a communication, not only with the west coast of America, but with Asia and the islands of the Pacific, are too obvious to require any detail. Such a passage would relieve us from a long and dangerous navigation of more than nine thousand miles around Cape Horn, and render our communication with our own possessions on the northwest coast of America comparatively easy and speedy.

"The communication across the isthmus has attracted the attention of the Government of the United States ever since the independence of the South American Republics. On the 3d of March, 1835, a resolution passed the Senate in the following words:

"'Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of other nations, and particularly with the Governments of Central America and New Granada, for the purpose of effectually protecting, by suitable treaty stipulations with them, such individuals or companies as may undertake to open a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, by the construction of a ship-canal across the isthmus which connects North and South America; and of securing forever, by such stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations, on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established, to compensate the capitalists who may engage in such undertaking and complete the work.'

"No person can be more deeply sensible than myself of the danger of entangling alliances with any foreign nation. That we should avoid such alliances has become a maxim of our policy, consecrated by the most venerated names which adorn our history, and sanctioned by the unanimous voice of the American people. Our own experience has taught us the wisdom of this maxim in the only instance—that of the guarantee to France of her American possessions—in which we have ever entered into such an alliance. If, therefore, the very peculiar circumstances of the present case do not greatly impair, if not altogether destroy, the force of this objection, then we ought not to enter into the stipulation, whatever may be its advantages. The general considerations which have induced me to transmit the treaty to the Senate, for their advice, may be summed up in the following particulars:

"1. The treaty does not propose to guaranty a territory to a foreign nation in which the United States will have no common interest with that nation. On the contrary, we are more deeply and directly interested in the subject of this guarantee than New Granada herself, or any other country.

"2. The guarantee does not extend to the territories of New Granada generally, but is confined to the single province of the Isthmus of Panama, where we shall acquire by the treaty a common and coextensive right of passage with herself.

"3. It will constitute no alliance for any political object, but for a purely commercial purpose, in which all the navigating nations of the world have a common interest.

"4. In entering into the mutual guarantees proposed by the thirty-fifth article of the treaty, neither the Government of New Granada nor that of the United States has any narrow or exclusive views. The ultimate object, as presented by the Senate of the United States in their resolution, to which I have already referred, is to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the isthmus. If the United States, as the chief of the American nations, should first become a party to this guarantee, it cannot be doubted—indeed, it is confidently expected by the Government of New Granada—that similar guarantees will be given to that Republic by Great Britain and France. Should the proposition thus tendered be rejected, we may deprive the United States of the just influence which its acceptance might secure to them, and confer the glory and benefits of being first among the nations in concluding such an arrangement upon the Government either of Great Britain or France. That either of these Governments would embrace the offer, cannot well be doubted; because there does not appear to be any other effectual means of securing to all nations the advantages of this important passage but the guarantee of great commercial Powers that the isthmus shall be neutral territory. The interests of the world at stake are so important that the security of this passage between the two oceans cannot be suffered to depend upon the wars and revolutions which may arise among different nations.

"Besides, such a guarantee is almost indispensable to the construction of a railroad or canal across the territory. Neither sovereign States nor individuals would expend their capital in the construction of the expensive works, without some such security for their investments.

"The guarantee of the sovereignty of New Granada over the isthmus is a natural consequence of the guarantee of its neutrality, and there does not seem to be any other practicable mode of securing the neutrality of this territory. New Granada would not consent to yield up this province in order that it might become a neutral State; and if she should, it is not sufficiently populous or wealthy to establish and maintain an independent sovereignty. But a civil Government must exist there, in order to protect the works which shall be constructed. New Granada is a Power which will not excite the jealousy of any nation. If Great Britain, France, or the United States held the sovereignty over the isthmus, other nations might apprehend that, in case of war, the Government would close up the passage against the enemy: but no such fears can ever be entertained in regard to New Granada."

The vote on the treaty was as follows:

"YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Bagby, Benton, Berrien, Borland, Bradbury, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Davis of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Downs, Foote, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Lewis, Moore, Niles, Rusk, Sebastian, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, Westcott, and Yulee—29.

"NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Clarke, Davis of Massachusetts, Dayton, Hale, Miller, and Upham—7."

It thus appears that every Democratic Senator of that day voted for the treaty. The Senator from Illinois, it would seem, is not of that school.

When I went into the office of Secretary of State under President Taylor, I found that a company of British capitalists contemplated the formation of a ship canal by the way of the river San Juan and Lake Nicaragua, and that they had employed Mr. Wheelright, an English gentleman, to make the necessary arrangements and obtain the requisite grant for that purpose from the Government of Nicaragua. At the same time a company of American capitalists, the chief of whom was Mr. Vanderbilt, of New York, was engaged in the prosecution of the same purpose, and had employed an agent to procure a grant from Nicaragua in their behalf. Supposing that Great Britain would throw her influence in favor of the English adventurers, the American capitalists naturally sought the aid of their own Government. The President appointed E. George Squier chargé d'affaires to Central America, in lieu of Elijah Hise, who had been appointed to the same place during the administration of President Polk. His instructions, dated the 1st of May, 1849, fully explain the object of the appointment of Mr. Squier, in aiding the American capitalists to obtain the grant of the right of way, and to carry out the principles of the resolution of the 3d of March, 1835. Those instructions, after denying the validity of the Mosquito title, and asserting that of the State of Nicaragua, arrive at the conclusion that the United States, being interested in a free passage to and from the Pacific ocean by the way of the river San Juan and Lake Nicaragua, cannot tamely allow that interest to be thwarted by the pretensions set up by Great Britain as the protector of the Mosquito coast. As it is necessary to explain the policy of this Government, and especially that of President Taylor, I trust I shall be pardoned for quoting the following passage from the instructions which I gave to the minister to Central America before he proceeded on his mission:

"Having now sufficiently apprised you of the views of this Department in regard to the title to the Mosquito coast, I desire you distinctly to understand how important it is deemed by the President so to conduct all our negotiations on the subject of the Nicaragua pass as not to involve this country in any entangling alliances or any unnecessary controversy. We desire no monopoly of the right of way for our commerce, and we cannot submit to it if claimed for that of any other nation. If we held and enjoyed such a monopoly, it would entail upon us more bloody and expensive wars than the struggle for Gibraltar has caused to England and Spain. The same calamities would infallibly be cast upon any other nation claiming to exclude the commerce of the rest of the world. We only ask an equal right of passage for all nations on the same terms—a passage unencumbered by oppressive exactions either from the local government within whose sovereign limits it may be effected, or from the proprietors of the canal when accomplished. For this end we are willing to enter into a treaty stipulation with the Government of Nicaragua, that both Governments shall forever protect and defend the proprietors who may succeed in cutting the canal and opening the water communication between the two oceans for our commerce. Without such protection, it is not believed that this great enterprise would ever be successful. Nicaragua is a feeble State, and capitalists, proverbially a timid race, may apprehend from the rapacity of great maritime Powers the obstruction and even the seizure of the canal. Similar apprehensions on their part, from revolutions in the local government, from the oppression and exactions of temporary chieftains, and from causes not necessary to be explained, may operate to retard a work in regard to which it may be safely predicted, that when successfully accomplished, its benefits to mankind will transcend those of any other similar work known in the history of the world. All these apprehensions may and will be removed by the solemn pledge of protection given by the United States, and especially when it is known that our object in giving it is not to acquire for ourselves any exclusive or partial advantage over other nations. Nicaragua will be at liberty to enter into the same treaty stipulations with any other nation that may claim to enjoy the same benefits, and will agree to be bound by the same guarantee. In desiring that our own countrymen may obtain the charter or grant of the right to make the canal, we do not mean to be misunderstood. Our purpose in aiding American citizens to obtain the grant is to encourage them in a laudable effort, relying, as their Government does, more on their skill and enterprise than that of others. If they themselves prefer to unite with their own the capital of foreigners who may desire to embark in the undertaking, this Government will not object to that. We should naturally be proud of such an achievement as an American work; but if European aid be necessary to accomplish it, why should we repudiate it, seeing that our object is as honest as it is openly avowed, to claim no peculiar privilege, no exclusive right, no monopoly of commercial intercourse, but to see that the work is dedicated to the benefit of mankind, to be used by all on the same terms with us, and consecrated to the enjoyment and diffusion of the unnumbered and inestimable blessings which must flow from it to all the civilized world?

"You will not want arguments to induce Nicaragua to enter into such a treaty with us. The canal will be productive of more benefit to her than any other country of the same limits. With the aid of the treaty it may (without such protection from some Power equal to our own, it cannot) be accomplished. Let your negotiation with her be frank, open, and unreserved, as to all our purposes. The same reasons for our interference must be avowed to the capitalists who may enlist in the work. Before you treat for their protection, look well to their contract with Nicaragua. See that it is not assignable to others, that no exclusive privileges are granted to any nation that will not agree to the same treaty stipulations with Nicaragua, that the tolls to be demanded by the owners are not unreasonable or oppressive, that no power be reserved to the proprietors of the canal or their successors to extort at any time hereafter, or unjustly obstruct or embarrass, the right of passage. This will require all your vigilance and skill. If they do not agree to grant us passage on reasonable and proper terms, refuse our protection and our countenance to procure the contract from Nicaragua. If a charter or grant of the right of way shall have been incautiously or inconsiderately made before your arrival in that country, seek to have it properly modified to answer the ends we have in view."

It will thus be seen that the policy of President Taylor was not only in accordance with the resolution of 1835, but with the principles adopted by both Houses of Congress, and with those of every President of the United States from the days of Presidents Adams and Jackson to this time, so far as we have the means of ascertaining them.

But, it will be asked, if the views of President Polk were really such as are here represented, why was it that he suffered Mr. Hise to violate the principle and abandon the whole policy of the Government by the negotiation of Mr. Hise's treaty with Nicaragua of the 21st of June, 1849, by which Nicaragua grants "to the United States, 'or to a company of the citizens thereof, the exclu- 'sive right and privilege to make, construct, and 'build, within the territories of the State of Nicar-'agua, through and by the use and means of any 'of the streams, rivers, bays, harbors, lakes, or 'lands, under the jurisdiction or within the limits 'of said State, a canal or canals, or road or roads, 'either railways or turnpikes, or any other kind of 'roads, for the purpose of opening a convenient 'passage and communication between the Carib-'bean sea and the Pacific ocean?" The answer is, that Mr. Polk never assented to or authorized any such thing. Mr. Hise acted in making the treaty not only without instructions and beyond his powers, but in direct opposition to the instructions which Mr. Buchanan gave him in his letter of the 3d of June, 1848. He went with powers to conclude a common treaty of commerce with the Republics of Guatemala and San Salvador. But Mr. Buchanan expressly added, "it is not, however, 'deemed advisable to empower you to conclude a 'treaty with either Nicaragua, Honduras, or Costa 'Rica, until you shall have communicated to the 'Department more full and authentic statistic in-'formation in regard to those States than that which 'it now possesses." Mr. Hise's treaty, granting to us the exclusive right of way, was not only hostile to all the views and opinions of Mr. Polk, but it was also adverse to the sentiments of Mr. Buchanan, the Secretary, as expressed by him to Mr. Crampton, the British Minister, on the 22d of May, 1848, at which time Mr. Buchanan requested Mr. Crampton to ascertain Lord Palmerston's opinion with regard to a plan he felt very anxious to give effect to for the establishment of a communication by a railroad, in the first instance, and afterwards, if practicable, by a ship canal, across the Isthmus of Panama, between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans.

The great obstacle which had prevented the execution of this important undertaking had been, in Mr. Buchanan's opinion, the want of security for property in the territory which embraces the isthmus, resulting from the continual revolutions and hostilities of the Republics of Central America; and for this state of things he proposed the remedy by the conclusion of a treaty between Great Britain and the United States, admitting as parties to it, should it be thought desirable, France or any other great commercial Power, by which treaty the perpetual neutrality of the province in which the Isthmus of Panama is situated should be guarantied. Mr. Buchanan proposed to afford the advantage of the communication at a moderate toll to all nations. In these views, General Herrau, the Minister of New Granada, concurred. The British Minister himself is my authority for the fact.

We know, therefore, that the views of Mr. Buchanan concurred with the principle established in 1835, and that he could not have yielded his approbation to Mr. Hise's treaty for a monopoly.

But Mr. Hise's treaty, independently of the objection on the ground of the exclusive privileges it conferred, was liable to others.

By the third article—

"It is agreed that if the Government of the United States shall decide not to undertake and construct the said works, then either the President or Congress thereof shall have the power and authority to frame, enact, and issue a charter or act of incorporation, containing such liberal provisions, and such grants of rights and privileges, (not inconsistent with the rights of the contracting parties herein secured,) as may be necessary, convenient, or proper to effect the great objects in view."

We see, then, that Mr. Hise's treaty proposed, first, that the Government of the United States should undertake and construct the canal in Nicaragua; and, secondly, if it should decide not to do so, then either the President or Congress should issue a charter or act of incorporation for the purpose. As to the first proposition, I have never yet met with any man of any party who supposed that our Government had power to make improvements outside the United States and their territories. Mr. Polk denied that it had power to make internal improvements, and Mr. Buchanan was of the same strict-construction school. As to the second proposition, to confer upon the President or Congress the power to issue a charter or act of incorporation for the purpose of cutting a canal in Nicaragua, I need not ask the question, Who believes that either of them could exercise such a power under the Constitution? No foreign Government could confer a greater power upon our President or our Congress than the Constitution delegates to them. The power of Congress to create a corporation within the limits of the United States was denied by Mr. Polk. But if there be any man (except the Senator from Illinois, Mr. DOUGLAS) who thinks that either the President (who has no legislative power) or Congress, or both combined, have power to issue a charter incorporating a company to make a canal in Nicaragua, or a railroad in China, I have not yet been him.

By the twelfth article of Mr. Hise's treaty it is provided, in consideration of the monopoly granted and the other grants in the preceding articles, that—

"The United States of America doth solemnly agree and undertake to protect and defend the State of Nicaragua in the possession and exercise of the sovereignty and dominion of all the country, coasts, ports, lakes, rivers, and territories that may be rightfully under the jurisdiction and within the just and true limits and boundaries of the said State; and when the circumstances and condition of the country may require it, the United States shall employ their naval and military force to preserve the peace and maintain the neutrality of the said coasts, ports, lakes, rivers, and territories, and to hold and keep the same under the dominion and sovereignty of the Government of the State of Nicaragua, or of the Government of such State or political community of which Nicaragua may voluntarily become a member, or with which, of her own accord, she may hereafter be identified."

Does any man here defend such a treaty as that? This is one of the first instances since the ancient entangling alliance made with France by the treaties of 1778, in which any minister of this Government has attempted to disobey the solemn injunction of the Father of his Country to avoid all such politicial connections. For this is a political, not a mere commercial alliance. It is difficult to perceive how it could have failed to plunge us into a war. Mr. Polk, in his message to the Senate, when transmitting the treaty which provides for the protection of the Panama railroad, that the Province of Panama shall be neutral territory, justifies that treaty on the ground that it is a treaty for commercial purposes merely, and not a treaty for a political alliance, which he admits would have been fatal to its confirmation. On the very principles laid down by Mr. Polk in that message it is impossible that he could have ever consented to the ratification of Mr. Hise's treaty.

I have quoted but a part of the twelfth article. The other provisions of that article are not only entangling, but entangled. If I understand the article at all, it provides that we shall not support Nicaragua in her wars of aggression outside of her just limits; yet the naval and military forces, and the entire means and resources of both the contracting parties shall be employed "to put down all wars and bloodshed arising therefrom," and to suppress all violations of the peace and interruptions of the neutrality of the State of Nicaragua; that is to say, if Nicaragua should go to war outside of her own limits, we are bound to fight till we put down the wars and bloodshed arising from them; and Nicaragua is to help us to do that, for not only our entire means and resources, (that is, all we have in the world, or can possibly get,) but all she has or can procure shall be employed for the common purpose. We are also bound to suppress all violations of the peace within her limits; to effect which we must have kept an army there. The twelfth article then proceeds to declare, "for further explanation, it is 'understood that if the State of Nicaragua should 'become involved in a [just] war with any for-'eign Power or neighboring State within her own 'border, to defend the territories rightfully be-'longing to her, or to recover such territories 'wrongfully wrested from her, the United States 'engage to aid and defend Nicaragua in carrying 'on such war within her own rightful limits." Comment upon this provision of Mr. Hise's treaty would seem to be an inexcusable waste of time.

There are other articles in this treaty sufficiently absurd to condemn it. But if I have not already shown enough for that purpose, I feel that it would be useless to refer to any others. Is there a man in this Senate who will dare to stand up and say he would have voted for it? Not one! And if the whole Senate had voted for such a treaty, it could never have been ratified either by President Polk or by President Taylor. If the President had ratified it on our part, we know it never could have become a treaty, for the Government of Nicaragua, when this treaty was presented to it by Señor Selva, the commissioner who signed it with Mr. Hise, utterly disapproved it, and refused to ratify it. Of this fact all were fully apprised by the published letter of Mr. Carcache, the charge d'affaires accredited to our Government by that of Nicaragua, addressed to the Secretary of State on the 31st of December, 1849.

It was under these circumstances that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] made a charge against me on the floor of the Senate, on the 14th day of February last, that I had suppressed Mr. Hise's treaty. What right had he to say that I had suppressed the treaty? As a Senator he ought to have known, and if he attended to his duty, and read the correspondence transmitted to the Senate by the President, he did know that it was utterly untrue; for General Taylor himself informed the Senate that he had declined sending it to the Senate for ratification, for reasons which I have already given. If the Senator meant to say that I had concealed the treaty, then his statement was equally destitute of truth, for he knew well that I had sent that treaty to Congress on the 18th day of July, 1850, and that it was among the published documents when he made the statement.

[Mr. DOUGLAS here said he meant only that the treaty had not been sent to the Senate for ratification.]

The Senator has been on many occasions engaged in making charges against the administration of President Taylor that this treaty was not submitted to the Senate for ratification. I have read publications of some of his stump speeches in regard to this treaty—has he any complaint to make now? Dare he now say that he would, under any possible circumstances, have voted for that treaty? Would he desire me to send such a treaty as that to the Senate for ratification? Would he ratify it? He cannot say that he would; and if he cannot, with what show of propriety did he arraign me or President Taylor for declining to offer it to the Senate for ratification? When he indulged himself so freely at my expense, on the 14th day of February last, did he not know that neither Mr. Buchanan nor Mr. Polk had ever authorized Mr. Hise to make such a treaty?—that although Mr. Hise stated in the treaty that he had full powers to negotiate it, yet he had no such powers? Did he not know that Mr. Hise made the treaty in utter disobedience to Mr. Buchanan's instructions? Did he not know that Mr. Hise made that treaty after his recall, and after the appointment of his successor? Did he not know that the treaty was utterly inadmissible on the principles publicly avowed and acted upon by Mr. Polk? Did he not know that the treaty violated plain principles of constitutional law, and overthrew the settled policy of this Government since its origin? Did he not know, while he was delivering his speech here in the Senate, that this was a treaty the like of which no man of any party could either ratify or approve?

In a report of the speech of the Senator from Illinois, now before me, he states his objections to the treaty made by Mr. Squier with the State of Nicaragua, and also to the Central American treaty concluded with Great Britain on the 19th of April, 1850. As both these treaties were negotiated on the principles of the resolution laid down in the Senate on the 3d of March, 1835, I will take this occasion of answering his objections, and correcting some of his misstatements. In that speech the Senator says that Great Britain could never have colonized any part of Central America. In another part of the same speech he says that Great Britain had colonized the Bay of Islands, which he says lie in Central America, and belong to the State of Honduras, in violation of the Monroe doctrine and the treaty negotiated by me with Mr. Bulwer. Both the statements cannot be correct—the one or the other must be untrue; and strange must have been that obliviousness which involved the Senator in such a flat contradiction of himself. Again: he says that I had instructed Mr. Squier to say to the Government of Nicaragua that Mr. Hise had no authority to act. This is another singular misstatement. There is not a word in my instructions to excuse the Senator for making it. I had no idea that Mr. Hise had disobeyed Mr. Buchanan's instructions when I wrote the instructions to Mr. Squier. He had been directed to make no treaty with Nicaragua. How could I imagine that Mr. Hise had acted upon powers which were never granted to him by my predecessor? The date of my instructions to Squier, as the Senator knew, was the 1st of May, 1849. He equally well knew, if he read the public documents, that Mr. Hise's treaty was not made till the 21st day of June thereafter. The Senator prefers Mr. Hise's treaty on account of the monopoly of the right of way; and his objection to that of Mr. Squier is, that it opened the right of way to all nations upon the same terms. Did the Senator object to the treaty negotiated in the time of Mr. Polk with New Granada? And is not that treaty liable to the very same objection which he now makes against that of Mr. Squier? It is Mr. Polk's boast in his message transmitting the New Granada treaty, that the Panama route would be "open to all nations on the same terms."

The Senator, who has joined with a few others in denouncing the treaties with Nicaragua and Great Britain for making the "Nicaragua passage free to all nations on the same terms," was never known to open his mouth against the treaty which opened the Panama railroad to all nations. The treaty of the 19th of April, 1850, provides for the neutrality of the territory of all the Central American States, and for that reason the Senator condemns it. The treaty with New Granada, having in view the same object—the protection of an interoceanic communication through the Isthmus of Panama, and providing for the neutrality of the province of Panama—meets with his unqualified approbation. The Senator has taken up his song against the treaty which guaranties the neutrality of all the Central American Republics, and liberates them from the dominion of Great Britain. That Government had actually seized them and occupied them, and yet his harp hung upon the willows from the day when the treaty establishing the neutrality of Panama went into operation till the present time, and during the whole succeeding period of five years not a murmur of disapprobation escaped his lips. He complains that, under the treaty negotiated by the Administration of General Taylor, we could not fortify in Central America, while the British can fortify at Jamaica; yet he has always been perfectly satisfied with the treaty of Mr. Polk, which deprives us of the power to fortify in any part of the province of Panama, while the British can fortify in British Guiana. He is shocked that we cannot annex the Central American Republics to the United States; yet he himself professes, almost in the same breath, to be opposed to the annexation. He cannot understand the reason why the Government of Nicaragua refused to ratify the treaty made by her Commissioner, Señor Selva, with Mr. Hise; yet he has seen that treaty which cedes away the jurisdiction of the State and her public domain to an enormous extent, and reduces her to a complete stage of vassalage; and, because he cannot understand this, he attributes her refusal to ratify that treaty to the influence of Mr. Squier and to my instructions. He amuses us with the assertion that the treaty of the 19th of April, 1850, is a negation of the Monroe doctrine in every particular; yet in the next breath he asserts that the treaty and the Monroe doctrine are so identical that a violation of one is a violation of both. And he urges us to make an issue with the British Government about the colony of the Bay Islands, which he says is a striking infraction of the treaty as well as the Monroe doctrine, and presents a very pretty quarrel as it stands. He is a great advocate of the Monroe doctrine, yet refuses to vote for that doctrine when asserted in a resolution presented by one of his own party.

As he declared that his reason for opposing the treaty of the 19th of April, 1850, was its "negation of the Monroe doctrine," I propose to examine the history of that doctrine, with a view to show not only that his assertion is unfounded, but that, while the policy indicated by the treaty has been the established policy of this Government for more than twenty years, the Monroe doctrine never has been established as a principle to regulate the action of this Government, and has been repudiated as often as an effort has been made in Congress to sustain it. In saying this, I do not mean to be understood that the Executive branch of the Government has not recommended it to Congress for effect or to attain a special object, nor do I mean to censure any President for doing so, but the President does not constitute the Government; and I mean to say that neither the President and Senate, by any treaty, nor Congress, by any vote or resolution, have ever sustained it.

Mr. Monroe's declaration was made in his seventh annual message to Congress, on the 2d of December, 1823:

"We owe it," said he, "to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and the European Powers, to DECLARE that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies and dependencies of any European Power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the Governments which have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great considerations and just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition, for the purpose of oppressing them, or of controlling in any other manner their destiny, by a European Power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States."

This celebrated declaration, which is often quoted as a pledge to go to war with any European nation which shall attempt to colonize any part of this hemisphere, is not a declaration by the President to a foreign country, but a mere recommendation to Congress, to declare, first, that we think any attempt to extend the European system, that is, to make a European colony in this hemisphere, would be dangerous to our peace and safety; and, secondly, that any European interposition to control the destiny of an established American Government would be viewed by us as a manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States. Congress utterly refused to adopt the recommendation at the time, and has ever since refused to make any such declaration. Mr. Monroe made no declaration himself; but, in pursuance of the power given him by the Constitution to recommend to Congress such measures as he should deem expedient, he said, in his message to the two Houses: "We owe it to ourselves to declare," &c.; that is, he recommended to Congress (in virtue of the right to recommend given him by the Constitution) to make this declaration in some resolution or other proper form, and he was pledged by it to nothing more than this: that, if Congress shaped such a resolution, or made such a declaration, he would approve it. There was no pledge in it to any Power on earth but his own countrymen in Congress assembled. The American Government could be committed only by the vote of both Houses of Congress, approved by the President. The proposition recommended by Mr. Monroe was warmly opposed by the very Congress to which it was submitted. No such declaration was made or attempted to be made by Congress; but Mr. Clay, who was an ardent supporter of Mr. Monroe's administration, did, at the time, propose a resolution to the House of Representatives, which was intended to approach the declaration, but even that failed. His resolution was, "that 'the people of these States would not see, without 'serious inquietude, any forcible interposition by the 'allied Powers of Europe, in the behalf of Spain, to 'reduce to their former subjection those parts of the 'continent of America which have proclaimed and 'established for themselves, respectively, independ-'ent governments, and which have been solemnly 'recognized by the United States." Even had this passed, it was but a poor response to the recommendation. It did not adopt Mr. Monroe's language or its equivalent, and it restricted "the serious inquietude" we should feel to the case of a forcible interposition by the allied Powers to aid Spain! But Mr. Clay's resolution, even when thus diluted, backed by all the influence which he and Mr. Webster exerted on the occasion, never passed the House of Representatives. The Hon. James K. Polk, during the debate on the Panama mission, tells us the fate of Mr. Clay's resolution, and of Mr. Webster's kindred Greek resolution, which was defeated by a large majority at the same session. As Mr. Polk is often cited as an advocate of the opinion that Mr. Monroe's presidential message had pledged the nation to adopt the policy which Mr. Monroe merely recommended, I beg to quote the following passage from his speech on the Panama mission, in 1826, as not only showing that he did not consider such recommendations as he and Mr. Monroe gave to Congress as in any sense binding upon this Government, without the consent of Congress, but also to show the fate of Mr. Clay's resolution:

"Before he concluded, Mr. Polk said he would say a word in relation to the pledge which it was said the nation had given in relation to our South American policy. When the message of the late President (Monroe) of the United States was communicated to Congress, it was viewed, as it should have been, as the mere expression of opinion of the Executive, submitted to the consideration and deliberation of Congress; and designed, probably, to produce an effect upon the councils of the Holy Alliance, in relation to their supposed intention to interfere in the war between Spain and her former colonies. That effect it probably had an agency in producing; and, if so, IT HAD PERFORMED ITS OFFICE. The President had no power to bind the nation by such a pledge. The sound and sober judgment of the people of the United States had not been brought up to the conclusion that we could, in any event, make common cause with the Republics of the South, or involve ourselves in the calamities of war in their behalf; all our sympathies, all our good feelings were with them; we wished them success; but self-preservation is the first law of nature and of nations; we were then, as he hoped we still were, unprepared to depart from our settled policy. As a strong evidence of what the opinion of this House then was, the present Secretary of State, (Mr. Clay,) then a member of the House, had submitted a resolution responding to the sentiments of the message of the President. The Greek resolution was submitted, too, at the same session, by the honorable member from Massachusetts; the fever was up; we seemed to be then, if we ever had been, prepared to go on a political crusade in behalf of others. The sober judgment of the House interposed; the Greek resolution shared its fate, and sleeps upon the table. Mr. Clay saw clearly that the same fate inevitably awaited his South American resolution, with only this difference, that it would probably have been negatived by a much more overwhelming majority. It was not called up. He, however, effected one object; he prevented any expression of opinion. By submitting his resolution, others were induced not to do so, with an expectation of having an opportunity of voting on his. And now it is said the national honor is pledged to act up to the declaration of that message. For himself, he did not so consider it; and for one, he never could agree to endanger the peace of the country by sending ministers to the consultative assembly at Panama."

In the same celebrated debate on the Panama mission, Mr. Buchanan opposed the mission on the same grounds: Speaking of the Monroe declaration, he said:

"It answered the purpose for which it was intended, and the danger which then threatened the Southern Republics has since passed away. This declaration contained no pledge to any foreign Government. It left us perfectly free, but it has since been converted into such a pledge by Mr. Adams's administration; and, although they have not framed formal alliances with the Southern Republics, yet they have committed the country in honor to an alarming extent." "Mr. Clay has gone to such extremities in the cause of these Republics, that in this particular prudent men would feel disposed to compliment his heart at the expense of his understanding."

Mr. Buchanan's complaint against Mr. Clay, which, he thought, went to show the weakness of Mr. Clay's head, was this: that he had instructed Mr. Poinsett to bring to the notice of the Mexican Government the message of Mr. Monroe, and that Mr. Poinsett had said to the Mexican Government that "the United States had pledged them-'selves not to permit any other Power to interfere 'with the independence or form of government of 'the Spanish American Republics." I know it is claimed that in Mr. Buchanan's instructions to Mr. Hise, he asserted the Monroe doctrine; but on a careful examination of his language it will be found that he did not instruct Mr. Hise to make any such declaration, and only said that European interference with the domestic concerns of the American republics would "jeopard their independence and ruin their interests," and in the very next sentence he assigns a reason why the United States decline to resist such interference. In the same instructions he tells Mr. Hise that "it is our intention to maintain our established policy of non-intervention in the concerns of foreign nations."

Such are the words of Mr. Polk and Mr. Buchanan. Their acts or omissions to act were still more significant of their opinion of the binding force of the Monroe doctrine. The letters of Buitrago, the Secretary of State of Nicaragua, to Mr. Buchanan, of the 12th of November, 1847, and of Guerrero, the President or Supreme Director of that State, to President Polk, on the 15th of November, 1847, implore the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine. Not one word of reply—not any kind of notice was ever given by either of them to Nicaragua that such letters were received. The most impassioned eloquence, urging again and again that Nicaragua was about to fall a victim to British aggression, and entreating the United States to interfere on the very principles advanced by Mr. Polk himself, in his message at the first session of the Twenty-ninth Congress, and reiterated in his Yucatan message, was of no avail. The solicitations of Salinas and Castellon, and the warnings of Mr. Livingston, our consul at Leon, were equally ineffectual. There seemed to be no chord in the bosom of that Administration which vibrated to the touch of those who kneeled and begged for succor in this dark hour of their distress. The Monroe doctrine was laid aside; the President's own recommendation to Congress had, we must suppose, also, like Mr. Monroe's, "performed its office." The British, in their ships of war Alarm and Vixen, entered the San Juan river without even a remonstrance from our Government, on the 8th of January, 1848, and while Mr. Polk and Mr. Buchanan slumbered over all these forewarnings of the fate of Nicaragua, took the town of San Juan, and changed its name to "Greytown," stormed the fort of Serapaqui, and in the Island of Cuba, in the midst of the magnificent lake of Nicaragua, dictated their own terms as conquerors to the unhappy people who, relying upon our supposed promises of help contained in the President's previous public avowal of the Monroe doctrine, had dared to wage war and expend their blood in defense of their native land. The documents before Congress exhibit on the part of our Government the most cold and contemptuous silence—a perfect indifference to all the appeals of our weak sister Republic, and her letters were never answered until they were answered by Zachary Taylor, who has been so much abused for not carrying out the Monroe doctrine! His letter to the President and mine to the Secretary of the State of Nicaragua, are among the published documents before you; and how fully they refute the calumnies which for three years have filled a portion of the party press of this country and disgraced its character for veracity, all men are now free to judge. The Secretary will read the letters.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, May 3, 1849.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the communications which your Excellency addressed to this Department, under dates the 19th November, 1847, and 6th March, 1848, relative to the seizure by the British of the port of San Juan de Nicaragua. These communications have been read with painful interest, and have led to a determination on the part of the President of the United States to accede to the request of the Government of Nicaragua for the interposition of the good offices of this Government, in a friendly manner and spirit towards both Great Britain and Nicaragua, for the purpose of adjusting the controversy with reference to the Mosquito shore. Instructions have accordingly been transmitted to the Minister of the United States at London, which it is hoped may be instrumental towards inducing the British Government to respect the just rights of Nicaragua, and towards effecting a satisfactory accommodation of all the matters in dispute.

I avail myself of this occasion to offer to your Excellency assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

JOHN M. CLAYTON.

His Excellency the MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS of the Republic of Nicaragua.

ZACHARY TAYLOR,

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

WASHINGTON, May 3, 1849.

DEAR AND GOOD FRIEND: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 15th December, 1847, which has been read with lively and painful interest. The Secretary of State of the United States has this day addressed a note to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Nicaragua, expressing the sympathy of this Government for the injuries which that State believes she has received in consequence of the forcible occupation of the port of San Juan by British authorities, and mentioning the friendly steps which have been taken by us with a view to obtain redress therefor. Your Excellency may be assured that our efforts to this end, in an amicable spirit and manner towards both Nicaragua and Great Britain, will be cordial and zealous, and will be animated by the desire, which we sincerely cherish, that the just territorial rights of Nicaragua may be respected by all nations, and that she may advance in prosperity and happiness.

Your good friend, Z. TAYLOR.

To his Excellency the DIRECTOR OF THE STATE OF NICARAGUA.

By the President:

JOHN M. CLAYTON, Secretary of State.

During the administration of Mr. Polk, the British aggressions in Central America were constantly increasing. The attack in 1848 was made just six days after the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, by which we acquired California. It blocked up our passage to the Pacific. The war with Mexico was ended—the army of Taylor was unemployed. If it were desirable to prove the truth of the Monroe doctrine to the British, a few philosophers could have been selected from the "army of occupation" that would have been most convincing in their arguments. Thackeray says there is nothing like a good rattling article from the throat of a nine-pounder to carry conviction in such cases. Why not act upon the idea of Louis Napoleon, and "throw the sword of Brennus into the scale of civilization?" The answer is, Mr. Polk preferred to adhere to the doctrine of his speech on the Panama mission, and did not regard this Government as bound by his recommendations of the Monroe doctrine to Congress because Congress had not adopted them.

Another instance in which Mr. Polk disregarded these recommendations made by himself, was on the occasion of the Oregon treaty. He was elected on the platform of "the whole of Oregon or none." "Fifty-four forty, or fight," was the euphonious alliteration—the war-cry; the very shibboleth of his party. He recommended to Congress the Monroe doctrine again, and yet we know, from authentic evidence, he did not intend to act upon his own recommendation. He sent Mr. McLane to England to negotiate the Oregon treaty, and Mr. McLane on his return, at a public dinner in New York, informed us that "a divis-'ion of the country (i. e. Oregon) upon that prin-'ciple, (a compromise on the 49th parallel of lati-'tude,) with a reasonable regard to rights grown 'up under the joint possession, always appeared to 'me (him) to afford a just and practicable basis for 'an amicable and honorable adjustment of the sub-'ject. Such, also, I was satisfied, were the views of 'our Government at the time I engaged in my recent 'mission; and in earnestly and steadily laboring to ef-'fect a settlement upon that basis, I was but represent-'ing the policy of my own Government, AND FAITH-'FULLY PROMOTING THE INTENTIONS AND WISHES OF 'THE PRESIDENT!" Here, again, Mr. Polk gave evidence of the practical abnegation of the Monroe doctrine asserted in his messages, and again adhered to the doctrines of his speech on the Panama mission. "Fifty-four forty" was given up without the promised "fight," and the doctrine of Washington triumphed again over the Monroe doctrine by the ratification of the Oregon treaty.

The statement of Mr. McLane enables us to understand now why it was that the resolutions introduced into the Senate by Mr. Allen, of Ohio, on the 14th of January, 1846, were stifled and effectually voted down by the Democratic Senate of that year. The friends who really understood Mr. Polk were all opposed to that resolution, which affirmed the same doctrines publicly espoused by the President and his party organ; and while every Democratic newspaper in the United States was filled with the Monroe doctrine, and with "fifty-four forty, or fight;" while the Senators from Michigan [Mr. CASS] and from Ohio [Mr. ALLEN] and from Indiana, [Mr. HANNEGAN,] with many others of the same party, were deceived by the public opinion of the Executive head, others secretly knew and acted upon the private opinion of Mr. Polk, and these were the men who suppressed the resolution and voted down the Monroe doctrine. This was another memorable instance in which that doctrine was practically repudiated. I was not deceived by the Executive message, or by the party press, or by the "civium ardor prava jubentium," which distinguished that crisis.

Among those who were the most ardent for "fifty-four forty" was the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS.] He was not in the Senate. He supposed the Monroe doctrine was popular, and that his party meant to sustain it. He was easily duped, and still complains of it.

Indulge me in a few more words to close the history of the Monroe doctrine. On the 20th of April, 1826, the House of Representatives adopted an amendment to a resolution declaring it expedient to appropriate the funds necessary to enable the President to send ministers to Panama, which amendment was indeed a complete negation of the whole Monroe doctrine. This amendment was carried by a party vote, all the leading men then belonging to the Jackson party voting against the Monroe declaration and in favor of the amendment, and all the leading men supporting Mr. Adams's administration voting against the amendment. This amendment, which was a complete stifler of the whole Monroe declaration, obtained ninety-nine votes, among which were those of Messrs. BUCHANAN, Forsyth, Houston, Ingham, McDuffie, McLane, and POLK! It is very remarkable that the Democracy, at the very origin of their present party, totally repudiated the whole declaration, and came into power on the principle of Washington's doctrine of non-intervention. It has been often said, and there is much reason to believe, that Mr. Adams, who was Secretary of State at the time Mr. Monroe proposed the doctrine, was entitled to the paternity of it. Mr. Calhoun once intimated so much in the Senate. It was the principal topic of discussion in Congress during the administration of Mr. Adams, and it was generally believed at the time that the reassertion of the Monroe principle in Mr. Poinsett's instructions, and in the course adopted by the advocates of Mr. Adams in favor of the Panama mission, drove Mr. Adams from power and secured the election of President Jackson, whose party, shortly after his election, assumed the name of the Democratic party. Among his most ardent advocates was Mr. Van Buren, the great Coryphæus of that party, who, in a speech in the Senate, opposing the Panama mission and the Monroe doctrine, said:

"I will venture to affirm that there is not a member on this floor who will avow his willingness to enter into a stipulation to resist attempts by the European Powers to colonize any portion of this continent. If mistaken," said Mr. Van Buren, "I desire to be corrected. No; I am not. No; thank Heaven, a policy so opposite to all the feelings of the American people, so adverse, as I firmly believe it to be, to its true interests, has no friend, at least no advocate, on this floor."

This speech was pronounced the ablest delivered in Congress since Mr. Pinkney's reply to Mr. King. I could fill volumes from the speeches of Mr. Hayne, Mr. Rives, Mr. McLane, Mr. Calhoun, and all the ancient leaders of the Democratic party against this Monroe doctrine. But I will not longer, and in this manner, trespass upon your patience by the introduction of their opinions. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] was perfectly correct when he said that this declaration of Mr. Monroe had lain, ever since its origin, a dead letter on our records. His recent attempt to revive it by his resolution at the last session, closes the history of the Monroe doctrines. That resolution met with such violent opposition from his own party as to give us the assurance that no President who should undertake to act upon it could be sustained. With all similar resolutions, recommendations, and declarations, it was consigned to "that same ancient vault where all the kindred of the Capulets lie."

With this history before us, I would leave the Senator from Illinois the full benefit of his objection to the treaty of the 19th April, 1850, if I could. He said, and repeatedly said, that every article of that treaty is predicated upon a negation and repudiation of the Monroe declaration in relation to European colonization on this continent. If that were true, it ought to be the greatest recommendation of the treaty to one who assumes to belong to the Democratic party, and to be a follower of the principles of Jackson. He would have been, if true to his present principles, a thorough-going Adams man in 1826, and ought to have been heard in favor of the Panama mission and the instructions of Mr. Clay to Mr. Poinsett. The Senator does not understand the distinction between an alliance for political purposes and a compact to carry out a commercial enterprise. Every word of objection which he made to this treaty was equally applicable to Mr. Polk's treaty with New Granada to protect the province of Panama, and to Mr. Buchanan's proposition to Mr. Crampton to invite not only Great Britain, but France and other commercial Powers, to enter into the same treaty stipulations which we had contracted in regard to a canal or railroad at Panama, and his opposition is founded on principles which would overthrow every commercial treaty we ever made.

But, notwithstanding his assertion that the treaty is a negation of the Monroe doctrine in every particular, I must tell him that it presents the only instance in which an European Power, which had attempted to colonize a portion of this hemisphere, and to extend the European system here, has been induced by the action of this Government to abandon the attempt. Impartial history will distinguish between such action and that mere noisy declamation to frighten the vulture from his victim, which has generally carried more consternation into the ranks of friends at home than of foes abroad.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] very correctly answered the gentleman when he said that after all attempts to adopt the Monroe doctrine had failed, and it had remained a dead letter for a quarter of a century, the treaty "was the best thing we could do." "We could not (said he) get a Congressional sanction of the Monroe doctrine;" and the Senator from Illinois, at this day, is not willing to join in giving it. I repeat, what had we to do under these circumstances? Why, it was manifestly our policy to agree with England to keep hands off. If we had not done so, England must now have been and would have been in the undisturbed possession of all the Central American States upon which she desired to fix her grasp.

Before I leave this part of the subject, permit me to allude briefly to the reason why I did not vote on the treaty with New Granada in 1847. I was at that time a member of the Senate, and did highly approve of the general provisions of the treaty, but was opposed to so much of it only as guarantied the sovereignty of New Granada in her own territory. No such guarantee is to be found in the treaty of 1850. The treaty with Nicaragua, which Mr. Squier negotiated, was no entangling alliance, but only recognized the title of that State, without any guarantee of that title; and as that treaty provided for the protection of the canal by the local government as well as ourselves, I thought it essential to the completion of the enterprise. President Taylor submitted that treaty to the Senate with an assurance that, should the Senate concur with him, he would ratify it, and recommended only such alterations in it as would make it fully in accordance with the British treaty. I placed the amendments which would have effected that object in the hands of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, leaving it to the discretion and judgment of the Senate to decide whether they would or would not recognize the Nicaragua title, which the President was willing to do. Spain had, by treaty, recognized that title. In a few days after I resigned the office of Secretary of State, which I had been anxious to do long before, on account of private considerations. The President had refused to accept my resignation; but his untimely death, on the 9th of July, 1850, released me from the obligations under which I felt bound to remain in office; and after my retirement I never learned the reason for the omission of the Senate to act upon the treaty with Nicaragua. In my judgment that treaty should be revived, or some similar treaty negotiated without delay, to prevent the local government from ever attempting to confiscate the canal in the event of its construction. The failure of this treaty was much regretted by me.

As to the British protection in Central America, it was of course disarmed by the treaty. Its terms are too plain to be misunderstood by any one. Great Britain cannot place an armed soldier on the territory without violating the treaty. She cannot protect the Indians with a view to obtain possession of the country, nor can she occupy or assume any dominion for the purpose of protection. There is nothing undefined in the treaty on this subject. All British dominion in the whole of Central America, extending as it does by the line of the sea-coast nearly one thousand miles, is abandoned. The member from Illinois says that Great Britain has not abandoned any part of the country. I do not place much reliance on any statement he makes on this subject. The British Minister assures us that his Government has observed the treaty, and means to observe it faithfully; and the Secretary of State informs us that San Juan de Nicaragua is no longer in possession of Great Britain, but is really governed by American citizens who reside there. But if the treaty has not been respected, it is not my fault.

It was of no importance to me or my country to expel the miserable savages from their fishing or hunting grounds. Humanity dictated to us that they should not be butchered by those who had been their bitter foes while Great Britain was striving to obtain possession of the country, and was exercising in their name absolute dominion in Central America. We had no justifiable motive for preventing Great Britain from interceding in a friendly way with any one of the Central American Republics to save them from destruction. There are not, I learn, at this time more than five hundred of these wretched Mosquito Indians in existence. They are, like all their race, rapidly disappearing from the earth, and in a very few years will cease to exist, notwithstanding all the care that humanity can bestow upon them. The leprosy and other loathsome diseases have thinned their numbers to a mere shadow of a tribe, and the Minister to Central America tells us, in one of his dispatches, that by the laws of the country the penalty of death is imposed upon any one who shall intermarry with them. The protectorate through which Great Britain intended to assume dominion over all this region, as she had done through other protectorates in India, is already abolished so far as we had any object to abolish it. Stat nominis umbra. She cannot "occupy" to protect these Indians; that is, she cannot either "take or keep possession" to effect that object. She cannot "colonize" with a view to such an object; she cannot "fortify" to do it; she cannot "assume" or exercise any dominion whatsoever with a view to do it. What more do you want of her? Do you desire that she shall not send food to the half-starved savages? May she not send the Bible among them? Do you wish to prevent that? May she not mediate with the local government within whose limits they exist, to prevent them from being massacred by their hereditary enemies? May she not ask those Governments, without offense to you, to act by them as we have done by all Indians within our borders, and extinguish the Indian title, which is nothing more than the mere right of occupancy till the white man wants the land and gives them a pittance to support them when deprived of it? President Taylor went as far in abolishing the British protectorate as the dictates of humanity demanded. In no treaty which Great Britain has ever made has she abandoned her allies to the mercy of their enemies. The British settlers in Oregon south of the 49th parallel of latitude were provided for by her in a treaty when she relinquished the country south of that parallel. But, in this treaty of 1850, she reserved to herself no power to protect by arms or force. I understand from undoubted authority, that an offer has been made to Nicaragua in behalf of the Indians, to cede their whole claim; in other words, to extinguish their Indian title, for fifty thousand dollars—a sum much less than we have been accustomed to give in our Indian treaties for the cession of far less territory. The adjustment of the boundary between Costa Rica and Nicaragua is a more difficult matter.

Mr. President, I have now considered the principal topics upon which I desired to address the Senate, to vindicate the policy of the lamented Chief Magistrate under whom I served the public as a negotiator; but there are others to which, after hearing all that can be said in reply, I may wish to speak. I thank the Senate for their indulgence, and have done.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was unavoidably absent during the early part of the Senator's speech this morning, but I presume I understand that part of it from an intimation given yesterday at the conclusion of his remarks at that time. I desire to reply to so much of the Senator's speech only as relates to some topics of discussion introduced by myself some two or three weeks ago. I shall not enter into the question that he has made between the Committee on Foreign Relations and himself with regard to the report, I having been unavoidably absent and thus prevented from concurring in the report of the committee, or even reading it. I do not desire to enter into any controversy with regard to what has grown up relating to British Honduras. I only desire to confine myself to the points at issue in my own speech to which the Senator has alluded. I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES H. WEST.

Mr. JAMES presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of Rhode Island in regard to the imprisonment in Cuba of James H. West, a citizen of Rhode Island; which were read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MASON. My honorable friend from Rhode Island did me the honor of communicating that memorial to me before he presented it to the Senate; and at his suggestion, I thought it was proper that I should offer a resolution on the subject. I have not had an opportunity of submitting it to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I will now submit it on my own part, calling upon the Executive for information with respect to the matter. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested (if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest) to communicate to the Senate copies of any correspondence relating to the imprisonment or detention in custody of James H. West, a citizen of the United States, at Sagua le Grande, in the Island of Cuba, and of the seizure of his property by the authorities of said island, together with all information connected therewith.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 10, 1853.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. COOPER. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, required to communicate to the Senate the contract entered into with Messrs. Howland & Aspinwall for supplying the Japan squadron with coal, the price per ton which the said coal will cost delivered in the Chinese seas, the amount of commissions and insurance, respectively, together with the rate of exchange which the Government will be required to pay for such of the coal as may be purchased in England.

That the Secretary be also required to inform the Senate whether offers were made by other parties than Messrs. Howland & Aspinwall to supply the above-named squadron with coal, by delivering the same at such places as might be designated in the Chinese seas; the prices per ton at which these parties proposed to deliver it, stating particularly the rates at which anthracite, American bituminous, and English bituminous were respectively offered; and whether, after these offers had been made, a contract at higher prices was not entered into with Messrs. Howland & Aspinwall for English coal.

That the Secretary be further required to inform the Senate whether, previous to the time of contracting for the supply of the said squadron with coal, the Government had not regularly-authorized agents employed for the express purpose of purchasing and inspecting all coal necessary for the supply of the Navy, and what commission the said agents received by way of compensation for their services. That he be required further to inform the Senate whether Messrs. Howland & Aspinwall were not appointed agents to purchase and inspect the whole, or a great part of the coal necessary for the supply of the Japan squadron; whether the commissions allowed them are not double the amount of those allowed and paid to the regular purchasing and inspecting agents; whether the said commissions are not counted on the gross price of the coal, namely: on the price, with freight, exchange, and insurance added. That he be required also to inform the Senate what quantity of coal it is estimated will be required for the supply of the said squadron annually, and what kind principally will be used; what amount of demurrage has been paid, and for what quantity of coal, for what length of time, and to whom; also, what rate of demurrage is to be paid hereafter.

Mr. President, the object of the resolution which has been proposed is to ascertain, if practicable, something in relation to the supply of fuel for the squadron which has been ordered into the Chinese seas for the purpose of opening commercial and other relations with the Japanese empire. It is known, Mr. President, to the Senate that the Government some time ago appointed two agents for the purpose of purchasing and supplying coal for the use of the Navy; one of these agents being appointed for the purpose of purchasing and inspecting anthracite, and the other for the purpose of purchasing and inspecting bituminous coal. It is their duty, by virtue of their office, to supply and inspect the coal, not only for the Navy proper, but likewise all that is used in the dock-yards and shops belonging to the Government; and as a compensation for their services they have received a commission of five per cent. on the amount furnished. When the squadron was about to sail, or rather previous to the period of its sailing, these agents offered to supply coal upon certain terms; that is, they offered to supply both anthracite and bituminous, and to deliver it at such ports as should be indicated in the Chinese seas, at a price not exceeding fifteen dollars per ton. I think the offer was to supply anthracite at $14 50 per ton, and Cumberland bituminous at $14 90 per ton. At any rate, neither the one nor the other was to exceed fifteen dollars per ton, with a commission of five per cent. added.

It seems, however, that neither of these offers was accepted, and that Messrs. Howland and Aspinwall were appointed inspectors and authorized to purchase the coal for the supply of the squadron. They purchased a few thousand tons of American anthracite and bituminous coal; but have relied mainly upon English coal for the supply of the squadron; and they have purchased it, as I am informed, at a much higher price than either the American anthracite or bituminous were offered for, although the latter are greatly superior, according to tests made on various occasions, and in various ways. I have been informed, and I have no doubt of the fact, that the coal, delivered in the Chinese seas, will cost a fourth more; that is, the English coal which these parties are to deliver will cost one fourth more than American coal which is so much superior in character. And instead of a commission of five per cent. which has been allowed to the regularly-authorized agents of the Government, Howland & Aspinwall are to receive ten per cent. They also pay ten-and-a-half per cent. by way of exchange upon all the coal that they purchase abroad.

Now, if this be so, it is a wrong committed against important domestic interests, and my object is to ascertain the facts. I have been informed that during the period which it is anticipated the squadron will remain upon that station, or rather in those seas, some eighty or a hundred thousand tons of coal will be required for its consumption. These men receive ten per cent. commission; and if the price should be $20 per ton they will receive by way of commissions $160,000; and the Government will have to pay besides, by way of exchange, more than $160,000. This is benefiting foreigners at the expense of our own citizens, who, as I am informed, offered to supply the Government at $15 per ton, delivered where the article was needed. I do not intend, in what I have said, to reflect upon the Secretary of the Navy at all. The late Secretary of the Navy, as I understand, had nothing to do with it. Nor had his predecessor in office. I wish to be understood here, and that I do not intend to reflect upon either of those officers in the slightest degree. I believe both of them are men of the purest integrity, and eminently qualified for the discharge of the duties of their high position. I understand these contracts are made by the Bureau of Construction and Supply, at the instance of the commander of the squadron, who probably preferred English to American coal. All I desire is the facts, and for that purpose I have offered the resolution; and I hope, as it is a matter of inquiry merely, that it may be considered now.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its consideration now:

Resolved, That all business heretofore referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and not reported on, or otherwise definitively disposed of, be again referred to said committee, with like power and authority possessed by them at the late session.

Mr. MASON. I submit to the Senator from Arkansas that the Senate at this session is not competent to enter upon any business of a legislative character, which, of course, requires the concurrence of the House of Representatives. The scope of the resolution would appear to confer on the committee the same powers which it had during the late session. If there are any special matters which should be referred to the committee, and which would not require the concurrence of the House, I have no objection to it.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I am aware of the fact suggested by the Senator. This resolution is to extend to the committee the powers in reference to special subjects which it had during the late session. I allude particularly to the matter of the inquiry into the conduct of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs in Minnesota.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to the Senator to modify his resolution so as to make it refer to that subject.

Mr. WELLER. There is another committee which I should like to have continued with the same powers that it had at the late session. I allude to the Committee in relation to the Mexican Boundary Commission. It has been unable to report; and for the purpose of giving it an opportunity to report, I should like to have that resolution so modified as to include it.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from California can move to amend the resolution.

Mr. WELLER. After it is disposed of, I can offer one providing for the committee to which I allude.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I will modify the resolution by inserting in it after "Committee on Indian Affairs," the words "and pertaining to the business of the Executive session."

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest to the Senator that it had better be offered in Executive session.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The object of the resolution is to continue the duties of the committee in reference to the investigation of the charges against the Superintendent of Indian Affairs in Minnesota; and that was brought before us in open session.

The resolution was then adopted.

INDIAN ANNUITIES.

Mr. SEBASTIAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to furnish a statement of the amounts paid as annuities under the different treaties with the Choctaw tribe of Indians, specifying the amount and date of each payment, and including the interest on investments under the treaty of 1837; together with a statement in detail of the expenditures under the various treaty provisions for education.

COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the clerk to the Committee on Claims be continued as heretofore, until otherwise ordered by the Senate, to be employed in completing and keeping up the index and digest of the reports of the committee authorized by the resolution of March, 1851, and in such other duties as the committee may require.

I presume there can be no objection to the resolution. In 1850, the Senate, on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, adopted a resolution continuing this clerk for the purpose of making a classified index of the proceedings of the Senate on claims. The index will be completed by the meeting of the next Congress. I understand it is about three fourths done. The Committee on Claims has unanimously instructed me to submit this resolution to the Senate, and ask for its consideration now.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

DEBATES IN THE SENATE.

Mr. BADGER submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate have published in the Daily National Intelligencer, the full debates and proceedings of the Senate for the late legislative session, and pay the same compensation therefor as is allowed to the Union and Globe, and pro rata for what has been reported and published in the Intelligencer during the present Congress.

CAPTAIN MARCY'S REPORT.

Mr. CHASE submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That two thousand additional copies of the report of Captain R. B. Marcy, of his exploration of the waters of the Red river, ordered to be printed by the resolution of the Senate of the 4th of February last, be printed for the use of the Senate; two hundred copies of which to be furnished to Captain Marcy; and that two hundred copies of the report of Captain Sitgreaves, ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate, be furnished to Captain Sitgreaves.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions submitted on Monday by Mr. CLAYTON.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have nothing to do with the controversy which has arisen between the Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] and my venerable friend from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] who is now absent in consequence of the severe illness of one nearest and dearest to him. We all know enough of that Senator to be assured that when he shall be in his place, he will be prompt to respond to any calls that may be made upon him. Neither have I anything to do with the dispute which has grown up among Senators in respect to the boundary of Central America, and the position of the British settlement at the Balize. I leave that in the hands of those who have made themselves parties to the controversy. Nor shall I become a party to the discussion upon the issue between the Senator from Delaware and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in their report on that question. Not having been present when the committee made their report, and not yet having had the opportunity of reading it, I leave the chairman of the committee to vindicate his positions, as I doubt not he will prove himself abundantly able to do. I have, therefore, only to ask the attention of the Senate to such points as the Senator from Delaware has chosen to make against a speech delivered by me a few weeks ago in this Chamber.

The Senator seems to complain that I should have questioned the propriety of withholding from the consideration of the Senate what is known as the Hise treaty, and the substitution of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty in its place. Those two treaties presented a distinct issue of great public concern to the country; and it was a difference of opinion between him and me as to which system of policy should prevail. I advocated that system which would secure to the United States the sole and exclusive privilege of controlling the communication between the two oceans. He substituted that other policy which opened the privilege to a partnership between the United States and Great Britain. The Senator has assigned various reasons for withholding the Hise treaty from the consideration of the Senate. The first is, that it was concluded by Mr. Hise without the authority of this Government. That may be true, but it is the first time I have ever heard it urged as a valid reason for withholding from the consideration of the Senate a treaty the objects and provisions of which were desirable. The treaty with New Granada, which he so warmly commends in his speech, was made by Mr. Bidlack without authority. President Polk stated this fact in his message communicating the treaty to the Senate, and the Senator from Delaware has read that message and incorporated it into his speech. He therefore knew that fact when he gave as a reason for withholding the Hise treaty, that it was made without authority.

The treaty of peace with Mexico, to the provisions of which the Senator has also referred on another point, was entered into by Mr. Trist, not only without authority, but in bold defiance of the instructions of our Government to the contrary. The administration of President Polk did not feel at liberty to withhold these two treaties from the Senate, merely because they were made without authority or in defiance of instructions, for the reason that the objects intended to be accomplished by the treaty were desirable, and the provisions could be so modified by the Senate as to make the details conform to the objects in view. It may not be amiss for me to remind the Senator from Delaware, that he was a member of the Senate at the time the Mexican treaty was submitted for ratification, and that he voted for it, notwithstanding it was concluded in opposition to the instructions of our Government. If, therefore, the Senator has any respect for the practice of the Government heretofore, or for his own votes recorded upon the very point in controversy, he is not at liberty to object to the treaty upon the ground that it was concluded by our diplomatic agent without authority.

I understand the rule to be this: whenever the treaty is made in pursuance of instructions, the Executive is under an implied obligation to submit it to the Senate for ratification. But if it be entered into without authority, or in violation of instructions, the Administration are at liberty to reject it unconditionally, or to send it to the Senate for advice, amendment, ratification, or rejection, according to their judgment of its merits. Whether the Hise treaty was perfect in all its provisions, or contained obnoxious features, is not the question. It furnished conclusive evidence that the Government of Nicaragua was willing and anxious to confer upon the United States the exclusive and perpetual privilege of controlling the canal between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, instead of a partnership between us and the European Powers. The Senator from Delaware (then Secretary of State) had the opportunity of securing to his own country that inestimable privilege, either by submitting the Hise treaty to the Senate, with the recommendation that it be so modified as to obviate all the objections which he deemed to exist to some of its provisions, or by making a new treaty which should embrace the principle of an exclusive and perpetual privilege without any of the obnoxious provisions. He did not do either. He suppressed the treaty—refused to accept of an exclusive privilege to his own country—and caused a new treaty to be made, which should lay the foundation of a partnership between the United States and Great Britain and the other European Powers.

The next reason assigned for withholding the Hise treaty from the Senate is, that it has not been approved by Nicaragua. It is true that Nicaragua did not ratify that treaty; but why did she fail to do so? I showed conclusively in the speech to which the Senator was replying that the non-approval was in consequence of his instructions, as Secretary of State, to Mr. Squier, our chargé d'affaires to Nicaragua. It required the whole influence of the representative of our Government in that country to prevent the ratification and approval of the Hise treaty by the State of Nicaragua. Sir, it is not a satisfactory reason for suppressing the treaty, therefore, that it had not been ratified by the other party, when the non-ratification was produced by the action of the agent of this Government in pursuance of instructions.

Mr. CLAYTON. I desire distinctly to understand the Senator. If I understood him, he said that Mr. Hise's treaty was rejected in consequence of Mr. Squier's interference.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. And then I understand him to say that Mr. Squier did it by instruction.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now will the Senator submit the proof to substantiate that assertion? I know of no such instruction.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will do that with a great deal of pleasure. Mr. Hise was sent to the Central American States by Mr. Polk. He negotiated a treaty with the State of Nicaragua—the treaty in question—on the 21st of June, 1849. Prior to that time he had been recalled, and Mr. Squier had been appointed by the Administration which succeeded that of President Polk. Mr. Hise had received no knowledge of his removal; no instructions from the new Administration at the time when he made the treaty. In the instructions which the Secretary of State gave to Mr. Squier on the 2d of May, 1849, when he was about to proceed to Central America to supersede Mr. Hise, you will find that he was directed to "claim no peculiar privilege; no exclusive right; no monopoly of commercial intercourse" for the United States. I will read from the letter of instructions:

"We should naturally be proud of such an achievement as an American work; but if European aid be necessary to accomplish it, why should we repudiate it, seeing that our object is as honest as it is openly avowed, TO CLAIM NO PECULIAR PRIVILEGE; NO EXCLUSIVE RIGHT; NO MONOPOLY OF COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE, but to see that the work is dedicated to the benefit of mankind, to be used by all on the same terms with us, and consecrated to the enjoyment and diffusion of the unnumbered and inestimable blessings which must flow from it to all the civilized world?"

Then, sir, after having instructed Mr. Squier as to the character of the treaty which he was to form—a treaty which was to open the canal to the world—a treaty which was to give us no peculiar privilege, and secure to us no exclusive right,—after giving that instruction, the Secretary in the concluding paragraph says:

"If a charter or grant of the right of way shall have been INCAUTIOUSLY OR INCONSIDERATELY made before your arrival in that country, SEEK TO HAVE IT PROPERLY MODIFIED TO ANSWER THE ENDS WE HAVE IN VIEW."

Mr. CLAYTON. Is that the passage?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That and the other together.

Mr. CLAYTON. I endeavored to correct the misapprehension of the honorable Senator yesterday in reference to that. That is not an instruction to the minister to Central America in regard to the treaty made by Mr. Hise, or any other treaty. It is a direction to the minister to Central America to see that any contract which had been made by the local government should be so made as not to be assignable. If the gentleman will read the context, he will see at once that that does not allude to a treaty. It is merely, I say again, an instruction to the minister in that country to look to it, that the capitalists who were about to construct the canal should not speculate upon the work. There is nothing there touching a treaty; nothing whatever. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. The whole instruction is in reference to the character of the contract or charter.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will read the preceding sentence, and we will see then who is mistaken:

"If they do not agree to GRANT US PASSAGE on reasonable and proper terms, refuse our protection and our countenance to procure the contract from Nicaragua"——

Mr. CLAYTON. If the gentleman will look at the context which goes before, he will see that the word "they" refers to the capitalists.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will read what goes before:

"See that it is not assignable to others; that no exclusive privileges are granted to ANY NATION that will not agree to the same treaty stipulations with Nicaragua; that the tolls to be demanded by the owners are not unreasonable or oppressive; that no power be reserved to the proprietors of the canal or their successors to extort at any time hereafter, or unjustly to obstruct or embarrass the right of passage. This will require all your vigilance and skill. If they do not agree to grant us passage on reasonable and proper terms, refuse our protection and our countenance to procure the contract from Nicaragua. If a charter or grant of the right of way shall have been incautiously or inconsiderately made before your arrival in that country, seek to have it properly modified to answer the ends we have in view."

Mr. CLAYTON. The honorable Senator will observe that that does not refer to a treaty. The grant of the right of way was a different thing. It was a contract between the local government and the capitalists. Not a treaty at all.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator's explanation is doubtless satisfactory to himself. He may imagine that it will suit his present purposes to place upon his instructions the construction for which he now contends; but it is wholly unwarranted by the language he employed. His instructions speak of securing the right of way to "us." To whom did he allude in the word "us?" Did he refer to the capitalists, proprietors, and speculators, who should become the owners of the charter? Was he one of the company, and therefore authorized to use the word "us," when speaking of the rights and privileges to be acquired of a foreign nation through his agency as Secretary of State? I have supposed that Mr. Squier was sent to Central America to represent the United States and to protect our rights and interests as a nation. I have always done the Senator from Delaware the justice to believe that when he gave those instructions to Mr. Squier he was acting on behalf of his country to secure the right of way for a canal to the UNITED STATES, and not to a few capitalists and speculators under the title of "us." For the honor of our country I will still do him that justice, notwithstanding his disclaimer. His instructions also speak of the right of way to "nations," and caution Mr. Squier to see "that no exclusive privileges are granted to any nation," &c.

It is plain, therefore, that in the instructions relative to the securing the right of way for a canal to the nations of the earth, Mr. Squier was directed to see that no exclusive privilege was granted to any other nation, and not to claim any peculiar advantages for our own. Then follows the concluding paragraph which has been read:

"If a charter or grant of the right of way shall have been incautiously or inconsiderately made before your arrival in the country, seek to have it properly modified to answer the ends we have in view."

Modified how? If before the arrival of Mr. Squier in the country, Mr. Hise shall have acquired a charter or grant which shall secure peculiar privileges or exclusive rights for this country, he was to seek to have it so modified as to open the same rights and privileges to all other nations on equal terms. This is what I understand to be the meaning of those instructions, and it is clear that Mr. Squier understood them in the same way, for when Mr. Squier arrived in Nicaragua, and discovered by a statement in a newspaper of the Isthmus that Mr. Hise was about making a treaty for a canal, without knowing what its terms were, without waiting to ascertain its provisions, he sent at once a notice to the Government of Nicaragua, that Mr. Hise was not authorized to treat—that he did not understand the policy and views of the new Administration—that he had been recalled, and that any treaty he might make must be considered and treated as an unofficial act. He communicated this protest to the Secretary of State on the same day, and then proceeded to his point of destination, where he made a treaty for the right of way for a canal to all nations on the partnership plan in pursuance of his instructions. These two treaties—the Hise treaty and the Squier treaty—were in the Department of State at the same time—the one having arrived about the middle of September, and the other about the first of October. It then became the duty of the Senator from Delaware, as Secretary of State, to decide between them: in other words, to determine whether he would accept of an exclusive privilege to his own country, or enter into partnership with the monarchies of Europe. He did determine that question, and his decision was in favor of the partnership, and against his own country having the exclusive control of the canal.

Then, sir, I think I was authorized to say what I did say, that the non-ratification of the Hise treaty by the Government of Nicaragua was procured by the agent of General Taylor's administration in that country, and that the agent acted under the authority of this Government. He certainly acted in obedience to what he understood to be his instruction, and that is, the instruction, that if such a charter had been incautiously granted to seek to have it modified to conform to the ends had in view, as stated in the instruction.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? It is not a very material point, still it is better to have it right than wrong. If the Senator will only read the last paragraph, he will see that the charter or grant of the right of way which Mr. Squier was instructed to see was not incautiously made, was a very different thing, indeed, from the treaty; and he will see that that is the thing which I directed the minister to look to, as I stated, and endeavored to be understood yesterday, and as I was anxious to be understood by the gentleman on this point—what I instructed the minister to look to was that the contract of these capitalists should not be such as would enable them to extort from persons using the canal. The last sentence of the instruction applies, if he will look at it, exclusively to the case of the contract, and not to that of the treaty.

One remark more: How is it possible for the gentleman to reconcile the fact, that the State Department could know or imagine that Mr. Hise had made a treaty on the 2d of May, 1850, when those instructions were given, when, in point of fact, Mr. Hise was not heard from until June afterwards? How could I imagine any such thing? And again: how could I possibly suppose that Mr. Hise had made a treaty, or was going to make a treaty, when the records of the State Department showed me the instructions given to him by Mr. Buchanan, in which he tells Mr. Hise to make no treaty whatever with Nicaragua? If the gentleman can reconcile these things, I should be happy to hear him.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will have less difficulty in reconciling these things with my views of his instructions than he will with his construction of them. I have already shown that the instructions related to the right of way to nations and not to individuals; that they were in favor of equal rights to all nations, and opposed to any peculiar privileges to our own country. Is it not as reasonable to suppose that the instructions meant what they said, as it is to conceive that our minister was directed to procure the modification of contracts previously entered into with individuals, and for the observance of which Nicaragua was supposed to have pledged her faith as a nation? Was our minister sent there to represent individuals in their schemes of procuring charters and contracts on private account, or to interfere with and prevent the faithful observance of such contracts as that Government might previously have made with our own citizens or others? While this supposition might extricate the Senator from his present difficulty on this point, it would not tend to elevate the character of our diplomacy during his administration of the State Department. I think I do the Senator more justice by the construction I have put upon his conduct than he does by his own explanation.

But, sir, I wish to know whether I understand the Senator now? Does he wish now to be understood as saying that he preferred an exclusive privilege to his own country to a partnership with England?

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Ah! then as he did not prefer the exclusive privilege to a partnership with the European Powers, does he wish the Senate to understand that he did not mean to convey his true idea in his instructions? If he preferred the partnership to the exclusive privilege, was it not his duty to make known that wish in his instructions? Why should he complain when I show that by his instruction he said precisely what he now avows to be his policy upon that subject? Why, sir, I am defending the consistency of his own opinions, according to his present views, by showing that his instructions embraced what he says now was his true policy—in favor of a partnership with other nations, instead of an exclusive privilege to our own country.

But, sir, whatever may have been his meaning in those instructions, it is undeniable that Mr. Squier understood them as I now do, and acted upon them accordingly. Hence, as I have already remarked, before he arrived upon the theater of his operations, and upon the mere authority of a newspaper paragraph, that Mr. Hise was about making such a treaty, he sent ahead a messenger to inform the Government of Nicaragua that Mr. Hise had no authority to treat upon the subject—that he had been recalled—that he was not informed of the views and purposes of the new Administration—and that whatever treaty he made must be regarded and treated as an unofficial act—and requesting that "new negotiations may be entered upon at the seat of Government."

The new negotiations were immediately opened accordingly, and on the 3d of September terminated in a treaty, which was a substitute for that which Mr. Hise had previously made. I do not understand that the Hise treaty was formally rejected or disavowed by the Government of Nicaragua. It was treated as an unofficial act—a mere nullity—upon the authority of Mr. Squier's protest. I again submit the question to the Senate, therefore, whether I am not fully justified in the statement that the non-approval of the Hise treaty by the Government of Nicaragua was in consequence of the action of the agent of this Government in that country, under the instructions of the Senator from Delaware as Secretary of State? I am only surprised that he should attempt to avoid the responsibility of the act, since, when hard pressed in this discussion, he has been driven into the admission that he preferred a partnership with the monarchies of the Old World to an exclusive privilege for his own country. If such were his opinions and preferences, he was bound by every consideration of duty and patriotism to have given the instructions, and produced the result which I have attributed to him. Why not avow that which he now acknowledges to have been his purpose, in obedience to what he conceived to be his duty? I only ask him to assume the responsibility and consequences of his own conduct, and then to assign such reasons as he may be able in justification.

The next reason which he gives for suppressing the Hise treaty is totally inconsistent with the first. He alleges that the clause guaranteeing the independence of Nicaragua was wholly inadmissible, and could never receive his sanction. In a report which was communicated to the House of Representatives in 1850, he assigned the same reason, and stated that such a guarantee was a departure from our uniform policy, and had no precedent in our history except in the one case of the French colonies in America.

Of course courtesy requires me to acknowledge that the Senator really believes that this was one of the reasons which induced him to withhold the Hise treaty from the Senate. I must be permitted, however, to inform him that he is entirely mistaken; that the clause in question did not constitute an objection in his mind at that time; that it is an afterthought which he has since seized hold of to justify an act which he had previously performed upon totally different grounds. The evidence of these facts will be found recorded in a dispatch written by the Senator from Delaware, as Secretary of State, on the 20th of October, 1849, to Mr. Lawrence, our Minister to England. The document containing this dispatch was printed and laid upon our tables a few days since, and is entitled Senate Ex. Doc. No. 27. It will be remembered, that the Hise treaty was communicated to the Department of State on the 15th of September, and the Squier treaty about the first of October of the same year. On the 20th of October, Mr. Clayton (in the dispatch to which I refer) discussed our relations with the Central American States at great length—among other things communicated to Mr. Lawrence the substance of these two treaties—and directed him to make the same known to Lord Palmerston:

"If, however, the British Government shall reject these overtures on our part, and shall refuse to coöperate with us in the generous and philanthropic scheme of rendering the interoceanic communication by the way of the port and river San Juan free to all nations upon the same terms, we shall deem ourselves justified in protecting our interests independently of her aid, and despite her opposition or hostility. With a view to this alternative, we have a treaty with the State of Nicaragua, a copy of which has been sent to you, and the stipulations of which you should unreservedly impart to Lord Palmerston. You will inform him, however, that this treaty was concluded without a power or instruction from this Government; that the President had no knowledge of its existence, or of the intention to form it, until it was presented to him by Mr. Hise, our late chargé d'affaires to Guatemala, about the 1st of September last; and that, consequently, we are not bound to ratify it, and will take no step for that purpose, if we can, by arrangements with the British Government, place our interests upon a just and satisfactory foundation. But, if our effort for this end should be abortive, the President will not hesitate to submit this or some other treaty which may be concluded by the present chargé d'affaires to Guatemala, to the Senate of the United States for their advice and consent, with a view to its ratification; and, if that enlightened body should approve it, he also will give it his hearty sanction, and will exert all his constitutional power to execute its provisions in good faith—a determination in which he may confidently count upon the good will of the people of the United States."

Here we find the true reason assigned for withholding the Hise treaty from the Senate. It was to induce Great Britain to enter into partnership with us. Lord Palmerston is informed that if Great Britain refuses our offer of a partnership, that "we shall deem ourselves justified in protecting our interests independently of her aid, and in despite of her opposition or hostility," and that "with a view to this alternative," we held the Hise treaty in reserve, to be submitted to the Senate for ratification or not, dependent upon the decision of Great Britain in relation to the partnership. This is the only reason assigned for withholding the treaty from the Senate. The pretext that it was made without authority is expressly negatived by the threat to accept the exclusive privilege, in the event that England refuses to enter into the partnership. Not a word of objection that it guarantees the independence of Nicaragua! But the testimony does not stop here. This same dispatch furnishes affirmative evidence—conclusive and undeniable—that the "guarantee" constituted no portion of his objection to the Hise treaty—was not deemed objectionable by him at that time—but, on the contrary, was looked upon with favor, and actually proposed by Mr. Clayton himself as a desirable provision which might be incorporated into a treaty for the protection of the canal! I read from the same dispatch:

"YOU MAY SUGGEST, FOR INSTANCE, THAT THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN SHOULD ENTER INTO A TREATY GUARANTEEING THE INDEPENDENCE OF NICARAGUA, Honduras, and Costa Rica, which treaty may also guarantee to British subjects the privileges acquired in those States by the treaties between Great Britain and Spain, provided that the limits of those States on the east be acknowledged to be the Caribbean Sea."

Now, sir, let me ask the Senator from Delaware what becomes of his pretext that he deemed the guarantee of the independence of Nicaragua an insuperable objection to the Hise treaty? Have I not proven by his own dispatches, written at the time, that such an idea could never have entered his brain when he determined to withhold the treaty from the Senate?—that it was an afterthought upon which he has since seized as an excuse for an act which had been previously done with a view to another object, and for different reasons?

I will now proceed to consider the fourth objection made by the Senator to the Hise treaty. He goes on to criticise its various provisions, denounces them as ridiculous, as absurd, as unconstitutional, and he puts the question with an air of triumph whether there was a man in this body who would have voted for all the provisions of that treaty. Sir, I have no fancy for that species of special pleading which attempts to avoid the real issue by a criticism upon mere details which are subject to modification at pleasure. Does not the Senator know that when a treaty is made, the objects of which are desirable, while the details are inadmissible, the practice has been to send it to the Senate, that the object may be secured and the details so modified as to conform to the ends in view? Whoever supposed before that a treaty, desirable in its leading features, was to be rejected by the Department, merely because there was an obnoxious provision in it. I could turn upon the Senator with an air of as much triumph, if I had practiced it as well, and ask him if there was a man in this body who would have voted for the Mexican treaty of peace as it was sent to us by the Executive? Do we not all know that the treaty which was ratified by about four fifths of the Senate came to us in a shape in which it could not receive one solitary vote upon either side of the Chamber? Do we not know that Mr. Polk in his message communicating the treaty intimated that fact, and called the attention of the Senate to the obnoxious provisions? While it contained provisions which would exclude the President from the possibility of ever ratifying it, which would have prevented every Senator from giving his sanction to it, yet inasmuch as the main objects of the treaty met the approval of the President, and it was only matters of detail that were obnoxious and inadmissible, he sent it to the Senate that its details might be made to harmonize with its objects. Sir, the vote to strike out the obnoxious features in the treaty was unanimous. Not one man in the body, not even the Senator from Delaware, dared to affirm those clauses or vote to keep them in the treaty. Having perfected it so as to suit the views of about four fifths of the Senate, it was ratified with the vote of the Senator recorded in the affirmative, according to my recollection.

If, therefore, the Senator from Delaware had followed the practice which he sanctioned by his own vote in the case of the Mexican treaty, he would have sent the Hise treaty to the Senate for amendment and ratification, even if the details had been obnoxious to all the objections he now urges to them. For this reason I do not deem it necessary to occupy the time of the Senate in reply to his objections relative to making a canal outside the limits of the United States, or the creation of a company either by Congress or the President for that purpose. I care not whether these provisions were admissible or inadmissible. It is not material to the argument. It can have no bearing upon the question. The Hise treaty was evidence of one great fact, which should never be forgotten, and that fact is that Nicaragua was willing and anxious to grant to the United States forever the exclusive right and control over a ship canal between the two oceans. The Secretary of State [Mr. CLAYTON] knew that fact. If the details were not acceptable to him, he could have availed himself of the main provision and made the details to suit himself; I confine myself, therefore, to the great point, that you might have had the exclusive privilege if you had desired it. You refused it with your eyes open, and took a partnership in lieu of it. All about the details is a matter of moonshine. You could have modified them to suit yourself before sending the treaty to the Senate, or you could have followed the example of Mr. Polk, in the case of the Mexican treaty, and sent it to the Senate with the recommendation that the details be thus modified.

All this talk about obnoxious features and objectionable provisions—about guarantees of independence and want of authority to make the treaty—must be regarded as miserable attempts to avoid the main point at issue. Why this pitiful equivocation, if the Senator was really in favor of the European partnership in preference to the exclusive privilege for the United States, as all his acts prove—the whole tenor of his correspondence clearly and conclusively prove—was the case? If he thinks his policy was right, why not frankly avow the truth, and justify upon the merits? I am not to be diverted from my purpose by his assaults upon the administration of President Polk, nor by his array of great names in opposition to the views I entertain. History will do justice to Mr. Polk and Mr. Buchanan upon this as well as all other questions connected with their administration of the Government. In the speech to which the Senator professed to reply, I did not make an allusion to party politics. I do not think the term Whig or Democrat can be found in the whole speech. I am sure that it does not contain a partisan reference to the state of political parties in the country during the period to which my remarks applied. I attempted to discuss the question upon its merits, independent of the fact whether my views might come in conflict with those professed by either of the great parties, or entertained by the great men of our country at some former period. I should have been better satisfied if the Senator had pursued the same course, instead of calling upon Jackson, Polk, and Buchanan, and sheltering himself behind their great names, while attempting to detract from their fame by representing them as having sacrificed the interests and honor of their country.

Mr. CLAYTON. I deny it. There was not one word in my speech which went to arraign Mr. Polk or General Jackson, or any body. There was nothing like a party spirit in the speech. If the gentleman so understood me, he entirely misunderstood me. I stated the fact that Mr. Polk and Mr. Buchanan had been applied to by the local government of Nicaragua for the intervention of this Government to protect it from the aggressions of the British. I stated, and proved the fact, that the Monroe doctrine had never been carried out—that Mr. Polk on that occasion had declined to interfere; but I disclaimed entirely assailing him, and endeavored to reconcile his whole course of conduct as being consistent with what he stated in the House of Representatives on the Panama mission.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I accept the explanation. It is perfectly satisfactory, but I am very unfortunate in apprehending the meaning of language. He said that Mr. Polk had avowed himself in favor of asserting the Monroe doctrine. He then said that Mr. Polk had abandoned and refused to carry it out when this question arose. He said the President of Nicaragua, to use his own language, "poked that declaration into Mr. Polk's own teeth."

Mr. CLAYTON. I used no such word.

Mr. DOUGLAS. At least, that he thrust it into his teeth.

Mr. CLAYTON. I did not.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Well, never mind about the precise word. At all events, he went on to show that Mr. Polk was pledged to the Monroe doctrine, that he failed to carry it out, that no Administration ever carried it out, that it had been abandoned whenever a question arose which gave an opportunity for carrying it into effect. When he chose to put Mr. Polk into the position of making declarations and violating them, making protests and abandoning them, making threats and never executing them, I very naturally supposed, according to the notion of a western man, that he was attacking him. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAYTON. I endeavored to show that Mr. Polk had made his recommendation to the Congress of the United States that he was perfectly justifiable in not considering that as the established doctrine of the country, because the Congress of the United States had never adopted it. On that principle I endeavored to reconcile the course of Mr. Polk with itself. The gentleman has undertaken to represent me as assailing Mr. Polk, when if he had paid attention to what I said—unfortunately he was out during the greater portion of the time I was discussing the subject—he would have seen that I was endeavoring to prove that the course of that President of the United States, in this particular, was not liable to the exception which is taken to it; that he was not bound by the declaration of the Monroe doctrine unless Congress adopted it, because he was not the Government.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Of course I accept the explanation of the Senator with a great deal of pleasure, and I am gratified to know that I misapprehended him; but it really did appear to me that I was justified in putting that construction upon what he said, inasmuch as he went on to show that when he came into the State Department, he found Great Britain with her protectorate over the Mosquito coast, and spreading over more than half of Central America; that during Mr. Polk's administration, and while he was negotiating the treaty of peace with Mexico, Great Britain seized the town of San Juan, at the mouth of the proposed canal, and that Mr. Polk and Mr. Buchanan remained silent, without even a protest against this unjustifiable aggression; and when he denounced that seizure as an act originating in hostility to this country, to cut off communication with our Pacific possessions; and when he said that it would have been wiser to have closed the door and shut out the British lion, than to allow him to enter unresisted, and then attempt to expel him; and when he boasted of having expelled the British lion after Mr. Polk and Mr. Buchanan had permitted him to enter the house in contempt of their declaration of the Monroe doctrine, I really thought that he was attempting to censure Mr. Polk for letting the lion come in; but it seems I was mistaken. He did not mean that, and not meaning it, upon my word I do not know what he did mean by it. [Laughter.]

When I heard all this, and much more of the same tenor, it occurred to me that it amounted to a pretty good arraignment of Mr. Polk and his Administration; and that his object was to glorify himself and General Taylor, at the expense of Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Polk, by accusing the latter of having tamely submitted to British aggressions of great enormity, which the former promptly rebuked by expelling the British from Central America. Let me ask him the question—did the Clayton and Bulwer treaty expel the British from Central America? Has England abandoned her protectorate? What power has she surrendered? What functionary has she recalled? What portion of the country—what inch of territory has she given up? Will the Senator from Delaware inform me what England has abandoned in pursuance or by virtue of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty? I can show him where she has extended her possessions since the date of that treaty, and in contempt of its stipulations. I can point him to the seizure of the Bay Islands and the erection of them into a colony; to the extension of her jurisdiction in the vicinity of the Balize; to her invasion of the territory of Honduras on the main land; and to the continuance of her protectorate over the Mosquito coast. I can point him to a series of acts designed by Great Britain to increase her power and extend her possessions in that quarter. Will he point me to any one act by which she has reduced her power or curtailed her possessions? He boasts of having expelled the British from Central America. Will he have the kindness to inform the Senate how, when, and where this has been effected? Where is the evidence to sustain this declaration? I called for information on this point in my speech the other day. The Senator replied to all other parts of that speech in detail and at great length. Of course, want of time was the reason for his omission to respond to these pertinent inquiries.

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir; I replied to it, but the Senator was out of his seat.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was in my seat the most of the time the Senator was speaking on that part of the subject. Now, sir, in regard to this Bay Island colony, I may be permitted to say, although it is by the way of digression from the line of argument which I was marking out for myself, that it presents a clear case not only in derogation of the Monroe doctrine, but in direct violation and contempt of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty. I will do the Senator the justice to say, that the Bay Island colony has not been erected in pursuance of the treaty, but in derogation of its provisions. The question arises, Are we going to submit tamely to the establishment of this new colony? If we acquiesce in it we submit to a double wrong—a contravention of our avowed policy in regard to European colonization on this continent; and secondly, a palpable and open violation of the terms and stipulations of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty. If we tamely submit to this twofold wrong, the less we say henceforth in regard to European colonization on the American continent, the better for our own credit.

Here is a case where we must act if we ever intend to act. I do not wish to make an issue with England about the Balize;—she has been in possession there longer than our nation has existed as an independent Republic. I do not wish to make an issue with her in regard to Jamaica, because she cannot surrender it upon our demand without dishonor, and she is bound to fight if driven to an extremity on that point. I do not want to make an issue with her in reference to any colony she has upon the continent or adjacent to it, where she may be said to have had a long and peaceful possession. Sir, if I was going to make the issue on any one of these points, I would pursue a more manly course by declaring war at once instead of resorting to such an expedient. I would make the issue solely and distinctly on the Bay Island colony, for the reason that there she is clearly in the wrong, the act having been done in violation of her plighted faith. It was done in contempt of our avowed policy. She cannot justify it before the civilized world, and therefore, dare not fight upon such an issue. England will fight us when her honor compels her to do it, and she will fight us for no other cause. We can require Great Britain to discontinue the Bay Island colony, and I call upon the friends of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, whose provisions are outraged by that act, to join in the demand that that colony be discontinued. Upon that point we are in the right: England is in the wrong; and she cannot, she dare not fight upon it. And, sir, when England backs out of one colony upon our remonstrance, it will be a long time before she will establish another upon this continent without consulting us. And, sir, when England shall have refrained from interfering in the affairs of the American continent without consulting the wishes of this Government, what other Power on earth will be willing to stand forward and do that which England concedes it prudent not to attempt? I may be permitted to say, therefore, that the only issue that I desire to see at this time, upon our foreign relations, as they are now presented to me, is upon the Bay Island colony: and let us require that that be discontinued, and that the terms of our treaty stipulations be obeyed and fulfilled. When that issue shall have been made and decided in our favor, we will not have much need for general resolutions about the Monroe doctrine in future.

But, sir, this was a digression. The point that I was coming at was this: that while it has been a matter of boast for years that the Clayton and Bulwer treaty drove Great Britain out of Central America, she has not surrendered an inch; and what is more, she is now proposing negotiations with us with a view to new arrangements, by which she shall hereafter give up her protectorate. Yes, sir, your late Secretary of State and President, Everett and Fillmore, have communicated to Congress the fact that the British Minister was proposing new negotiations, new arrangements, by which Great Britain shall hereafter give up that which the Senator makes it a matter of pride that he had secured by his treaty. That is a little curious. I do not understand this congratulation of having accomplished a great and wonderful object, by the expelling of the British lion from the place where Mr. Polk allowed him to come and abide, and still a new negotiation or a new arrangement is deemed necessary to secure that which the Senator from Delaware boasts of having accomplished long since!

England professes to be desirous of surrendering her protectorate. Then, why does she not do it? The British Minister proposes to open negotiations by which England shall withdraw her authority from Central America, and the late Secretary of State (Mr. Everett) entertains the proposition favorably, while the Senator from Delaware congratulates the country upon his having effected the desired end in his treaty three years ago.

If Messrs. Everett and Fillmore were correct in entertaining Mr. Crampton's proposition for a new arrangement, certainly the Senator from Delaware is at fault in saying that his treaty expelled the British from Central America. My opinion, as to whether it did expel them or not, is a matter of not much consequence. I have always thought the language of the treaty was so equivocal, that no man could say with certainty, whether it did abolish the protectorate or not. One clause seemed to abolish it; another seemed to recognize its existence, and to restrain its exercise; and you could make as good an argument on one side as the other. But I gave notice at the time the treaty was ratified, that I would take the American side, and stand by the Senator from Delaware in claiming that England was bound to quit; but our late Secretary of State and the President, (Everett and Fillmore,) think otherwise; and now it becomes a question whether new negotiations to accomplish that very desirable object are necessary or not.

Mr. President, I return to the point which I was discussing when the Senator interrupted me, and led me off in this digression, to wit: That the simple question presented in this matter, when stripped of all extraneous circumstances, was this: Should we have accepted when tendered, an exclusive right of way forever from one ocean to the other? The Senator from Delaware thought not, and the administration of General Taylor sustained him in his view of the question. I thought we ought to have embraced the offer which tendered us the exclusive control forever over this great interoceanic canal.

The Senator attempts to sustain his position by quoting the authority of General Jackson and Mr. Polk. Sir, he is unfortunate in his quotation. I do not think that, fairly considered, he has any such authority. I am aware that in 1835 that Senator offered a resolution in this body, which was adopted, recommending a negotiation to open the Isthmus to all nations, and that General Jackson sent out a Colonel Biddle to collect and report information on the subject; but when the resolution was adopted, the question was then presented under circumstances very different from those which existed when the Senator suppressed the Hise treaty. At that time the Central American States had granted to the Netherlands the privilege of making a canal. Others had already secured the privilege, and in that point of view it was reasonable to suppose that the most we could do was to get an equal privilege with European nations. That was not the case presented when the exclusive privilege was offered to us, and the offer declined by the Senator from Delaware, without consulting the Senate.

But there is no evidence that General Jackson entertained even the opinions attributed to him. Colonel Biddle, who was appointed by General Jackson to explore the routes and collect and report information, availed himself of his official position to obtain from New Granada an exclusive privilege to himself and his associates on private account. When the existence of this private contract came to the knowledge of the Secretary of State, Mr. Forsyth, he reprimanded our chargé at New Granada, for having given any countenance to it. And why? Not because it contained an exclusive privilege to the United States, for it did not give us any privilege. Mr. Biddle had been sent out there to get information to be laid before the Administration. He had no power to negotiate—no authority to open diplomatic relations. He had no power to take any one step in procuring the privilege. He made use of his official position, and, in the opinion of the Administration, abused it, by securing a private grant to himself, without the authority, protection, or sanction of the Government of his own country.

Mr. Forsyth was indignant because his agent had disobeyed his authority, and turned the public employment into a private speculation. That is not the question presented here. That contract did not give the United States the privilege at all. It gave it to Colonel Biddle and his associates. But I find nothing in that transaction, and in all the public documents relating to it, to show that General Jackson would have refused the exclusive privilege to his own country if it had been tendered to him.

How is it, then, with Mr. Polk? According to my recollection of the facts, New Granada had granted the privilege of making a canal to a Frenchman by the name of Du Quesne—I will not be certain of his name—and it was desirable to get permission to carry the mails across there. The grant had gone into the possession of a citizen of a foreign Power, and the most that our Government could ask, was to be put upon an equal footing with that other Power. It did not present the question of the privilege being tendered to us, and we refusing to accept it.

But I shall take no time in going into a vindication of those Administrations. In the remarks that I made the other day, I chose to vindicate my own course without reference to past Administrations or present party associations; and I will pursue the same line of debate now. One word upon the point, made by the Senator, that the Hise treaty was unconstitutional. Was it not constitutional to accept the exclusive privilege to the United States? If it was not, and his constitutional objection is valid, it goes a little too far. If you have no right to accept an exclusive privilege to us under the Constitution, what right had you to take a partnership privilege in company with Great Britain? If you have no right to take the privilege for the benefit of American citizens alone, what right have you to take one for the benefit of Englishmen and Americans jointly? If you have no right to make a treaty by which you will protect an American company in making that canal, what right had you to make a treaty by which you pledged yourselves to protect a British company in making that canal? I choose to put the Senator upon the defensive, and let him demonstrate his right to do this thing jointly with England, and then I will draw from his argument my right to do it for the benefit of America alone. I choose to put him in the position of demonstrating the existence of the constitutional power. He, in his treaty, exercised the power. I have not. And he, having exercised the power, having pledged the faith of the nation to do an act, I have a right to call upon him to show the authority, under the Constitution of the United States, to make a guarantee jointly with England for the benefit of English subjects as well as American citizens; and when he proves the existence of that power he has proved the right of the Government to do the same thing for the benefit of American citizens, omitting England and British subjects.

Sir, as I before said, I have no special fondness for this special pleading about the peculiar provisions of a treaty, when the real point was the extent of the privilege which we should accept. Now, sir, I was in favor of an exclusive privilege, and I will tell you why. I desired to see a canal made; and when made, I desired to see it under the control of a Power enabled to protect it. I desired to see it open to the commerce of the whole world, under a sound and sage protection. How was that to be done, except by an exclusive privilege to ourselves? Then, let us open it to the commerce of the world on such terms and conditions as we should deem wise, just, and politic. Could we not open it to the commerce of the world as well by our volition as England could in conjunction with us? Would it not be as creditable to us as a nation to have acquired it ourselves, and then opened it freely, as to have gone into a partnership by which we should have no control in prescribing the terms upon which it should be opened? And besides, if the grant had been made to us, and we had accepted it, and then thrown it open to the commerce of all nations on our own terms and conditions, we held in our hands a right which would have been ample security for every nation under heaven to keep the peace with the United States. The moment England abused the privilege by seizing any more islands, by establishing any more colonies, by invading any more rights, or by violating any more treaties, we would use our privilege, shut up the canal, and exclude her commerce from the Pacific. We would hold a power in our hands which might be exercised at any moment to preserve peace and prevent injustice. Peace and progress being our aim, we should still have continued to be the only Government on earth whose public policy from the beginning has been justly and honestly to enforce the laws of nations with fidelity towards all the nations on earth. Sir, when you surrendered that exclusive right, you surrendered a great element of power which in our hands would have been wielded in the cause of justice for the benefit of mankind.

I was not for such a restrictive policy as would exclude British vessels from going through the canal, or the vessels of any other nation which should respect our rights. I would let them all pass freely, as long as they did not abuse the privilege; close it against them when they did. I insist that the American people occupy a position on this continent which rendered it natural and proper that we should exercise that power. I had no fear of a war with England. I have none now. War should be avoided as long as possible. But, sir, you need have no apprehension of a war with her, for the reason that if we keep in the right, she dare not fight us, and she will not, especially for anything relating to American affairs. She knows she has given a bond to keep the peace, with a mortgage on all her real estate in America as collateral security, and she knows she forfeits her title to the whole, without hope of redemption, if she commits a breach of the bond. She will not fight unless compelled. We could have fortified that canal at each end, and in time of war could have closed it against our enemies, and opened it at our own pleasure. We had the power of doing it; for the Hise treaty contained provisions for the construction of fortifications at each terminus and at such points along the line of the canal as we thought proper. We had the privilege of fortifying it, and we had the right to close it against any Power which should abuse the privilege which we conferred.

Then, sir, what was the objection to the acceptance of that exclusive privilege? I do not see it, sir. I know what were the private arguments urged in times which have gone by, and which I trust never will return; and that is, that England and other European Powers never would consent that the United States should have an exclusive right to the canal. Well, sir, I do not know that they would have consented; but of one thing I am certain, I would never have asked their consent. When Nicaragua desired to confer the privilege, and when we were willing to accept it, it was purely an American question with which England had no right to interfere. It was an American question about which Europe had no right to be consulted. Are we under any more obligation to consult European Powers about an American question than the allied Powers were, in their Congress, to consult us, when establishing the equilibrium of Europe by the agency of the Holy Alliance? America was not consulted then. Our name does not appear in all the proceedings. It was a European question, about which it was presumed America had nothing to say. This question of a canal in Nicaragua, when negotiations were pending to give it to us, was so much an American question that the English Government was not entitled to be consulted. England not consent! She will consent to allow you to do that just so long as you consent to allow her to hold Canada, the Bermudas, Jamaica, and her other American possessions. I hope the time has arrived when we will not be told any more that Europe will not consent to this, and England will not consent to that. I heard that argument till I got tired of it when we were discussing the resolutions for the annexation of Texas. I heard it again on the Oregon question, and I heard it on the California question. It has been said on every occasion whenever we have had an issue about foreign relations, that England would not consent; yet she has acquiesced in whatever we have had the courage and the justice to do. And why? Because we kept ourselves in the right. England was so situated with her possessions on this continent, that she dare not fight in an unjust cause. We would have been in the right to have accepted the privilege of making this canal, and England would never have dared to provoke a controversy with us. I think the time has come when America should perform her duty according to our own judgment, and our own sense of justice, without regard to what European Powers might say with respect to it. I think this nation is about of age. I think we have a right to judge for ourselves. Let us always do right, and put the consequences behind us.

But, sir, I do not wish to detain the Senate upon this point, or to prolong the discussion. I have a word or two to say in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Delaware upon so much of my speech as related to the pledge in the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, never to annex any portion of that country. I objected to that clause in the treaty, upon the ground that I was unwilling to enter into a treaty stipulation with any European Powers in respect to this continent, that we would not do, in the future, whatever our duty, interest, honor, and safety, might require in the course of events. The Senator infers that I desire to annex Central America because I was unwilling to give a pledge that we never would do it. He reminded me that there was a clause in the treaty with Mexico containing the stipulation, that in certain contingencies we would never annex any portion of Mexico. Sir, it was unnecessary that he should remind me of that provision. He has not forgotten how hard I struggled to get that clause out of the treaty where it was retained in opposition to my vote. Had the Senator given me his aid then to defeat that provision in the Mexican treaty, I would be better satisfied now with his excuse for having inserted a still stronger pledge in his treaty. But having advocated that pledge then, he should not attempt to avoid the responsibility of his own act by citing that as a precedent. I was unwilling to bind ourselves by treaty for all time to come never to annex any more territory. I am content for the present with the territory we have. I do not wish to annex any portion of Mexico now. I did not wish to annex any part of Central America then, nor do I at this time.

But I cannot close my eyes to the history of this country for the last half century. Fifty years ago the question was being debated in this Senate whether it was wise or not to acquire any territory on the west bank of the Mississippi river, and it was then contended that we could never, with safety, extend beyond that river. It was at that time seriously considered whether the Alleghany mountains should not be the barrier beyond which we should never pass. At a subsequent date, after we had acquired Louisiana and Florida, more liberal views began to prevail, and it was thought that perhaps we might venture to establish one tier of States west of the Mississippi; but in order to prevent the sad calamity of an undue expansion of our territory, the policy was adopted of establishing an Indian Territory, with titles in perpetuity, all along the western border of those States, so that no more new States could possibly be created in that direction. That barrier could not arrest the onward progress of our people. They burst through it, and passed the Rocky Mountains, and were only arrested by the waters of the Pacific. Who, then, is prepared to say that in the progress of events, having met with the barrier of the ocean in our western course, we may not be compelled to turn to the north and to the south for an outlet? How long is it since the gentleman from Delaware himself thought that a time would never arrive when we would want California? I am aware that he was of that opinion at the time we ratified the treaty, and annexed it.

Mr. CLAYTON. How?

Mr. DOUGLAS. By his voting for Mr. Crittenden's resolutions declaring that we did not want any portion of Mexican territory. You will find your vote in this volume which I hold in my hand. I am aware that he belonged to that school of politicians who thought we had territory enough. I have not forgotten that a respectable portion of this body, but a few years ago thought it would be preposterous to bring a country so far distant as California, and so little known, into the Union. But it has been done, and now since California has become a member of the Confederacy, with her immense commerce and inexhaustible resources, we are told that the time will never come when the territory lying half way between our Atlantic and Pacific possessions will be desirable. Central America is too far off, because it is half way to California, and on the main, direct route, on the very route upon which you pay your Senators and Representatives in Congress their mileage in coming to the capital of the nation. The usual route of travel, the public highway, the half-way house from one portion of the country to the other, is so far distant that the man who thinks the time will ever come when we will want it is deemed a madman.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does the Senator apply those sentiments to me? I did not think so.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I simply say that such an opinion was indicated by the vote of the gentleman on the resolution of Mr. Crittenden.

Mr. CLAYTON. The Senator is entirely mistaken on that point.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In order to save time I waive the point as to the Senator's vote, although it is recorded in the volume before me, and he can read it at his leisure. But I am not mistaken in saying that the Senator on yesterday did ridicule the idea that we were ever to want any portion of Central America. He was utterly amazed, and in his amazement inquired where were these boundaries ever to cease? He wanted to know how far we were going, and if we were going to spread over the entire continent. I do not think we will do it in our day, but I am not prepared to prescribe limits to the area over which Democratic principles may safely spread. I know not what our destiny may be. I try to keep up with the spirit of the age, to keep in view the history of the country, see what we have done, whither we are going, and with what velocity we are moving, in order to be prepared for those events which it is not in the power of man to thwart.

You may make as many treaties as you please to fetter the limits of this giant Republic, and she will burst them all from her, and her course will be onward to a limit which I will not venture to prescribe. Why the necessity of pledging your faith that you will never annex any more of Mexico? Do you not know that you will be compelled to do it; that you cannot help it; that your treaty will not prevent it, and that the only effect it will have will be to enable European Powers to accuse us of bad faith when the act is done, and associate American faith and Punic faith as synonymous terms? What is the use of your guarantee that you will never erect any fortifications in Central America; never annex, occupy, or colonize any portion of that country? How do you know that you can avoid doing it? If you make the canal, I ask you if American citizens will not settle along its line; whether they will not build up towns at each terminus; whether they will not spread over that country, and convert it into an American State; whether American principles and American institutions will not be firmly planted there? And I ask you how many years you think will pass away before you will find the same necessity to extend your laws over your own kindred that you found in the case of Texas? How long will it be before that day arrives? It may not occur in the Senator's day, nor mine. But so certain as this Republic exists, so certain as we remain a united people, so certain as the laws of progress which have raised us from a mere handful to a mighty nation, shall continue to govern our action, just so certain are these events to be worked out, and you will be compelled to extend your protection in that direction.

Sir, I am not desirous of hastening the day. I am not impatient of the time when it shall be realized. I do not wish to give any additional impulse to our progress. We are going fast enough. But I wish our public policy, our laws, our institutions, should keep up with the advance in science, in the mechanic arts, in agriculture, and in everything that tends to make us a great and powerful nation. Let us look the future in the face, and let us prepare to meet that which cannot be avoided. Hence I was unwilling to adopt that clause in the treaty guraranteeing that neither party would ever annex, colonize, or occupy any portion of Central America. I was opposed to it for another reason. It was not reciprocal. Great Britain had possession of the Island of Jamaica. Jamaica was the nearest armed and fortified point to the terminus of the canal. Jamaica at present commands the entrance of that canal; and all that Great Britain desired was, inasmuch as she had possession of the only place commanding the canal, to procure a stipulation that no other Power would ever erect a fortification nearer its terminus. That stipulation is equivalent to an agreement that England may fortify, but that we never shall. Sir, when you look at the whole history of that question, you will see that England, with her far-seeing, sagacious policy, has attempted to circumscribe and restrict and restrain the free action of this Government. When was it that Great Britain seized the possession of the terminus of this canal? Just six days after the signing of the treaty which secured to us California! The moment that England saw that by the pending negotiations with Mexico, California was to be acquired, she collected her fleets, and made preparations for the seizure of the port of San Juan, in order that she might be gate-keeper on the public highway to our own possessions on the Pacific. Within six days from the time we signed the treaty, England seized by force and violence the very point now in controversy. Is not this fact conclusive as to her motives? Is it not clear that her object was to obstruct our passage to our new possessions? Hence I do not sympathize with that feeling which the Senator expressed yesterday, that it was a pity to have a difference with a nation so FRIENDLY TO US AS ENGLAND. Sir, I do not see the evidence of her friendship. It is not in the nature of things that she can be our friend. It is impossible she can love us. I do not blame her for not loving us. Sir, we have wounded her vanity and humbled her pride. She can never forgive us. But for us, she would be the first Power on the face of the earth. But for us, she would have the prospect of maintaining that proud position which she held for so long a period. We are in her way. She is jealous of us, and jealousy forbids the idea of friendship. England does not love us; she cannot love us, and we do not love her either. We have some things in the past to remember that are not agreeable. She has more in the present to humiliate her that she cannot forgive.

I do not wish to administer to the feeling of jealousy and rivalry that exists between us and England. I wish to soften and smooth it down as much as possible; but why close our eyes to the fact that friendship is impossible while jealousy exists? Hence England seizes every island in the sea and rock upon our coast where she can plant a gun to intimidate us or to annoy our commerce. Her policy has been to seize every military and naval station the world over. Why does she pay such enormous sums to keep her post at Gibraltar, except to keep it "in terrorem" over the commerce of the Mediterranean? Why her enormous expense to maintain a garrison at the Cape of Good Hope, except to command the great passage on the way to the Indies? Why is she at the expense to keep her position on that little barren island Bermuda, and the miserable Bahamas, and all the other islands along our coast, except as sentinels upon our actions? Does England hold Bermuda because of any profit it is to her? Has she any other motive for retaining it except jealousy which stimulates hostility to us? Is it not the case with all of her possessions along our coast? Why, then, talk about the friendly bearing of England towards us when she is extending that policy every day? New treaties of friendship, seizure of islands, and erection of new colonies in violation of her treaties, seem to be the order of the day. In view of this state of things, I am in favor of meeting England as we meet a rival; meet her boldly, treat her justly and fairly, but make no humiliating concession even for the sake of peace. She has as much reason to make concessions to us as we have to make them to her. I would not willingly disturb the peace of the world; but, sir, the Bay Island colony must be discontinued. It violates the treaty.

Now, Mr. President, it is not my purpose to say another word upon our foreign relations. I have only occupied so much time as was necessary to put myself right in respect to the speech made by the Senator from Delaware. He advocates one line of policy in regard to our foreign relations, and I have deemed it my duty to advocate another. It has been my object to put the two systems by the side of each other that the public might judge between us.

Mr. MASON obtained the floor, and on his motion the further consideration of the subject was postponed until to-morrow.

RECESS.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns it be to meet on Monday next.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, March 14, 1853.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Post Office Department, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of February 17, calling for copies of contracts entered into for the transportation of the mails from New York, via New Orleans and Vera Cruz, to San Francisco; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

AMERICAN CITIZENS IN CUBA.

Mr. JAMES submitted some documentary evidence in relation to the imprisonment of James H. West, an American citizen, in the Island of Cuba; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. ADAMS submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Senate will, at this session, elect a Secretary and Sergeant-at arms.

CAPTAIN MARCY'S REPORT.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. CHASE on Thursday last, was agreed to:

Resolved, That two thousand additional copies of the report of Captain R. B. Marcy of his exploration of the waters of the Red river, ordered to be printed by the resolution of the Senate of the 4th of February last, be printed for the use of the Senate; two hundred copies of which to be furnished to Captain Marcy; and that two hundred copies of the report of Captain Sitgreaves, ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate, be furnished to Captain Sitgreaves.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions submitted by Mr. CLAYTON on Monday, the 7th instant.

Mr. MASON said: Mr. President, it is my desire to make a few remarks in reply to some of the views expressed by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] in reference to the subject of debate before the Senate at the last session, connected with the affairs of Central America and the treaty between the United States and Great Britain in 1850.

The treaty of 19th April, 1850, negotiated at Washington and ratified by the Senate of the United States, came back from England in the month of June following, having received there the ratification of the British Government, and on the 4th of July it was formally published under the proclamation of the President, thus becoming the supreme law of the land. We are all aware that when the treaty came before the Senate, there was some objection made to it, because it seemed to involve a departure from the well-established policy of this Government to avoid all foreign alliance, or any alliance that might commit or entangle us in the management of our external relations. There was found in that treaty a mutual engagement between the two Governments—England and the United States—stipulating for the mutual protection and security, and to that extent a mutual intervention in the affairs of foreign Powers connected with a projected canal through the Republic of Nicaragua. I say that this provision of the treaty caused some difference of opinion in the Senate when it came before us, as to the propriety of departing even to that extent from the existing and well-established policy of the Government. But these objections were waived, and ultimately the treaty conciliated a large vote, because there was further in it, what I believe was considered at the time a final extinction of all claims and all pretensions to claim on the part of the British Government within the country termed by the treaty "Central America." I think I am right in saying that those provisions in the treaty conciliated objection, and the result was that it was ratified by a large vote.

Things remained in that condition, it being the general impression of the country that whatever views or purposes Great Britain might have had upon the extended coast of Central America, they were all renounced and quieted forever by the treaty of 1850. Nor did we know to the contrary until during the last session of Congress, when information came, not in an official form, but in a manner which made a pretty strong impression upon the country, that somehow, in contravention of the provisions of this treaty, Great Britain projected the establishment, if it had not already established, a colony within the limits of Central America upon certain islands called the Bay Islands. On the 30th of December the Senate adopted a resolution calling upon the President to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, any information in the possession of the Executive in relation to this projected colony. The President replied to that resolution in due time, and informed us substantially that he had no information on the subject, and that we had no diplomatic agent or government functionary of any kind in that quarter from whom information could be derived. But with the message the President communicated a correspondence which had taken place between the British Minister at Washington and the Secretary of State at the time the ratifications of the treaty of 1850 were exchanged. And so far as I am informed, it was then, for the first time, made known that anything had been appended to that treaty, or in any manner connected with it, under the shadow of which the Government of Great Britain might assume the right to continue its intervention or its dominion within the limits of Central America. A communication of such transaction produced a strong sensation in this body. It was made the occasion of an extended debate, and amongst others who participated in it were the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] whose absence and the cause of that absence we all regret; the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] and the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. SOULE.] There were others, I believe, who took part in the debate, with a view to illustrate the character of the correspondence, and its bearing upon the stipulations of the treaty. The subject was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I did not participate in the debate. I did not do it for two reasons: first, because I had not sufficient information to enable me to form a judgment satisfactory to myself; and secondly, because the whole subject-matter being before the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which I was a member, I thought the matter ought to be inquired into further before any opinion should be expressed upon it. The committee made its report near the close of the late session. That report was directed to three points. The first was as to the alleged colony of the "Bay Islands;" and the report informed the Senate, from the best information within reach of the committee, that these Bay Islands, five in number, formed part of the dominion of the Republic of Honduras, and that the Republic of Honduras, being undoubtedly a part of Central America, any attempt to colonize those islands would be in contravention of the treaty. The second point to which the report of the committee was directed was upon the questions connected with the British settlements at the Balize; and the report informed the Senate, as the judgment of the committee, that Great Britain held no dominion at the Balize whatsoever; that her possessions there were mere settlements, in the character of "useful domain," as was fully established by the treaties between Great Britain and Spain; that no political character whatever was attached to the settlements, nor was there any government there except for police regulation. Upon the question whether those British settlements at the Balize were or were not in Central America, the committee informed the Senate that they had been unable to obtain information sufficiently precise to determine with certainty their exact geographic position. But, upon the proofs before them, the committee entertained a strong opinion that they were located within the territory of Guatemala, and in such case, that they also would constitute a part of Central America, and come strictly within the renunciations of the treaty of 1850. The third point taken was in reference to the construction that should be placed upon the correspondence between the British Minister and the Secretary of State at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty. The result of the deliberation of the committee, as shown in their report, was, that the correspondence did nothing more than to express, as the opinion of the Executive Department of the Government, that the treaty of 1850 left unaffected the existing rights of the British at the Balize whatever they might be.

The honorable Senator from Delaware, in his remarks the other day, as I understood him, acquiesced in all the conclusions to which the committee came in their report except one, and that was in the opinion expressed by the committee that the British settlements at the Balize were in Central America; and the honorable Senator was pleased to express himself rather in a manner of anticipated triumph. He said:

"I join issue with the committee upon that point; and am prepared to show to the honorable Senator (the chairman of Foreign Relations) by abundant authority, that these British settlements at the Balize are not in Central America, but that they are in Mexico, in the Province of Yucatan."

I confess I was somewhat surprised at the very decided tone of the Senator in joining this issue. The committee had not assumed it. The committee presented to the Senate the best opinion they could form upon the state of the information before them, and they presented the question in the alternative, and in the alternative strictly. If these settlements are in Central America, then of course any extension of British dominion there will be in violation of the treaty. If not, then the treaty does not apply. The committee expressed as its opinion, that which I now entertain, but with guarded reference to the state of its information, that these settlements are in the Republic of Guatemala, and therefore in Central America. I was surprised at the very decided tone of the honorable Senator from Delaware in joining issue with the committee. I was surprised at it, because it was utterly inconsistent with the letter which he wrote in reply to the protest of the British Minister—utterly inconsistent. Let us advert to it.

I have said that the treaty of 1850 came back from London with the ratification of the British Government. Sir Henry L. Bulwer, who was then the representative of England in this country, as a preliminary to the exchange of ratifications, sent to the Secretary of State this note, which is called a "declaration" on the part of Great Britain.

The British Minister says:

"In proceeding to exchange the ratifications of the convention, signed at Washington on the 19th of April, 1850, between her Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, relative to the establishment of a communication by a ship canal between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans, the undersigned, her Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiary, has received her Majesty's instructions to declare that her Majesty does not understand the engagements of that convention to apply to her Majesty's settlements at Honduras or to its dependencies. Her Majesty's ratification of the said convention is exchanged under the explicit declaration above mentioned."

It is dated the 29th of June, 1850. The language of the declaration is clear and explicit. No man can misunderstand it. It is made a condition precedent to the exchange of the ratification of the treaty. The exchange was to be made on the part of the British Government, with the understanding "that the engagements of that convention should not apply to her Majesty's settlements at Honduras or its dependencies." What are the engagements of the convention? Why the engagements were, that Great Britain would not "occupy, fortify, colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion," in any part of Central America. Now, says the British note, it is our express understanding that the engagements of that treaty do not apply to her Majesty's settlement at Honduras. Sir, if her Majesty's settlements at Honduras are within Central America the treaty did apply to them—and the object of this note was, in such case, to withdraw them from its operation. The British Government may have been in doubt as to the true position of these settlements; and seeing, if they should be found in Guatemala, they would come under the renunciations of the treaty, their Minister was instructed to exhibit this protest. How was it met? Did the Secretary of State commit his Government to the English declaration, that the engagements of the treaty did not extend to these settlements? He did not. He contends now, and I think contends correctly, that his note went no further than to admit that the treaty was in no manner to affect the British title to those possessions, wherever they might be situated.

If the Secretary of State then thought, as the Senator from Delaware now thinks, that those settlements are not in Central America, why, in his answer, did he not, in two lines, say that clearly the engagements of the treaty did not apply to them, because they were not in Central America? But, Mr. President, did he give that answer? He did not. His letter, if I may be allowed to express it, with entire respect to the Senator from Delaware, is not very explicit; but taking it altogether, we can assign to it but one meaning, and that meaning is: "I dissent from your proposition, and am not prepared to say that the British settlements are not in Central America." The terms of his note are:

"The language of the first article of the Convention, concluded on the 19th day of April last, between the United States and Great Britain, describing the country not to be occupied, &c., by either of the parties, was, as you know, twice approved by your Government; and it was neither understood by them, nor by either of us, (the negotiators,) to include the British settlement in Honduras, (commonly called British Honduras, as distinct from the State of Honduras,) nor the small islands in the neighborhood of that settlement, which may be known as its dependencies. To this settlement, and these islands, the treaty we negotiated was not intended by either of us to apply."

If he had stopped there, it would import precisely what the honorable Senator now says is the geographical fact. It would have imported that the engagement of the treaty did not apply to those settlements, because they were not within the prescribed limits. But it does not stop there. In the very next line the Secretary adds:

"The title to them, it is now and has been my intention, throughout the whole negotiation, to leave, as the treaty leaves it, without denying, affirming, or in any way meddling with the same, just as it stood previously."

So that when the British Minister called upon the Secretary of State to admit that none of the engagements of the treaty applied to the British settlements at Honduras, the Secretary of State said, in substance, "I will make no such admission, but I will admit that none of the engagements of that treaty are intended to affect the title of Great Britain to those settlements, let them lie where they may, whether in Central America or not." I say, then, that the honorable Secretary of State was guarded, and properly guarded, in refraining from making the admission asked for in the British "declaration." What the British Minister wanted, was an admission that the treaty did not apply to these settlements, whether in Central America or no. The Secretary of State refused to admit the protest to that extent, but confined it to the single question of the title; and he substantially declared, "I will not agree that the engagements do not apply to the British settlement at Honduras, but I will agree that they do not apply to your title."

But, sir, the honorable Secretary of State went further in that note, and fully and clearly developed that he did not mean to commit himself as to the geographical position of the settlements. He goes on to inform the British Minister that the difficulty arises out of the question as to what are the limits of Central America. Now, sir, what difficulty had there arisen out of the question as to the limits of Central America but from the fact that the limits of Central America must be ascertained before he could assent to the extent to which the British protest went? His language is:

"The difficulty that now arises seems to spring from the use, in our convention, of the term 'Central America,' which we adopted because Viscount Palmerston had assented to it and used it as the proper term, we naturally supposing that, on this account, it would be satisfactory to your Government; but if your Government now intend to delay the exchange of ratifications until we shall have fixed the precise limits of Central America, we must defer further action until we have further information on both sides, to which at present we have no means of resort, and which it is certain we could not obtain before the term fixed for exchanging the ratifications would expire."

And he adds:

"But on some futhre occasion a conventional article, clearly stating what are the limits of Central America, might become advisable."

Now, sir, why that language? Why inform the British minister that if "you make a difficulty about Central America it will defeat the treaty?" Why inform the British minister if "you insist upon a committal now as to the limits of Central America we must wait until we get further information on both sides?" Why inform the British minister "that at some future day a conventional article clearly stating what are the limits of Central America might become advisable?" Why not at once have agreed to the terms of the British note, without reference to any necessity for determining by further inquiry the boundaries of Central America, if the fact was clear, as he now assumes, that the British settlements were not within those boundaries? Sir, I appeal from the Senator from Delaware to the Secretary of State; I arraign the Senator from Delaware before the Secretary of State. I say the Secretary of State refused to make the admission which the Senator from Delaware now attempts to establish. Why, sir, the Senator spoke with a tone of triumph, almost scouting the idea that there could be any difference of opinion, and claimed in his speech to show conclusively that the settlements were not in Central America. I say, then, with all the respect which I bear to that gentleman both as a gentleman and a Senator, that I appeal from the Senator from Delaware to the Secretary of State on this question of boundary.

The report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, with which upon this point the Senator from Delaware has declared he joins issue, does not assume as a fact upon which the action of this Government is to be based, that the British settlements are in Central America. The report of the committee has guardedly avoided, as the Senator when Secretary of State avoided, any committal on this point; but the committee in the report, from the information before it, expressed as its opinion, when the question comes to be accurately ascertained, it will be found that the settlements are in Guatemala; and if they are in Guatemala, they then come under the provisions of the treaty, any declarations subsequent to the treaty to the contrary notwithstanding. It is in that point of view, and in that alone, that the question is one of interest to us. This term Central America, which the honorable Senator says was put into the treaty because it was used by Viscount Palmerston, and approved by the British Government, as it seems is not the true term and may be calculated to mislead. The honorable Senator from Michigan, in debating this subject, at the first impression, when the message of the President came in, assumed at once, "Why, who can doubt that they are in Central America?—are they not geographically in that portion of America which lies between the two continents? Who can fail to see where North America terminates, and where South America begins, and that the intermediate strip of country is of course Central America?" Geographically the Senator from Michigan was right, but politically he may have been wrong, because the question at last is, What is meant by "Central America?"

The terms "Central America" are, so far as I can learn, not known to the country they are intended to designate, and confusion and difficulties not unfrequently arise from the misuse of words. The five separate republics classed under that designation, comprised under the Spanish rule, the captain-generalcy of Guatemala, and were at that time, the provinces of Guatemala, Honduras, San Salvador, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica. These provinces in the year 1821 threw off their allegiance to Spain, and in 1824 they formed a confederacy modeled very much after the example of the United States, under the name of the "Confederation of the Centre of America." Still, I take for granted we may safely assume what the treaty calls "Central America" to mean those republics which united under the title of the "Centre of America," and to affirm of the latter whatever is predicated of the former.

I do not know how far the archives of the old Spanish dominions upon the southern continent will be found, when examined, clearly to ascertain and fix the boundaries or divisions between the provinces. I am not informed on that subject. I have had some occasion to make inquiry in reference to our disputed boundaries with Mexico, and have found that the boundaries between the provinces were generally of an unsettled and indeterminate character. How far the same may be affirmed of the boundary between Mexico and the captain-generalcy of Guatemala, I am uninformed, but so far as I can get information, I am strongly disposed to believe, when these boundaries are ascertained that the British settlements on Honduras bay, as they are prescribed by the treaties with Spain, will be found to lie altogether within the limits of the captain-generalcy of Guatemala, and not of New Spain or Mexico.

The first authority to which the honorable Senator referred in his attempt to establish the position that they were not in Central America, was Humboldt, upon whom he relied, and justly relied, as one of the most authentic writers upon the subject of the Spanish possessions in America. I have referred to Humboldt; and although it may be that he meant to describe these British settlements as within the province of Yucatan, yet it is by no means a clear question. On page 170, the page to which the Senator referred, Humboldt, speaking of the intendency of Merida, or the peninsula of Yucatan, after describing the face of the country, climate, &c., says:

"The ruins of European edifices discoverable in the Island Cosumel, in the midst of a grove of palm trees, indicate that this island, which is now uninhabited, was, at the commencement of the conquest, peopled by Spanish colonists. Since the settlement of the English between Omo and Rio Hondo, the government, to diminish the contraband trade, concentrated the Spanish and Indian population in the part of the peninsula west from the mountains of Yucatan. Colonists are not permitted to settle on the western coast* on the banks of the Rio Bacalar and Rio Hondo."—Political Essay on the Kingdom of New Spain, by Baron Humboldt, vol. 2, page 160.

Now, Humboldt is giving us here information as to the effect that had been operated upon the Indians and the other population of Yucatan by means of these British settlements; that is to say, because of the contraband trade which sprung up in the British settlements, the Government of Yucatan had withdrawn its population, but he does not say, as a matter of geographic history, that because the British settlements were between the Rio Omoa and the Rio Hondo, they were to be found in the province of Yucatan, neither does he tell us that the Rio Hondo was a river of Yucatan. I say, therefore, although it may be when speaking here of the province of Merida or Yucatan, and of the British settlements, that he meant to say they formed a part of Yucatan, yet it is by no means conclusive.

*Evidently eastern coast.—Trans.

The honorable Senator then refers to a Spanish writer, Alcedo, on whom he seems to place great reliance. I have looked also into this work—a large geographical dictionary, a compilation—but I think the honorable Senator himself will not ascribe much authority to Mr. Alcedo when he finds that Alcedo has been discredited by Humboldt, who is certainly far more worthy of reliance. I find that Humboldt complains that the English geographer Pinkerton had pirated and misused his materials. In speaking of that piracy, he refers to Alcedo, and says:

"Mr. Pinkerton, in the second edition of his Modern Geography, has endeavored to give a minute description of the Spanish possessions in North America; and he has contrived to mix several exact notions derived from the Viajero Universal with the most vague data furnished by the dictionary of M. Alcedo. This author, who believes himself to possess a singular knowledge of the true territorial divisions of New Spain, considers the Provinces of Sonora, Sinaloa, and La Pimeria, as parts of New Biscay. He divides what he calls the dominions (domaine) of Mexico into the districts of Nueva Galicia, Panuco, Zacatulo, &c., &c. According to this principle we should say that the three great divisions of Europe are Spain, Languedoc, Catalonia, and the territories of Cadiz and Bordeaux."—Political Essay on the Kingdom of New Spain, by Baron Humboldt, vol. 1, p. 263-'4-'5.

That is the way he introduces Alcedo to the consideration of all historians and geographers. I say, then, that Alcedo is discredited by Humboldt, and not discredited only, but discredited in a manner to show, in the opinion of Humboldt, that there is no great degree of merit to be ascribed to any of those writers who have attempted to trace, from early records, the boundaries between the Spanish provinces.

I would suggest, then, to the Senator from Delaware, that for the future conduct of this question, as it may involve the interests of this country, it would be safer for him to repose on his note, connected with the treaty of 1850, where he guardedly refuses any admission, than to recur to the speech which he made a few days ago, when he presented an argument to establish it as a fact, a geographical fact, that the British settlements at Balize were to be found in Mexico, and not in Central America.

One authority cited by the honorable Senator was Arrowsmith, who published a map of Guatemala in 1826. The honorable Senator was kind enough to give me access to it. That map purports to have been reduced from the survey in the archives of Guatemala—a declaration on the part of Arrowsmith which, in the judgment of the honorable Senator, entitles it to high credit. Now, Mr. President, all geographers are conversant with the maps of Arrowsmith. He is, perhaps, now one of the largest map-makers in the world, and to whom, I believe great credit is generally given for accuracy. But Arrowsmith has this remarkable fact connected with his maps: He does not date them; not one in twenty, so far as my observation goes, will you find dated. But it is a little remarkable that this map of 1826 is dated, and claims to have been compiled from surveys to be found in the archives of Guatemala.

The honorable Senator informed us, in introducing the map, that it was one entitled to peculiar confidence, because the British Government was anxious to ascertain where those settlements were, and therefore it sent a deputation to Guatemala to examine the archives. He informed us that the anxiety of the British Government to know where the British settlements were arose from this: that since the dominion of Spain had ended, Great Britain was at a loss to know who was her landlord in regard to these settlements—whether she was to treat with Mexico or Guatemala upon the subject of those possessions; and therefore it became a matter of interest to England to send an agent to Guatemala to learn it, and the result was, said he, this map of Arrowsmith of 1826. I believe I have stated the honorable Senator's position correctly. He further informed us, that by means of that investigation Great Britain found that her settlements at Honduras bay were in the Province of Yucatan, and she proceeded to treat, and did treat, with Mexico accordingly in reference to them. It is a little unfortunate for the Senator's theory that there is a seeming conflict of dates, because the treaty was made in 1826, and the map was published in England in the same year, and it is hardly to be presumed that the treaty followed so immediately upon the promulgation of the map. I have taken the precaution to look into other maps of Arrowsmith in reference to these British possessions, and have found what any Senator will find who will examine them, that they are made exclusively with reference to British pretension, and without any earthly regard to the existing state of facts—geographical or political.

Sir, there is a map of Arrowsmith, a very large map, in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, a map of the West India Islands and the coast of Central America opposite. It has no date, but you will find upon it that the British settlements at Balize are laid down, as they should be, between the Rio Hondo on the north, and the Rio Sipon on the south. These are the treaty limits with Spain as prescribed by the treaty of 1786. And then, if you will extend your walk into the Library, you will find a large atlas, published by Arrowsmith, again without date, in which you will find the British possessions at Balize extended as far down as the river Sarstoon, embracing an extent, it is said, of one hundred and fifty miles below the southern limit of the treaty; so that this author, upon whom the Senator relies to settle this geographical question, on the author's own word that his map is compiled from the archives of Guatemala, lays down the British possessions on his map, not as they are prescribed by the treaty, but as successive encroachments by the settlers have enlarged them, according to the treaty limits in the earlier map, and according to the British trespasses in the later map.

I say, then, with all possible respect to the literature of that country and to those who have charge of the geographical portions of it, that when British interests are concerned, there is not the slightest credit to be given to this map-maker, Arrowsmith.

And thus, sir, although Arrowsmith claims in 1826 to have compiled his map from the archives of Guatemala, and thus to throw those settlements in Mexico, yet in the year 1832, an official map was published by the Republic of Guatemala, in which the whole of these settlements are shown to be comprised within the limits of that Republic. I have that map in the committee room, and intended to have brought it up with me, but it escaped my recollection; any gentleman, however, who is curious on the subject, may examine it for himself. It is an atlas published in Guatemala, entitled "An Atlas of Guatemala, in eight maps, prepared and engraved in Guatemala by order of the Chief of the State, C. D'Mariano Galves." The north and northwestern boundary of Guatemala, although called "line undefined," is there north of the Rio Hondo, which river by the map is altogether within the limits of Guatemala. The author of that map is a certain Allejandro Marure, professor of history and geography in the Academy of Sciences of the State of Guatemala.

Here, then, is a map published at Guatemala, by direction of the government of Guatemala, drawn by one of their most eminent literary characters, showing the Rio Hondo, which is the northern boundary of the British settlements, to be altogether within the limits of Guatemala; and yet the honorable Senator says you are to give no credit in the world to the map, because Guatemala was interested in the matter; but you are to ascribe all faith to the British map-maker, because he says his map is compiled from materials in the archives of that State. I say, sir, that in my judgment, I would rely, for the present at least, upon the map of the State of Guatemala, which has the credit and the faith of the State of Guatemala attached to it, because it was published under its authority. I ask the honorable Senator from Delaware, how are we to know the boundaries of any nation but from the declaration or prescription of the nation itself? Every nation has a right to assert its own boundaries as against others who are not territorially interested, and they are to be taken, if not as absolutely, certainly prima facie true. We have no territorial interest in the boundary of Guatemala. We have no contiguous territory, and no disputed line between us; and I say to the Senator from Delaware, that England has none. England is not territorially interested in the question of boundary between Guatemala and Yucatan. England is interested only to know the boundaries prescribed by Spain to her settlements; but whether they lie in Guatemala or in Mexico is not the question which interests her. Her rights remain the same, be they where they may. We are interested in it only under the treaty of 1850, because Great Britain has stipulated that she will not colonize in Central America. We are interested, therefore, in knowing whether the settlements of England are or are not in Central America. That is our interest. England may have a like interest as against us; but against the Republic of Guatemala she has none. She has not the slightest interest as to the disputed boundary between Guatemala and Yucatan. Then I say confidently, that for the present at least, and until we are further informed, we are to take as true what we are officially informed by Guatemala is true, that the British settlements are in her territory. Upon survey and examination, conducted in the proper manner to determine the question of boundary, let the facts be what they may, whenever established we will assent; but for the present I shall repose upon the assertion of Guatemala, that these settlements are within her territory, and take it as prima facie true.

But, sir, we have some further proof on this subject which I was concerned to find met with little favor at the hands of the Senator from Delaware—some further Guatemalan authorities. I have said, in one of the maps of Arrowsmith, (that found in the atlas,) the British possessions, which in a previous map he had correctly defined by the limits prescribed in the Spanish treaty, are extended very far south of the treaty line, and as low as the river Sarstoon. The treaty made with Spain in 1783, clearly defined the limits of those British settlements; they were bounded on the south by the river Wallis or Balize, and on the north by the Rio Hondo. Three years afterwards, in 1786, by a new treaty between Spain and England, the southern boundary was extended to the river Sipon or Tabon, so that from that day to this, without question as far as the title is concerned, the British possessions at Balize, by the treaty are confined to the country between the river Sipon on the south, and the Hondo on the north; but yet, as I said, on this map of Arrowsmith, (the map-maker on whom the Senator relies,) you will find these British settlements extended as low as the Sarstoon river, a river emptying as far south as the bight of the Bay of Honduras, giving, it is said, forty-five leagues of sea-coast outside of the treaty limits to the British settlements. Now, we have what Guatemala said on that subject in 1835, contained in a letter from a gentleman who, I was also concerned to find, met with little favor at the hands of the Senator from Delaware—Colonel Galindo, or Don Juan Galindo, whichever may please the Senator best. Colonel Galindo, who was a minister or commissioner from the confederacy of Central America to Great Britain in 1835, in a letter addressed to the Secretary of State, Mr. Forsyth, gives him the following information:

"The authorities of Balize took upon themselves, in November last, to declare their limits to be the Hondo on the north, the Sarstoon on the south, and on the west a line drawn parallel to the coast through Garbutt's Falls, in the river Balize, thus extending the old grant by at least fivefold."

This gentleman, who was sent from Guatemala to England to remonstrate upon the subject of these British trespasses in that country, informed the Secretary of State, in 1835, that the authorities of Balize claimed, in contravention of the treaty, as far south as the Sarstoon river; and here you find upon the map of Arrowsmith, to which I have adverted, that convenient map-maker, the British possessions extending to that river. I have now had brought to me the map published by Guatemala, to which I referred, and any Senator who desires may look at it; and it will be found that the British possessions are fixed within the limits of the State of Guatemala. I rely upon that until the contrary is shown.

[There was another part of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations upon which the Senator animadverted. I mean the information communicated by Colonel Galindo, who was sent upon this mission to England. Of this gentleman the Senator boldly affirms, that he was an impostor—to establish which, he avers that he was a mere bearer of dispatches, whilst claiming to be a minister to a foreign court; and again, that whilst he assumed to have been sent by the Federal Government of Central America to England, he was in truth but an emissary of the separate State of Guatemala.

These positions of the Senator to discredit the State of Guatemala, and with it all evidence derived from that Republic, I think will furnish no bad exemplar of the mode in which the Senator has dealt with the argument against the English pretensions, and I shall therefore present the facts to the Senate as they appear in the documents to which the report of the committee had reference.

In 1834, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs of the "Confederation of Central America," by letter to Mr. Forsyth, then Secretary of State, introduced to him a certain Colonel John Galindo, who, he informs Mr. Forsyth, had been sent by the Government of Central America as a Commissioner "accredited" to the Government of England, to lay before the latter Government the complaints of Central America against the aggressions of the English settlers at Balize—a most unwelcome topic certainly to England; and Mr. Forsyth was further informed that Colonel Galindo was instructed to come first to the United States, and to ask the good offices of this Government to aid him in his mission to England. He was received by Mr. Forsyth in due form as the representative of Central America, but, for reasons satisfactory to our Government doubtless, but which do not appear in the correspondence, interference on our part was declined. Colonel Galindo went on his way to England, and that Government declined receiving him as the representative of Central America, on the ground that he was a British subject, and therefore could not be accredited as the representative of a foreign Power.

It was in this manner that England evaded the remonstrance of Central America, shielding herself behind the arrogance of British law, which acknowledges no expatriation—once a subject of England's monarch, always a subject. Colonel Galindo, it seems, was of Irish birth.

Such was his mission, and such its termination. Central America was too feeble a Power to enforce a hearing at the haughty Court of St. James; but I demand to know through what sympathy is her accredited minister now to be denounced in our American Senate as an impostor?

Mr. Forsyth in a letter to Mr. Murphy, who was the confidential agent of the United States at Central America, speaks of Colonel Galindo in this language:

"Colonel Galindo, a distinguished officer in the Central American army, was bearer of the application of his Government to ours."

In the letter quoted, from the Secretary of Foreign Affairs of Central America to Mr. Forsyth, he says that a grant of land had been made by the State of Guatemala to a certain company for purposes of colonization, and that the colonists had been driven off by the English settlers. This was the cause of Colonel Galindo's mission in England. In the same letter that Secretary says, speaking of the boundaries of Guatemala, "the Rio Hondo forms the boundary between Guatemala and Yucatan." If that be true, it settles the whole question as to whether these possessions are or are not in Central America. Is it true? The honorable Senator from Delaware says it is false, and undertakes to show that it is false; and he makes that assertion upon such authority as the British map-maker, Arrowsmith, in direct contradiction to the solemn asseveration made by the Minister of Foreign Affairs in Central America. To give this history, however, correctly, I will quote it at large from the letter of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, as follows:

"The Rio Hondo forms the boundary between Guatemala and Yucatan, and consequently the whole of the grant made by her Catholic Majesty to the British cutters is within the sovereignty of Central America: however, the Mexican States, in their treaty with Great Britain, took upon themselves to sanction the said grant of the Spanish monarch; in consequence of which the English settlers again possessed themselves of the southern bank of the Hondo, but never took any measures to disoccupy the country to the west and south, which, in every view, they had only held as an equivalent."

It then goes on to say:

"In consequence of the grants of land made of that territory by the State of Guatemala to certain Central American citizens, and an European colonization company, the authorities of Balize took upon themselves, in November last, to declare their limits to be the Hondo on the north, the Sarstoon on the south, and on the west a line drawn parallel to the coast through Garbutt's Falls, in the river Balize, thus exceeding the old grant by at least fivefold."

Here, then, is a complaint made by our sister Republic, the Confederation of the Centre of America, to the United States, upon whose justice and strength it relied against these British aggressions at Honduras bay, in which they state their title, and say that their boundary is the Rio Hondo. The honorable Senator from Delaware says that no earthly credit is to be given to what comes from that quarter, because they are interested; and for what reason does he say it? What is the end to be attained by the honorable Senator, if he could prove his proposition to be true that these settlements are not in Central America, except that he would then show they were withdrawn from the obligations of the treaty of 1850?

Sir, there was communicated by that gentleman, Colonel Galindo to Mr. Forsyth, a paper which none can read without seeing that it is the work of a man of ability. It is a remonstrance drawn up by a certain Mr. Annitia, who, Colonel Galindo informed the Secretary, was a member of the Congress of the Confederation from the State of Guatemala. It was published in Guatemala, and was intended to present to the people of Guatemala their true position in reference to the British settlements; and he draws a picture which will show to us, and to any who will read it, that these settlements within the territory of Guatemala, not only caused endless discord and trouble, but would ruin the resources of Guatemala by the cupidity of British merchants. This gentleman, a member of the Congress of Central America; also claims, in direct terms, that the whole of the settlements are within their territory. His language is this:

"In the year 1783, the Spanish Government, which, until then, exercised in this country the power which they had acquired by conquest, agreed that the subjects of his Britannic Majesty might cut dye or Campeachy wood within the district prescribed for them, between the rivers Hondo and Balize, or Belese, which are in our territory."

He then goes on to depict the mischiefs, the injuries, and the evils under which the Republic of Guatemala was laboring, on account of the contraband trade carried on in the British settlements. He speaks, as I have read, of the aggressions of the settlers extending their limits beyond the proper southern boundary, and he says:

"But the transaction of which they ought to be ashamed is, by a strange process, made the ground of a title; for those gentlemen affirm that they have a right to retain all they occupied up to the year 1821. If it were true that they could thus establish a legal claim, to what, with their activity, and our apathy, would they not soon pretend? Besides, by giving the provisional settlement in question the importance of a colony, and making it, with the provinces that composed the ancient kingdom of Guatemala, some of its inhabitants advance other arguments, which, although easy to refute, it is not the object which I have in view."

Now, Mr. President, it has never been assumed on the part of the Committee on Foreign Relations, nor have I assumed it in the debate here, as a fact upon which the action of this Government is to be founded in reference to the British treaty, that these possessions are in Central America. I assume only so far as we are informed that the weight of authority is on that side. I say that the Republic of Guatemala claims it—claims it not only through her official documents, to which I have referred, but through her official maps; and that in the present posture of the question, we are bound to take that as prima facie true. Sir, during the last Congress a mission was instituted to these Governments of Central America, and a minister will be sent there doubtless with the instruction to obtain and report to his Government accurate information upon this whole subject, and particularly as to the geographical position of these British settlements. We shall probably know at the next session of Congress whether those settlements are in Central America or not, and when that fact is established the proper action of the Government will follow in respect to the treaty of 1850.

The report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on this branch of the inquiry committed to them, submits only that prima facie the title is with Guatemala; and if this be so, the result in regard to England, in reference to the treaty, is, that her settlements there remain undisturbed within the limits and under the rights acquired from Spain. But she has not the right to colonize, to fortify, or to assume, or to exercise any dominion or juriediction greater than that existing before the treaty of 1850.

Mr. President, I do not intend to prosecute this discussion further. Whenever a question shall come up between the two Governments, the United States and England, as to the proper construction of this treaty, the stipulations in regard to Central America, or as to the effect, if any, upon the text of the treaty, by the subsequent declaration and correspondence between the Secretary of State and the British minister, we shall be prepared to meet it. Sir, peace in our beloved country is to be preferred over everything except national safety and national honor. That statesman or that man who would precipitate his country into a war carelessly, recklessly, or idly, upon the assertion of any abstract opinion, would go down, as he would deserve, to posterity with execration. But that statesman or that man who would jeopard the national honor or the national safety, from any fear of war, would go down with deeper execration still. For one, I am prepared to say, that while a fair, a legitimate, a just construction is to be given to the treaty, England must be held strictly to its engagements. The governments of Central America are weak and feeble—they are powerless against England. In 1835 she refused to hear their remonstrance against aggressions under British authority. Now, by this treaty of 1850, the honor of this country is sternly committed to preserve the integrity of every part of Central America as essential to our own safety.

Sir, the Government of Old England is known—well known. It is great, mighty, and powerful, and not great, mighty, and powerful alone, but wise and sagacious. Look at her! Why, it has been truly said that the sun never sets upon her dominion! The world is circled by her "martial airs," as was beautifully and strongly said by the lamented Webster. Look at our own continent! From the Island of Trinidad, at the mouth of the Orinoco, to the Cape of Florida, you find her entrenched on a cordon of islands. We cannot put her out of them. She commands the southern outlet of the Caribbean sea, and at the Bahamas, the Gulf of Mexico. She is fortified everywhere. Why? To protect her fleets in a state of war, and further her commerce in a state of peace. How is it in the eastern hemisphere? She commands the Mediterranean sea at Gibraltar; the pass between Africa and Sicily, at Malta, and recently, as late as 1839, she has mastered the enterprise of commanding the route to India, by seizing the fortress of Aden at the Straits of Babelmandel, the Arabian "Gate of Tears." I do not complain of that. We have no right to complain. England is wise in her generation. She reposes upon her own strength. If other nations permit her to seize and retain such strongholds on the eastern hemisphere, be it so; but upon this continent she has gone as far as she can go, consistent with the safety and interest of this country. Now, sir, I am prepared to make no charge. I am uninformed upon the subject. We are told that these British settlers at the Balize are constantly trespassing upon Central America; that they have endeavored more than once to seize the Bay Islands, and colonize them. Intelligence in the public journals of this very day tell us of some new aggression committed in Honduras by the British authorities there. Still they are in report and rumor only. I make, therefore, no charge of bad faith or violation of the treaty, because I have not information to justify me in making such a charge. But, sir, just as certain as the seasons return and the earth revolves in its orbit, this continent, so far as it interests the welfare and safety of the United States, must be freed from the aggressions of England.

Mr. CLAYTON commenced replying to Mr. DOUGLAS and Mr. MASON, but after speaking nearly an hour without concluding, gave way for a motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. ADAMS, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 15, 1853.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to a resolution of the Senate calling for information in regard to the contract made with Howland & Aspinwall for the supply of coal for the Japan expedition; which was ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. EVERETT, it was Ordered, That two thousand additional copies of the message of the President of the United States, communicated to the Senate on the 8th instant, transmitting the report of the Secretary of State in relation to the fisheries on the coasts of the British North American Provinces, be printed for the use of the Senate.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion by Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, it was Ordered, That E. P. Colkins have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was Ordered, That Harriet F. Fisher have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. CLAYTON on the 7th instant.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have now heard both the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] and shall reply to both. First, let me notice the remarks of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. MASON] in defense of his report. The Senator from Illinois, who is a member of that committee, says for himself, by way of excuse, I suppose, that he was not present when it was read in committee, and, accordingly, he does not attempt to defend it. The late Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. UNDERWOOD,) another member of the committee, announced his dissent from it when the report was made. The honorable chairman, [Mr. MASON,] for whom I have great respect, defends it still, after all I have said to refute it. But it cannot escape observation that he has not been able to produce any authority to sustain it besides that which the report itself sets forth. What was that? Why, nothing more, according to his own present showing, than the assertion by Guatemala in some maps, purely ex parte maps, each entitled to no more credit than a plat of a farm made by a man claiming it who has never been in possession of it and never sought to obtain it. But I do not agree with him that the maps he has produced do prove that Guatemala makes any claim to the Balize territory within the limits of the treaty of 1786. The map made by order of the chief of the State of Guatemala, C. D. Mariano Galvez, appears, like every other map made by Guatemala which I have seen, to be constructed without scientific arrangement, and on its own face unreliable; and, if I understand it, the chairman is entirely mistaken in his inference from it, that it includes Balize within the limits of the State of Guatemala. The lines appear to be dotted which are to designate her boundaries, and dotted lines are marked around Balize, as if to exhibit it as a separate territory. The honorable chairman and I draw different inferences from the same paper, and the paper itself is no authority for either of us.

As to his remarks on the passages from Humboldt and Alcedo quoted by me, I can only desire others to look at them and decide between us. Humboldt does not, in the passage cited by the honorable Senator, discredit Alcedo in reference to this question, but differs from him in regard to another matter. The honorable Senator was entirely silent in regard to all the other authorities I quoted, except the map of Guatemala published by Arrowsmith, the royal hydrographer, in January, 1826, which he admits proves all I stated if it is to be credited, but which he thinks ought to be discredited, because it was made by an Englishman. I produced it for the very purpose of showing how Englishmen understood the subject, when they sought from Mexico and not from Guatemala the confirmation of their claims on British Honduras, under the treaty of 1786, and obtained the ratification of them by the treaty with Mexico in December, 1826. The map does conclusively prove this, as it was made from "the original survey in the archives of Guatemala" herself. But I ask again, why is it that all English authorities are to be wholly disregarded, and all the mere pretensions of Guatemala are to be viewed with perfect confidence? He says we are bound to receive her assertions, because she claims it. I deny that she claims it; and if she did, does not Great Britain also claim it under a grant from Mexico? and has she not been in the undisputed possession of it ever since Guatemala had existence as a State? The honorable Senator may well express doubts of the conclusion arrived at in his report, since he has had time to look into the many other authorities to which I referred him, and to which he has made not the slightest exception.

It is true, as the Senator states, that Mr. Webster did, in a letter to Mr. Murphy, of the 6th of August, 1841, speak of the Irishman, John Galindo, as "Colonel Galindo, a distinguished officer in the Central American army," and of his mission to England as being "accredited by the Government of Central America." But it is also true that Mr. Murphy, writing from Guatemala on the 20th January, 1842, informed Mr. Webster of the imposition which caused his mistake. The Irishman, John Galindo, now called in the report "Don Galindo," "the Minister," was, as I said, an impostor; and the letter of Mr. Murphy proves that there was a gross misrepresentation of his official character, even in the letter of Alvarez himself. Who could rely on such testimony, even if it had stated that Balize was in Guatemala? Sir, I submit that there is no shadow of evidence left to sustain the position that Balize is or ever was in the State of Guatemala, and knowing that I have fully refuted the report, I leave it.

As to my letter to Mr. Bulwer, which is a counter-declaration to prevent a misconstruction of his letter of the 4th of July, 1850, the chairman was perfectly right in his report that it did not consent to any alteration of the treaty, or to the possible inference that the eminent domain was in Great Britain at the Balize. The letter also expressly states that the dependencies of Balize are "the small islands known to be dependencies of British Honduras;" it declares also, without contradiction, that the treaty does embrace "all the Central American Republics, with all their just limits and proper dependencies." With these facts before him, any man may decide the honorable chairman's appeal from the Senate to the Secretary of State.

The Senator from Virginia undertook to state the facts in regard to the declaration of Sir Henry L. Bulwer, and my counter-declaration of the 4th of July, 1850. In doing this he has omitted some of the facts. He omitted, I observe, to state that Congress was officially informed by me, almost immediately after the exchange of ratifications, that British Honduras was not included in the treaty of 1850. He has omitted to state that the public were also apprised of the fact at the very moment of the first publication of the treaty, and that no complaint was ever made of the exclusion of British Honduras from the treaty by any man till the 6th of January last, more than two years after every one knew it or had reason to know it. Above all, he omitted to state—what was publicly known here and elsewhere—that at the very moment of the exchange of ratifications I was officially informed by Mr. King, the chairman of your Committee on Foreign Relations, that the Senate, at the time of voting on the treaty, "perfectly understood that British Honduras was not included in the treaty." If they did—and they dare not deny the statement of their own official organ, the chairman of that committee—why is it that so elaborate and persevering an effort is made to inculcate the absurd notion that British Honduras was included in the treaty? I have here before me the letter of your own chairman—your own organ, to inform me of your views—the letter of Mr. King himself. It is conclusive of the fact that the Senator, and all others who voted for or against the treaty, perfectly understood at the time that the territory of British Honduras was not included in the treaty! All understood it then; but a few have said they did not understand it so, and a few others try to prove it is not where their own official organ declared to me they perfectly understood it to be when the treaty was ratified by them. They try to convict their own organ, appointed by them to communicate with me, of a misstatement, or to convict themselves of ignorance. The late Senator from North Carolina, (Mr. Mangum,) who, with Mr. Webster, was on the Committee on Foreign Relations at the time, stated that every member of that committee understood the treaty precisely as their chairman understood it.

My object in offering the second resolution was to give the new Administration a fair opportunity of examining and deciding for itself the question (without any previous committal of this body) whether the little islands of Roatan, Bonaca, Utilla, Barbarat, Helena, and Morat, are or are not within the limits of the State of Honduras. If they are, and the reports of English occupation of them be true, then the treaty has been violated. So, too, if the newspaper reports of the occupation of Truxillo and Limas, in Central America, be true, that would be matter for immediate attention on the part of this Government. I will, as I have already said, go as far as he that dare go furthest in vindication of the national honor and the integrity of the treaty. We are bound on our part faithfully to observe this and all other treaties, and to see that other nations observe them when we are interested in them. I do not desire any hasty action on the subject; and whether the Secretary of State shall keep the subject under consideration until the next session of Congress, or report immediately, I wish to leave entirely to his own discretion. Let the Executive have full time to collect information and decide for itself. Let nothing be decided in a hurry.

The member from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] says again, that Great Britain still remains in possession of Central America. He says she has not relinquished "an inch" of it. This only proves that he has not read the official papers before us, and has made a reckless assertion, without proof. The Secretary of State, in his letter before us of the 16th of February last, says that "the British 'Government does not expect to make complete 'provision against the danger to the Mosquito In-'dians." "They consider it, however, their duty 'to do what is required by honor and humanity in 'behalf of the Mosquito nation; declaring at the 'same time, that they intend to adhere strictly to 'the treaty of Washington of the 19th April, 1850, 'and not to assume any sovereignty, direct or in-'direct, in Central America." The British have no right to exert any force, I repeat again, with a view to the support of the pretended protectorate of the Mosquito king. If they do attempt it, that must inevitably involve us in a controversy which never can terminate honorably for us without their utter abandonment of any such claim. I do not pretend that either they or we cannot interfere with a Central American State which robs or plunders the subjects of their country, or the citizens of the other. Were any of these States to imprison our citizens, or rob them of their property, it is our duty to protect them, and after all efforts of honorable diplomacy are exhausted, to compel a full indemnity for the wrong. It may be possible that Great Britain may have endeavored to enforce such an indemnity for her subjects for torts of Honduras to them. The treaty does not protect any of these Central American States from punishment for outrages committed by their authority to either English subjects or American citizens. Those States are only on the same footing under the treaty with all other independent nations. It is possible that assaults or threats may have been lately made against Honduras on account of injuries to British subjects residing there. The omission to pay damages due them was the reason assigned for the seizure of Tigre Island in 1850, which was on the Pacific side of the State of Honduras. Neither the law of reprisals for torts, nor the right of any Government to interfere for the protection of its citizens or subjects against oppression and outrage, have been abolished by the treaty of 1850. We should be as prompt to demand reparation for wrongs done to an American citizen by Honduras as by any other State or country, without in any way violating the treaty. We know that in the case of the island (Tigre) I have mentioned, the occupation was disavowed promptly. Let us wait patiently, and learn how the facts really are, before we proclaim the perfidy of any nation. But, without blustering, let us be firm in executing the observance of the whole treaty when our intervention is really necessary to enforce it.

Having done with the honorable Senator from Virginia, I will now pay my respects again to the member from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS.] He addressed a speech to his partisans in the galleries on all the topics used to excite and inflame the populace. When defeated on one point, he shifted to another. From glorifying Hise's treaty, (as he has done for two years,) he shrunk back, when its folly was exposed, to a mere assertion that he only preferred it because it gave us the exclusive right of way. What has become of his Monroe doctrine, which was the chief objection he made to the treaty? He has abandoned it—fled from it, and has not a word to say in its defense? What answer has he made to the glaring evidence of the gross unconstitutionality of the Hise treaty creating a corporation to dig a canal more than a thousand miles from the utmost limits of the United States? Not a word! He is equally silent now on every other topic connected with the treaty, upon which he harangued the populace for the last two years, except the single matter of the exclusive privilege. On that point he is yet sure he is right, and it is my duty to expose him.

I will begin by simply reading the names of the Senators who voted for the treaty of 1850, providing against any exclusive privilege in any one nation, and extending the privilege of passage to all nations. The vote stood:

"YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Butler, CASS, Chase, Clarke, CLAY, Cooper, Corwin, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawson, Dayton, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Downs, Felch, Foote, Green, HALE, HOUSTON, HUNTER, Jones, KING, Mangum, MASON, Miller, Morton, Norris, Pearce, Pratt, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Smith, Soulé, Spruance, Sturgeon, Underwood, Wales, and WEBSTER—42.

"NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Borland, Bright, Clemens, Davis of Mississippi, Dickinson, Turney, Walker, Whitcomb, and Yulee—10."

I have the official list which was sent to the President of the United States at the time of the vote upon the treaty, certified in proper form by the Secretary of the Senate, showing that there were forty-two yeas in favor of it, and only ten nays against it, and it does not appear upon the face of that paper that the Senator from Illinois did vote on either side.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may as well here make an explanation of the point that the Senator is raising, which he could have learned from the Secretary's table, if he had chosen, without any difficulty. The Senator knows as well as any living man that I was opposed to the treaty. The Senator recollects well an interview which took place between him and the Vice President of the United States and myself, at the Vice President's seeking, in which we discussed every provision in the treaty. That Senator well knows that I arraigned every article of the treaty in that interview long before the vote was taken. That Senator well knows that then I insisted upon the Hise treaty, and he well knows all my objections on the subject, and that we had an interview of three hours, the result of which, I apprehend, left a little irritation, in consequence of which I suffered in my position on the committees in the Senate. Hence my opposition to the treaty was not equivocal. By an accident in taking the names my vote was omitted. At the next Executive session after it was observed, I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that the record was wrong. The whole Senate recognized the fact and corrected it. The Senator ought to present the record as corrected, and not the record which was made under a mistake.

Mr. CLAYTON. I present the record as it was sent to the President of the United States, and that record never was corrected.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That may be, but it had been stated in debate that I had voted; and if he had looked at the records of the Senate he would have found upon the corrected record that the error had been corrected.

Mr. CLAYTON. I know nothing of the fact of the Senator having corrected the vote some time after it was taken. I know not when the Executive session was held. I am bound to take the Senator's own statement, but I beg to differ with him in regard to the recollection in which he is so confident in reference to the discussion before Colonel King. We will settle that, however, when we can see him.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Very well.

Mr. CLAYTON. My recollection is different from the Senator's, but at the same time I will state——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will not the Senator from Delaware concede to me that I did object to the treaty in toto?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will state what I understood to be the position of the Senator. I understood him distinctly to object to the treaty because it deprived us of the power of annexing Central America.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That was one of my objections.

Mr. CLAYTON. But I do not recollect anything at all of the gentleman's extending——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Did not Colonel King hold out a strong argument to show me that I was wrong in preferring an exclusive privilege, and was it not said that England and Europe would never consent that a great commercial Power should have the exclusive privilege; and did I not tell him that I never would ask their consent, because it was an American question?

Mr. CLAYTON. If the Senator will have patience, I will state what recollection I have of the interview; and I am very confident of the correctness of my recollections. I do recollect very well putting the question to the Senator: How shall we exclude the British from Central America? That was the question which I presented. How shall we get them out? Shall we propose the Monroe doctrine? Shall we endeavor to enforce it? Will Congress sustain any such attempt? I think the Senator will agree with me that he assured me that he did not doubt that Congress would not.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Not at all. I only answered for my vote.

The PRESIDENT. The honorable Senator from Illinois is out of order.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the honorable Senator asks me if I did not so state, certainly I should be permitted, in a matter involving my own reputation for truth, to respond to the question.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair objects to the Senator answering the questions of the Senator from Delaware in this manner: it is utterly opposed to the usages of the Senate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Very well.

Mr. CLAYTON. I certainly do not intend to impeach the honorable Senator's veracity, but I tell him that we have different recollections of the conversation. I did not understand him to conclude the conversation with the declaration on his part that he intended to oppose the treaty. I did suppose that the arguments addressed to him had some influence on his mind, and I so informed some of my friends at the time; and I was surprised that he did not vote on the treaty, or, as he says, that he did vote, and vote against it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I never said that I would not sustain him in the assertion of the Monroe doctrine—never uttered such a word—never entertained such a thought. I could not speak for Congress, but my own opinions and determinations were known and proclaimed to be in favor of preventing any more European colonization on this continent. I must be permitted to inform the Senator from Delaware that I am not mistaken about the conversation held with Colonel King and myself. He cannot have forgotten—he must remember, that I opposed the treaty then in all its parts and provisions, for the same reason that I have since given for my vote against it—that I opposed it because it surrendered the exclusive privilege which we might enjoy by the Hise treaty; because it abrogated the Monroe doctrine; because—because—because it proposed an alliance with England and the other European Powers in respect to the American continent; because it gave a pledge that in all time to come we would never annex any portion of Central America; because its objects and provisions were at war with all those principles which had governed all my actions in relation to the affairs of this continent. I am not mistaken upon this matter—I have too many reasons to remember it. It caused my withdrawal from the Committee on Foreign Relations under circumstances not agreeable to my feelings and pride. I was in favor of the Monroe declaration, but could not say what Congress would do.

Mr. CLAYTON. Very well, then. So far he agrees with me; and as Colonel King is not present I will take his own recollection. He, a Senator, a constitutional adviser of the President, told me, then Secretary of State, that if I endeavored to exclude England from Central America, by asserting the Monroe doctrine, he would not sustain me in that. I knew that too. Then why did the Senator hold me up to censure before the country, on the 14th of February last, for not asserting and carrying out the Monroe doctrine?

The Senator, in reply to the remarks I made in relation to the eminent men who voted for the treaty, and the other eminent men who voted for the Panama treaty, charged me with seeking to screen myself behind the names of those distinguished gentlemen. Forty-two Senators voted for the treaty he attacks. Twenty-nine more sustained the same principle by their votes on the Panama treaty—making seventy-one Senators. The Senator from Illinois did not utter a word against it when it passed. Three weeks afterwards he had his name recorded against it. He was a candidate for the Presidency we all know. By taking ground against the treaty, he placed himself in direct antagonism with all the other candidates for the Presidency of both parties. By making the treaty unpopular he killed off Cass, and Clay, and Webster, and Houston, and both the distinguished Senators from Virginia, and all the others who had ever been named for the Presidency. He fired into the whole flock of his rivals—shot dead, as he thought, all who could stand in his way. How persevering he has been in attacking the treaty since we all know. We know how many stump speeches he has made in opposition to it. It has been his theme by day and by night: his grand point which entitles him to preference over all others is just here. He is for annulling the treaty, and all the rest for it. He must kill the treaty, or it will kill him. He shows the country how weak Mr. Buchanan was, in endeavoring to make just such a treaty in regard to Panama. Taylor was alive and well when the Senator commenced his opposition. He now tells me I may not take shelter behind the great names of his rivals. Why not? Henry Clay was, in his day and generation, a man supposed by many to have some sagacity—almost equal to his. Daniel Webster, too, had some reputation. Buchanan and Cass have both been esteemed for their sagacity. Polk had some character too. These, and fifty more on the list opposed to his opinion, were accounted men whose decision was worthy of regard. The unanimous opinion of the Senate, on the 3d of March, 1835, against him, ought to be considered as worth something. The unanimous opinion of the House of Representatives, on the 2d of March, 1839, also fully sustaining the principle of the treaty, one would think was worth something. The opinion of President Jackson ought to be held worth something, to any man who seeks the good will of the Democracy. But the Senator doubts about the opinion of President Jackson. I will fix him on that point. He shall not escape. Edward Livingston, while Secretary of State, acting under the direction of President Jackson, on the 20th July, 1831, addressed a letter to Mr. Jeffers, in Central America, inquiring what was the character of the cession made on the application of the King of the Netherlands by the decree of Guatemala of December, 1830, relative to a canal through that country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. President Jackson apprehended it might be a grant of exclusive privileges, at least so far as related to toll and tonnage duties. Mr. Livingston, by his direction, wrote to Mr. Jeffers:

"Should you find, on inspecting the act, that particular privileges or facilities are given in the amount of toll, tonnage, or other duties or charges, to the vessels or merchandise of any foreign Power, greater than those which the vessels or merchandise of the United States would enjoy, by the terms of the act, in passing through the canal or in the ports at its termination, you will immediately signify to the Government that the United States consider themselves, by the terms of the treaty, as entitled to the same advantages."

The treaty here referred to was the treaty with Central America of the 5th of December, 1825, which secured to us the privileges "of the most favored nation"—the same commercial privileges which Central America and we ourselves ceded to every nation with which either of the two Republics ever made a commercial treaty. Had Central America or "Guatemala" granted to the King of the Netherlands an exclusive privilege, such as the Senator from Illinois demands for us, we see that Mr. Livingston and President Jackson would have viewed it as a breach of her commercial treaty with us and her commercial treaty with every other civilized State. It turned out that all their apprehensions were groundless. The patriotic and philanthropic King of the Netherlands had asked for no exclusive privilege. He differed from the wise Senator from Illinois. The grant to the Dutch capitalists was liberal, and offered the use of the canal to all nations on the same terms. I have a copy of it before me. The Senator evidently knew nothing about it when he referred to it. The monarch of the Netherlands was not a man of an illiberal, contracted, narrow, mean, and little mind. He, however, and President Jackson, and Livingston, and Polk, and Buchanan, and all the Senate of 1835, and all the House of Representatives of 1839, and twenty-nine Senators in 1847, and forty-two Senators in 1850, and President Taylor and all his advisers, were behind the times—did not understand the growth of this giant Republic like the Senator from Illinois—and I may not take shelter behind their authority! Johnson and Meredith, two of the Cabinet ministers of President Taylor, among the first jurists and constitutional lawyers in this country, are not of any estimation when brought in competition with him!

The Senator from Illinois complained that the treaty was a European partnership. This word "partnership" composed a large part of his address. He seemed to think that if he could only get the idea fixed in the American mind that we had gone into partnership with England, that would make the treaty odious. So he exerts himself to rouse the ancient prejudice against England. He says she does not love us, and we do not love her. Will he tell us what foreign nation he does love? An American statesman, when speaking or acting in a public capacity, has no right to love any country but his own. She furnishes an object large enough for all his affections. The great Father of his Country, in his Farewell Address, warns us of the folly and danger of either loving or hating any foreign nation. As to Englishmen, when we declared independence, we announced that we held them as we hold men of all other nations, "enemies in war—in peace friends." The policy pursue here by the Senator has shown him to be rather a lover than a hater of England and her people. There is just as much propriety in saying that all the men who travel on the highway are partners, as that the contracting parties to this convention are such. He would view every commercial treaty with England as a partnership, and therefore objectionable.

The Senator endeavored to present the questions between us as party issues. When the Senator did that, he knew well that he spoke in the presence of an overwhelming majority of his own party men, not only here on the floor of the Senate, but above, and all around us. I made no such issue. I desired to make none. I made some remarks, to which he chose to advert, that Mr. Polk and my distinguished predecessor in the office of Secretary of State had made no response whatever to the implorations of the government of Central America, asking us to intercede against the encroachments and aggressions of Great Britain. I had to state that, as a part of the facts to explain the history of the Monroe declaration; but I thought that I endeavored, in the course of the remarks which I made to the Senate, to show that Mr. Polk was right, according to the principle upon which I supposed he acted, which was, that as the Monroe declaration which he recommended to Congress had never been confirmed by either branch of Congress, he therefore refused to act upon it. I thought he was right in not regarding his own declaration as the principle upon which the Government should be administered, until it had received the sanction of the Congress of the United States. I thought I had exonerated him from the imputations which I have often heard made against him. If the gentleman wishes to press me into a discussion of a party character, I know no good reason why I should avoid it with him; but I desire not to mingle up at all in the debate, upon this question with regard to the true history of a treaty, anything of a party character.

Sir, I do not come here for the avowed purpose of opposing the President of the United States. I mean to make no factious opposition to his administration. I mean to support him so far as I can conscientiously, and oppose him only when I am bound in conscience to oppose, if unfortunately his administration should require opposition. I stand pledged to no party and no set of men to make opposition to him merely because he has been elected as a Democrat to the Presidency of the United States; and it will give me great pleasure, through the whole course of his administration, to sustain him here on the floor of the Senate, if I can.

All the objections of the Senator dwindle down at last, as I have said, to a single point—that the treaty ought to have been a treaty for the exclusive right of way across the isthmus; that the error of the treaty of 1850 is, that while it obtains protection from all nations, it makes a navigable highway for all nations on the same terms; and we see that if he had negotiated the treaty, he would have obtained an exclusive right; and he stood up here in defense of the treaty of Mr. Hise, which would have secured to this Government (if it had been ratified by Nicaragua and the United States) an exclusive right. What sort of an exclusive right is it that he demands? He thinks that the Government of the United States should have obtained the grant—the right to make a canal, and an exclusive right to navigate it; that forts should be built at both ends to protect it; and of course that we should protect it by every other means necessary. When the Government shall have made it, and when the Government shall have established the forts, the canal, he says, will be open to everybody on the same terms; and thus he seeks the exclusive grant of a right of way! What does he want with it? Why does he prefer it to the plan adopted, of opening the canal to all nations on the same terms? The Senator says he would hold it as a rod—yes, a rod, to compel other nations to keep the peace! He would have no more settling of islands on the coast of Central America! If any Government attempted it, he would shut his canal to them! He would also compel all foreign nations to treat us with all respect and regard, by means of the tremendous rod which he would hold in his hands. Let us look a little into the justice of this thing, as regards our own country.

It has been supposed that the construction of this great work will cost fifty or a hundred millions of dollars. I suppose we could not build a proper fortification at each end under less than a million of dollars for each fort. We would be compelled to maintain a garrison there; and, in the event of a war, to maintain a large navy, such a one as could resist the naval Powers of the earth. If we were to go to war with France, or England, or any other great naval Power, that, of course, would be one of the first points of attack. How convenient would it be for us to defend it at a distance of two thousand miles, and send troops to the different forts, and ships to protect our vessels that pass through the canal! We build it, and everybody is to have the benefit of the canal on the same terms, in time of peace! In war we alone are to defend it! The interest on a hundred millions would be six millions a year. The expenses of protecting and taking care of the canal and keeping it in good order, would probably, when added to the interest, make an annual outlay from the Treasury of the United States, in that distant country, of not less than ten millions of dollars. Now, why should we make such an expenditure? Because we want a rod—a rod! Sir, I think it would prove to be a rod to inflict injuries upon ourselves. We want nothing but the right of way there. We proposed that no nation should go through that canal, unless she agreed to protect it. In case they agreed to protect it, we should want no forts, no garrisons, and no naval force to guard what none could attack. But, on the other hand, if we were to adopt the plan of the Senator, we should have to keep a standing army in that country to protect it, in the event of a war between us and foreign nations. What would be thought of a man who should purchase a farm, and then, after he had gone to the expense of putting it in order, invite everybody to come and till it, but should direct them to take care that they should pay no part of the expense of keeping up the repairs, nor any part of the taxes upon the land? I do not know that this or any other illustration can make his proposition seem more preposterous than it does on its own mere statement.

But an important objection to the obtaining of such a grant as that, from a foreign Government to the United States, for the construction of a canal by the United States is, that it is unconstitutional, utterly and absolutely unconstitutional. I said, before the Senator addressed the Senate, that I did not know that there was a man on this floor who would contend that this Government had the power, under the Constitution of the United States, to construct a canal in Nicaragua, a railroad in China, or to build turnpikes in England, or any country out of the limits of the United States, or to charter a corporation to do such things. I said I supposed heretofore, that the Senator from Illinois belonged to the strict-construction school, which denied even the power to make internal improvements in our own limits. But he goes for such a treaty as Mr. Hise's, and says that he does not like special pleading. Does the Senator mean that a constitutional objection is mere special pleading? Sir, I never wish any better special plea against any treaty than the Constitution of my country. The gentleman cannot show, by any possible ingenuity, that Mr. Hise's plan of building a canal in Nicaragua is or can be made in any way constitutional. Who ever heard before that a power could be conferred by a treaty that was not conferred upon this Government under the Constitution itself? We are, says he, to build a canal to unite us with our possessions on the Pacific, and Mr. Hise's treaty provides that the Government of the United States may build it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is the Senator really serious in putting it, that I insisted that the Government should go to work and make the canal in Central America, or that I intimated any such thing, or that I said a word from which such a conclusion could be drawn?

Mr. CLAYTON. The Senator repeatedly avowed himself, in all his speeches, in favor of Mr. Hise's treaty. He dare not deny it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I said that an exclusive privilege was tendered, and a partnership privilege was tendered. We had a right to take the one or to take the other. The Secretary of State chose to take the partnership in preference to the exclusive privilege. In reply to the objection, that it was unconstitutional to make a canal by this Government in Central America, I told him, when he would demonstrate the power of the United States and England to make a canal jointly, I would demonstrate the power of our Government to do it separately; or when he would demonstrate the power of the United States and Great Britain to protect a British and American company jointly, I would demonstrate to him, by his own argument, our power to protect a separate American company. I never dreamed, nor is there anything in my speech to show that I believed that this Government ever was to go to work to make the canal there. What I did mean was, that an exclusive privilege was tendered to an American company, under the protection of the American Government; and the same right which would authorize us to protect, in connection with England, a British company, would authorize this Government to protect an American company. The question was not how the canal should be made, but whether its protection, and hence its control, was to be exclusively under this Government, or whether it was to be under the control and protection of England in conjunction with this country. I do not raise a question as to how the canal shall be made, whether by a company or not; but I say, if we are to enter into a guarantee, let it be a guarantee of Americans and not of British; let it be a guarantee on our own account, and not in partnership with England. That was my position.

Mr. CLAYTON. He has shifted again. But he cannot escape by it. I will meet all the issues he has made, and all the new ones he can invent. The speech he made on the 14th of February will convict him (if now read) of having preferred the very treaty made by Mr. Hise without any of his present qualifications. I have exposed it, and he has become ashamed of it. He now qualifies his position, so that he is only in favor of so much of Mr. Hise's treaty as secured to us the exclusive right. That he is for. Let us see now how soon he will change from that. If he is for the exclusive right ceded in the treaty of Mr. Hise, he is of course for the consideration on which that right was ceded. As an honest man, he would not take the grant and then refuse to pay for it. Then he is for an entangling alliance, against which he has said so much.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Not at all.

Mr. CLAYTON. Why, sir, the consideration for which the right was to be ceded, as I have shown from the treaty itself, was an engagement on our part to guarantee the title of Nicaragua, and to fight her battles, and "put down all the wars and bloodshed arising therefrom." Unless he entangled us in that way, he could not obtain from Nicaragua the exclusive right. He cannot take the grant without the consideration for it. As to the question, how the treaty for an exclusive privilege should have been drawn, or how the Hise treaty, securing such a privilege, could have been amended, he has evaded it. He cannot draw the amendments which would have made a measure so objectionable reconcilable with the Constitution and the treaty with Central America or Nicaragua, and he has not ventured to propose them. Yet he interrupted the Senator from South Carolina, and said he only supported the treaty so amended as to secure the exclusive privilege.

The Senator from Illinois said "that treaties could not fetter or confine the limbs of this giant Republic." I do not know precisely the extent to which he meant to be understood; but the language and the manner in which the Senator applied it, seemed to me to go to this extent: that we had a country exempt from the obligations of treaties, and that our limbs cannot be circumscribed by treaties. We were to disregard obligations of that description, being, like a "young giant," rising in power beyond anything that had been known in the history of the world before. The Senator made the same remark in reference to the treaty with Mexico. There is a clause in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo to which the Senator made great objection at the time of its ratification, in effect, that without the consent of the governments of both countries, the line established by that treaty as the boundary between them, should be the ultima thule—the utmost limit of our territory. Yes, sir, we plighted our faith and honor in that treaty, confirmed as it was by more than two thirds of the American Senate, that beyond that limit we would never go. Yet the Senator from Illinois says that the day is coming when we shall be compelled to violate the treaty—that treaties cannot fetter our limbs or restrict our limits. Sir, I regretted to hear it, because of the influence of that Senator in his party, as one of their standing candidates for the Presidency. I should have regretted to have heard it from any Senator. We form the body that is to ratify all the treaties of the United States. We are the constitutional advisers of the President. We are a part of the treaty-making power.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If it gives the Senator any regret that I stated that, I will explain to him what I did state, and thereby, I imagine, relieve him from all his regret. What I said was, that the steady, regular growth and expansion of this country would in all probability go ahead in the future as it has done in the past; that you might make as many treaties as you please, and still they would not check our growth, and because they could not, it was useless to make treaties which must of necessity be violated; hence I argued against the making of treaties pledging our faith not to do that which inevitably would be done in the future. It was an argument in favor of the fidelity and observance of treaty stipulations, and that we should not, therefore, be so profuse in our pledges in cases where we could not fulfill them.

Mr. CLAYTON. An argument in favor of fidelity and observance of treaty stipulations, indeed! The idea is, that we are incapable, from the nature of our institutions or our character as a people, of maintaining and observing treaties.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON, (laughing.) We must grow, says the Senator. Our "manifest destiny," he means, is to extend our limits.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The idea is, that some men are incapable of comprehending the growth of this nation. A few years ago, it was supposed that we could never extend beyond the Alleghanies. There were those who thought that——

Mr. CLAYTON. I have heard all that a dozen times.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then the Mississippi, then the Pacific was the boundary. I said that the same laws which have carried us forward must inevitably carry us further in the process of time, and that that growth will go on; and consequently it is unwise to make a treaty stipulation pledging ourselves not to do that which our interest may require us to do.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have given the Senator so many opportunities for explaining himself to me, as he terms it, that now I must be permitted to explain him to himself. It was but the other day he told me we must annul the Central American treaty; such was his declaration, too, on the 14th February last, in my absence. There is no escape for him from that position. There is no provision in this treaty for notice to annul it, as he knows, and yet he reiterated his demand for its immediate annulment. One of his wise reasons for annulling it was, that the British had not observed it. With the same wisdom, a man who held a bond, whilst his debtor refused to pay, would burn it or not enforce it. Driven from this position, he endeavors to shift it to what we have just heard—that it is unwise, because the treaty must be annulled. Has he made his position any better? What is it that he still adheres to? He insists upon it, that by some irresistible influence we are driven on in our course to such a degree of greatness that we shall be compelled to violate the treaties which we may make with foreign nations in regard to boundaries. We ought, he said, to nullify the treaty of 1850 at once. He now says that some men cannot comprehend the growth of this giant Republic. I do not know that there is any man of ordinary intelligence who does not comprehend it. There is no difficulty in understanding it. We have grown to such an extent already that we have a country greater than Rome possessed in her palmiest days. We cover a contiguous territory greater, perhaps, than ever was enjoyed by any civilized nation on earth. And yet we are told that we are not capable of binding ourselves even by treaty stipulations to observe our plighted faith, and fulfill our solemn engagement of honor. I remonstrate against the declaration of such a principle, or rather of such a want of all principle. It is nothing more nor less than this: let there be as many explanations on the part of the Senator from Illinois as he may choose to make—that we are incapable of controlling our impulses and passions when our interests may lead us to violate our engagements. "Treaties cannot fetter us," says he. Sir, the plighted faith of every man of honor binds him at all times, no matter what his interest may be, and the plighted faith of nations equally binds them; and the last place from which a contrary principle should be promulgated, is the Senate of the United States. Here, I repeat, we sit as the constitutional advisers of the President of the United States; and if foreign nations come to understand that the position is taken by members holding a prominent party position here, that treaties cannot be any restraint upon us, what foreign nation will ever make another treaty with us? If there be a country on earth that owes more than any other to treaties, it is ours. We owe our national existence to the old French treaties of 1778. Sir, within the limits of that great State which you in part represent on this floor, [Mr. COOPER in the chair,] Washington, in the darkest period of the Revolution, at Valley Forge, wintered with his suffering soldiers, when the intelligence reached them that France had entered into an alliance with us, and had guarantied our independence. The glorious news ran through all the ranks of the American army, and the great "Father of his Country" stood up and waved his hat, and shouted for joy, in concert with his troops! Our destiny from that moment became fixed. Every American saw that we were free, whatever doubt he might have entertained about it before. We owe, I repeat, our national independence to treaties. And now, when we are becoming strong, shall we forget it? Shall not an American statesman adhere to treaties with as much fidelity as an Englishman, or a Frenchman, or one of any other nation? Shall he not rejoice that his country does stand by her honor? I trust that no idea of our growing importance, or of the necessity of our enlargement, will ever sink into the heart of any other American Senator, to induce him to abandon that principle without which our country would become a byword and a hissing among the nations.

If we must gain more territory, let us gain it honorably. The Senator from Illinois boasts that he opposed the treaty with Mexico. I recollect it very well, and I recollect the reason he gave for voting against it. It was the very reason which he assigned in the debate here for desiring to annul the treaty of 1850. He opposed that clause in the Mexican treaty which fixed the limits beyond which we could not go, and he cannot explain away his position, or shift it any longer. He then said the time would come when Mexico would become indispensable to our progress and our happiness. I would recall to the recollection of gentlemen who were present on the 9th day of February, 1847, the speech made by Mr. Calhoun, of South Carolina, on this very subject. In thrilling tones he gave utterance to views which seemed to carry conviction to the hearts of nine tenths of those who heard him, and told us that Mexico WAS TO US FORBIDDEN FRUIT. Whenever the day shall come that, in defiance of treaty limits or otherwise, we set about the business of annexing nine or ten millions of Mexicans to the United States, the days of our Republic will be numbered. The Mexican people are educated in the belief that no greater curse can befall a nation than that of slavery, and are said to be bound by treaty to abolish it. Could we permit them to take a part in the election of our Representatives and Senators in Congress? Could we admit them to assist in governing us? Sir, without any reference to that dangerous question to which I have barely alluded, there are many other questions which they would have a powerful influence, and an interest in deciding against us. I am opposed utterly to annexing them; and I do not hesitate to express that opposition now and at all times. The true policy of this Government is, to build up Mexico as a republic, to sustain and cheer her by kind offices, and to teach her, by our example, the science of self-government. If we could annex other countries as England does, or as Rome did when she was triumphing over the world, the whole subject might receive another consideration. Whenever we annex, we make citizens of the people whom we unite to us. We do not enslave them. Other countries may make slaves of those whom they subdue, and never permit them to take any part in the government of their conquerors. If we annex Mexico, we are compelled, in obedience to the principles of our own Declaration of Independence, to receive her people as citizens. Yes! Aztecs, Creoles, Half-breeds, Quadroons, Samboes, and I know not what else—"ring-streaked and speckled"—all will come in, and, instead of our governing them, they, by their votes, will govern us. Why do we want them or their territory? Are we cramped? Are we crowded? Have we more population than is necessary to fill the land which we already own? There is not a more sparsely populated country on earth which is inhabited by civilized men. We have hundreds of millions of acres of land upon which the foot of a white man never trod. When, in the lapse of time, all this shall be covered, then, if we find men of our own race and class, capable of sustaining our institutions and of self-government, in any contiguous territory which can be acquired without the violation of any principle of justice or humanity, I am not one that would stay the honorable progress of my country.

The day, however, will never come when an American Senator will be justified in the declaration that we intend to disobey treaties. No, sir; we have been, and mean to remain, faithful to treaties. We have often been accused of having violated them; but the honor of our country is yet dear to us; and it is worth more to the true American than all the land that Mexico and Central America contain.

The Senator objects to the treaty of 1850, because, under its provisions, we cannot annex the Central American States. Were there no such treaty, he could not annex them till he had first overrun Mexico, and broken the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. Nay, he must first annex the West India Islands, and British Honduras, too. After "swallowing Mexico," he must take in all the other intermediate countries; and as Great Britain owns many of the islands and dependencies to be devoured, he must include the British lion—a matter not quite so easy of digestion. What an intimation is it for us to make to the world, that we may some day annex these weak little sister Republics, thousands of miles away from us, with a population so different from ours, especially in laws, institutions, and usages! I would much rather other nations should know the fact that San Salvador, one of these very Central American States, once applied for admission into our Union, and that our Government not only declined to receive them, but treated the application as one not worthy of a moment's serious regard.

I heard with pleasure and admiration that passage in the inaugural address of the President which declared that his administration should leave no blot upon his country's record, and that no act within his constitutional control would be tolerated which could not challenge a ready justification before the tribunal of the civilized world. How great the difference between that and the sentiments of the Senator from Illinois! Let the President adhere to these principles, and he will thereby disarm opposition: he will make of those who have heretofore been strong political opponents, some of the warmest friends he has in the world. I put this declaration in contrast with all these gigantic ideas [laughter] of breaking treaties, and going beyond the limits of the country in defiance of them. But if the President should, in opposition to all our hopes and belief, be induced to disregard the faith of treaties, he will hardly progress through half the period of his constitutional term before he will find the great heart of the American people, which is honest to the core, opposed to him, and the most sincere of his present friends will vindicate the justice of the sentence against him, while they sorrow for his fall.

Mr. MASON. I wish to make an explanation in answer to a remark of the Senator from Delaware. As a part of the evidence on which the Committee on Foreign Relations had based the opinion that the British settlements at Honduras Bay lay within the Republic of Guatemala, I adduced the official map of the State of Guatemala. The honorable Senator examined it, and I understood him to say that I had committed a "mistake" when I informed the Senate, and when the committee informed the Senate, that it was shown by that map that the British settlements at Balize were in Guatemala.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, the Senator is correct.

Mr. MASON. I understood the honorable Senator to say, that the map of the State of Guatemala which I exhibited, did not show that the settlements at Balize were within the limits of Guatemala. I understood him to say, in language far from being acceptable, that I had committed a "mistake" when I informed the Senate that the map did show it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I wish to say again what I said before. The Senator sent me the map. I thanked him for it. I said I thought that the dotted lines upon the map indicated the boundaries of the State of Guatemala, and that if that were the case, then the dotted lines round the place called Balize showed that the committee of the Senate had made a great mistake. Now, I do not know (as I then said) whether the Senator had observed those dotted lines, but I think they do clearly indicate that there is a separate Territory, to which perhaps the attention of the Senator had not been directed, intended to be indicated by those dotted lines—that is, the Balize. I know very well he may put a different construction upon the map, but that is the construction which I put on it; and I think if he will examine it himself carefully, he will see that there was some purpose, some motive in the map-maker for making those dotted lines around the country called Balize or British Honduras.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, it is no light matter to say that a Senator, when in the course of his official duty he endeavors to give information to the Senate, has committed a mistake; and I understood the Senator to say, and say distinctly, that in presenting this map, which I alleged did show that the settlements at Balize were in the Republic of Guatemala, I had committed a mistake. Now, sir, Senators have no right to commit mistakes. A Senator may commit a fault. It may be venial. There may be circumstances that will excuse it or justify it, or that will account for it or explain it; but a mistake in the course of official duty is no light matter, and I submit to the Senator, should not be lightly charged. I understand the honorable Senator to say now, that the dotted lines round that region of country indicated the British possessions. He supposed it had escaped my attention, and therefore I had committed a mistake. He stated to the Senate that the map showed that the possessions did lie in the Republic of Guatemala. Sir, I had examined the map with great care. It had been before me for two months. It is mentioned in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is relied upon for what it is worth by the report of the committee to show where the possessions are, and I can inform the Senator that those dotted lines did not escape my attention. If he will look at them with the deliberation and care that the committee did, he will find those dotted lines indicate exactly the treaty limits of the settlements as prescribed in 1786.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is what I supposed.

Mr. MASON. Very well; then if the map shows, as it does show, that that territory, no matter what the British title to it is, lies within the limits of Guatemala, the dotted lines must do no more than indicate what the territory is that lay there. Sir, they are as distinct upon this map as they could be exhibited on so small a surface. The limits of these settlements prescribed in the treaty of 1786 are these:

"The English line beginning from the sea shall take the center of the river Sibun or Jabon, and continue up the source of the said river. From thence it shall cross in a straight line the intermediate land until it intersects the river Wallys——

If the Senator will look at these dotted lines he will find that they commence at the source of the river Sibun, and cross to the river Balize or Wallys:

"And by the center of the same river the line shall descend to the point where it will meet the line already settled and marked out by the commissaries of the two Crowns in 1783, which limits, following the continuation of said line, shall be observed as formally stipulated by the definitive treaty."

The Senator will find that on this map of Guatemala, representing what Guatemala claims as its territory, the British possessions are within the territory of Guatemala, and that the dotted lines are only to indicate those provided by the treaty of 1786, as the lines of the British settlements. I understood the Senator to say yesterday that the map did not show what the committee, and what I claimed it did show, because of the dotted lines. Now, if the Senator understands me, I mean to say this: The map shows that the settlements are in the limits of the State of Guatemala; and the dotted lines indicate nothing more than the positions of the settlements in the State of Guatemala.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have no doubt the Senator understands the matter as he explains it, but I am perfectly willing to submit the question to any set of intelligent men, whom he will select to look at the map, and I am willing to abide by their decision upon the very question which he has chosen to submit. I have taken my view of the matter, and he has taken his. Let others examine it, and they will see whether the Balize settlements are included in the State of Guatamala.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have something to say in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Delaware. It is not my purpose to introduce any new points in the discussion.

Mr. SHIELDS. If my colleague will give way, I will move an adjournment. He can go on to-morrow.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am willing to give way for that, and go on in the morning with what I have to say.

On motion the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 16, 1853.

Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. ADAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which lies upon your table, providing that the Senate will at this session proceed to the election of the Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolution was taken up for consideration.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire to say that in offering that resolution I do not wish to be understood as giving any expression of opinion unfavorable to the incumbents of those offices. I believe the Senate has the right to elect its own officers at the commencement of each Congressional term, and I offer this resolution to assert that privilege, and not to intimate an opposition to our officers. In the resolution I omitted to insert the Doorkeeper, and therefore I move to amend the resolution by including that officer.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BADGER. I move to strike out the words "this session," and to make it more definite, by inserting "to-morrow at one o'clock."

Mr. ADAMS. I assent to that.

Mr. MASON. I have no objection to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina; but I have an objection to going into an election of these officers at this time. The attendance in the Senate is small; many Senators have gone home, not expecting such action at this session.

Mr. ADAMS. If the Senator from Virginia will move to amend the resolution by striking out "to-morrow at one o'clock" and inserting "next session," we can have a test vote on that.

Mr. MASON. I shall make no motion. I am only giving my personal impression.

Mr. BADGER. I did not mean, by my suggestion, to intimate that I thought the resolution desirable. I have no objection to it; but I think if this business has to be done, it may as well be done now as at the next session. This is the commencement of the Congress; and if the resolution is to be adopted, I think it better to mention in the resolution the precise time of election, that Senators may have notice to attend.

Mr. ADAMS. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina, and hope the resolution will be so modified. All I want is a test vote upon the question.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted on the 7th instant by the Senator from Delaware, in relation to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I had a right to expect that the Senator from Delaware, in his reply, would have ventured upon an argument against the positions which I had assumed in my former speech, and which he had assailed. It will be observed, upon a close examination, that he has evaded nearly every point in controversy between us, under the cover of free indulgence in coarse personalities. I do not complain of this. He had a right to choose his own course of discussion. Perhaps it was prudent in him to pursue the course which he adopted. I shall not follow his example, however. I may not have the same inducements that may have prompted him. If I had been driven from nearly every position I had assumed in debate—if nearly every material fact I had asserted had been negatived and disproved by official documents bearing my own signatures—if I had been convicted of giving one explanation of my conduct at one time, and at other times different and contradictory reasons, I might be prompted to seek refuge under personalities from the exposure that might be made. Sir, I pass that all by.

The Senator, as a last resort, attempted to get up unkind feelings between my political friends and myself in regard to this debate. He endeavored to show that my speech was an assault upon every Senator who took a different course. He went further, and charged that I, as a presidential candidate, was pursuing this course in order to destroy and break down rivals in my own party. Sir, these insidious and disreputable assaults do not disturb my equanimity. The object is to enlist, from prejudice and unworthy motives, a sympathy in the course of discussion which he has attempted to maintain. But I appeal to the Senate if I assailed any Senator upon this floor, either in regard to the Hise treaty or the Clayton and Bulwer treaty. I appeal to the Senate if I mentioned the name of any Senator, or stated how any one man had voted. I did not disclose even how the vote stood. No citizen in America would have known the vote of any Senator on this floor from my speech, or from my participation in the recent discussion; and I have yet to learn that a vindication of my own course involves an assault upon those who chose to differ with me. I have not understood the speeches of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] and of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] and of other Senators, who have spoken on this question in opposition to some of my views, as an attack on myself. It was their duty to vindicate their own course, and give the reasons which prompted them; and it was my right and my duty to give the reasons which induced and compelled me to pursue the course that I did.

I do not choose to occupy the time of the Senate in a matter that partakes so much of a personal character. But the Senator cannot avail himself of that argument in vindication of his course in suppressing the Hise treaty. He is not supported by that array of names which he has produced for that act. No one of the Senators ever did sustain him, so far as I know, in suppressing the Hise treaty. That treaty was never submitted to the Senate for ratification. The Senate were never permitted to examine it. The treaty, to this day, has been withheld from the Senate. You will have to go elsewhere than to the files of this body to find that treaty. How can it be said that Senators have sustained him in his rejection of the Hise treaty, when he had deprived the Senate of an opportunity of showing whether they were for or against it? Sir, he cannot have the benefit of those names which he has quoted to shelter him upon that point.

Again, sir, he has quoted all the eminent names from General Jackson down to the present time, to support him in his refusal to accept of the exclusive control of the canal for his own country. Sir, he has no authority thus to quote them; he has no authority for saying that any one of those eminent statesmen were opposed to such a privilege as the Hise treaty showed that we could have acquired. It is true that when Central America granted a privilege to a company in the Netherlands to make this canal, the administration of General Jackson, under that state of facts, were content with asserting our right to an equal participation. It is also true that when a Frenchman had procured a charter for a railroad across the Isthmus of Panama, and thus it had gone into the hands of foreigners, the administration of President Polk were content to assert our claim to an equal right. But it is not true that either of them ever refused to accept an exclusive privilege for this country when voluntarily tendered to them.

I am not going to occupy the attention of the Senate with an array of names for or against this proposition. I quoted no names in my first argument. I addressed myself to the merits of the question, and chose to decide it by arguments upon its merits, and not by the authority of great names. I would rather see the Senator sustain his position now by arguments upon the merits of his own official action, and not by an appeal to the action of great men who lived at a different period, and whose acts were dependent upon entirely different circumstances.

One word more, and I proceed to the main point at issue. The Senator has accused me of having attempted to make this a party question. How did I attempt it? In my speech of February last, to which he replied, he cannot find the term Whig or Democrat, or a political allusion, or a partisan argument. I explained my own principle of action as evinced in my votes; and I expressly stated that they were not sanctioned by either Whig or Democratic Administrations upon some of the points. I did not invoke the aid or the sympathy of party. I was willing to stand upon the truth and the soundness of my own record, and leave the future to determine whether I was right or wrong on the question. Sir, partisan politics have been introduced by the Senator, and not by me. The Senator, in his speech in reply to me, endeavored to show that Democratic Administrations have done this, and Democratic Administrations have done that, and appealed to partisan authority, to sustain himself. I admit his right to introduce party questions, and to appeal to party names as authority. I had not done it, and I deny his right to charge it upon me. Sir, I invoked the aid of no partisan feeling or party organization for the support of the position I maintained. But when the Senator showed that a majority of my own party, on the ratification of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, had recorded their names in opposition to mine, he ought to have been content, without charging that I was making it a party question. It was not a very agreeable thing to me to be compelled to differ with three fourths of the Senate, including a majority of my own political friends, and nothing but a sense of duty to my own character would have compelled me to take the responsibility of such a course.

Now, let us go back to the real point. Why all these attempts to avoid the main issue? In the first place the Senator denied that he was responsible for not sending the Hise treaty to the Senate, inasmuch as it had been rejected by Central America. Then, when I showed that the rejection of that treaty was procured by his own agent in obedience to his instructions, he denied the existence of the instructions. When I produced the instructions, and showed that the agent acted in obedience to what he believed to be their true meaning, the Senator acknowledged his opposition to the treaty, and justified it upon the ground that it guarantied the independence of Nicaragua. When I showed that he could not have objected to it on that ground, for the reason that at that very time he proposed a guarantee, in connection with Great Britain, of the independence of Nicaragua, he abandons that position, and is driven to the extremity of seeking refuge under what he chooses to consider obnoxious details. When I showed that his objections to the details could not avail him, because it was no reason for withholding the treaty according to the usages of the Senate, he then comes to the point that it was better to have a partnership privilege than an exclusive one. That brings us to the real question. Why could we not have come to it at once? If he was right in his preference for a European partnership over an exclusive privilege to his own country, why did he not avow the fact at once and justify his conduct, instead of wasting the time of the Senate in requiring me to prove facts which ought to have been confessed, and which have been proven by his own written testimony, in opposition to his own denial?

In his last speech the Senator chose to persevere in representing me as the advocate of a canal to be made through Central America, with funds from the Treasury of the United States. I need not remind the Senator that he had no authority, from anything I have said, to attribute to me such a purpose. I certainly did not assume any such position, while my remarks were calculated to negative such an idea. My position was this: that while negotiating for the right of way for a canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific, we should have accepted the offer to our own Government of the exclusive right to control it, instead of a partnership with England and the other Powers of the earth. The Hise treaty granted the privilege either to the United States or to an American company under our protection, at our option. I insisted that we had the same right to take it to ourselves that we had to take it jointly with other Powers. It required no further exertion of the constitutional power to execute and maintain and regulate an exclusive privilege to America than it did to execute and maintain a partnership privilege with European Powers. Hence his objections upon that score must fall to the ground. The simple question was, whether it would have been wise to accept that privilege. Sir, I think it would have been. I am not going to repeat the argument I made the other day upon that point. If it had been given to us, we could have opened the canal to the world upon such terms as we deemed proper. We could have withdrawn the use of it whenever a nation failed to respect our rights. It would have been a bond of peace instead of being an apple of discord between us and other nations; because when you bring all the great Powers of the earth into partnership, constant disputes arise as to the nature and extent of the rights of the respective parties. The history of these negotiations proves this fact.

But, sir, let me ask the Senator what he has gained by his rejection of the Hise treaty? He has given the world to understand by his speeches that he has accomplished two great objects: the one to open a canal between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans; the other to put a stop to British encroachments in Central America. Has he accomplished either of those objects? I ask what privilege he has gained to make a canal? He has not even secured the right of way for a canal, either jointly or separately. He is responsible for having defeated the project of a canal between the two oceans. He refused the grant of the right of way, because it gave the right to control the work exclusively to his own country. The treaty which he caused to be made failed to receive the sanction of the Senate. Thus we are left without any right of way—without any charter, right, or privilege. Instead of accomplishing that object, he is responsible for its defeat. All that he has to boast of is, that he deprived his own country of an inestimable privilege, the necessity and importance of which is now conceded on all hands.

What, then, have we gained by his diplomacy? Why, sir, after having failed in getting the privilege of making the canal, either jointly or separately, he makes a treaty with Great Britain by which, if we hereafter secure it, the privilege is given to Great Britain as well as to ourselves. The Clayton and Bulwer treaty provides that any right of way or communication which may be secured at any future time, shall be open alike to England and the United States, and under the joint control and protection of the two Powers. We have a treaty with England about a canal in Central America, but we have none with any of the Central American States. Let me ask, then, how much have we gained? Has he expelled the British from Central America by his treaty? What inch of country have they given up? What right have they abandoned? What functionary have they withdrawn? Where is the evidence that you have driven the British from Central America? Are they not still in the full enjoyment of their protectorate upon the Mosquito coast? Have you driven them from the Balize?

The Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. MASON,] in their speeches, have maintained that the Clayton and Bulwer treaty would fairly include the Balize as a part of Central America. But the Senator from Delaware, while acting as the Secretary of State, gave a construction to that treaty which excludes the Balize. The Senator, therefore, is estopped from saying that he has expelled the British from the Balize. The fact shows that he has not driven the British protectorate from the coast. We find that instead of leaving Central America, the British have not only established a colony at the Bay Islands, but, if the newspaper information received by the last steamers can be credited, they have bombarded the towns upon the main land, and taken forcible possession of a part of the State of Honduras. Then I repeat the question to the Senator, what has he gained? I can tell him what has resulted from his negotiation. He has recognized the right of Great Britain and all European Powers to interfere with the affairs of the American States. He has recognized that right by a treaty; and he has guarantied to England that we will use our good offices to enable them to enter into arrangements with these Central American States. He has excluded the idea that the question of the Central American States is an American question, and by his negotiation has opened it as a European question. In other words, he has, by his treaty, abolished what is known as the Monroe doctrine with reference to a large portion of the American continent.

This brings me to the examination of another question. The Senator from Delaware chose to arraign me upon that portion of my speech, in which I stated that I was unwilling to give a pledge never to annex any more territory to the United States. He then went on to argue against annexation, said we were pledged, and that the pledge given was correct, and attempted to vindicate it. He arraigned me for having said that such a treaty could not be enforced through all time to come. I explained to him that my idea was that the growth of this country was so great and so rapid that the barriers of any treaty would be irresistibly broken through by natural causes, over which we had no control; and hence that the treaty ought not to have been made. He told me that the explanation made it worse, and that he would show that the doctrine involved moral turpitude; that he was amazed and grieved that any one here from this high place should proclaim such a sentiment.

Sir, I will proceed to show my authority on that point, which I think he will be compelled to respect. In taking that position, I only reiterated the doctrine proclaimed by the late Secretary of State, and now Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT,] in his letter to the Comte De Sartiges, a few months ago, in respect to the Island of Cuba; and when the Senator from Delaware arraigns me for uttering sentiments involving a want of respect for treaty stipulations, or moral turpitude, I will turn him over to the Senator from Massachusetts and to ex-President Fillmore, and allow them to settle that issue between themselves. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the letter of Mr. EVERETT to the Comte De Sartiges. In that letter you find the following passage in regard to a proposed convention stipulating that we would never annex Cuba:

"The convention would be of no value unless it were lasting; accordingly its terms express a perpetuity of purpose and obligation. NOW, IT MAY WELL BE DOUBTED WHETHER THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES WOULD ALLOW THE TREATY-MAKING POWER TO IMPOSE A PERMANENT DISABILITY ON THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT FOR ALL COMING TIME, AND PREVENT IT, UNDER ANY FUTURE CHANGE OF CIRCUMSTANCES, FROM DOING WHAT HAS BEEN SO OFTEN DONE IN TIMES PAST. In 1803 the United States purchased Louisiana of France, and in 1819 they purchased Florida of Spain. IT IS NOT WITHIN THE COMPETENCE OF THE TREATY-MAKING POWER IN 1852 EFFECTUALLY TO BIND THE GOVERNMENT IN ALL ITS BRANCHES; AND FOR ALL COMING TIME NOT TO MAKE A SIMILAR PURCHASE OF CUBA."

The Senator from Delaware will see that the late Secretary of State, Mr. Everett, by the direction of President Fillmore, has pronounced such a guarantee to be a violation of the Constitution of the United States, and the exercise of an authority not conferred by that instrument. Sir, if the Constitution gave no authority to make a pledge by this Government that we will never annex Cuba, I suppose it does not authorize a pledge never to annex Central America. The constitutional objection applies to the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, in relation to Central America, with the same force that it did to the proposed convention in respect to Cuba. They take higher ground than I did. I was not willing to do that which would involve a breach of faith in the progress of events. But I did not go so far as to deny the constitutional power to make such a treaty. And, therefore, I ask the Senator why he did not arraign President Fillmore—why did he not arraign the late Secretary of State, Mr. Everett, for uttering those monstrous sentiments, instead of hurling his anathemas upon my head, as if I had been the only man in America who ever ventured to proclaim such opinions? According to the opinions of President Fillmore, and his Secretary of State, as promulged in Mr. Everett's celebrated letter, and applauded by the almost unanimous voice of the American people, the Clayton and Bulwer treaty was a palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States. But Mr. Fillmore and Mr. Everett were not content with denying the power of this Government, under the Constitution, to enter into this treaty stipulation. They deny its propriety, its justice, its wisdom, as well as the right to make it. I will read a passage upon this point:

"There is another strong objection to the proposed agreement. AMONG THE OLDEST TRADITIONS OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IS AN AVERSION TO POLITICAL ALLIANCES WITH EUROPEAN POWERS. In his memorable Farewell Address, President Washington says: 'The great rule of 'conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending 'our commercial relations to have with them as little politi-'cal connection as possible. So far as we have already 'formed engagements let them be fulfilled with perfect good 'faith. Here let us stop.' President Jefferson, in his inaugural address, in 1801, warned the country against entangling alliances. This expression, now become proverbial, was unquestionably used by Mr. Jefferson in reference to the alliance with France of 1778, an alliance at the time of incalculable benefit to the United States, but which in less than twenty years came near involving us in the wars of the French Revolution, and laid the foundation of heavy claims upon Congress not extinguished to the present day. It is a significant coincidence that the particular provision of the alliance which occasioned these evils was that under which France called upon us to aid her in defending her West Indian possessions against England. Nothing less than the unbounded influence of Washington rescued the Union from the perils of that crisis and preserved our neutrality."

As the Senator from Delaware is fond of the authority of great names, I not only furnish him with the name of the late Secretary of State, and that of the late President of the United States, upon the points to which I have referred, but I have the authority of these gentlemen for saying that his doctrine with regard to Central America is in violation of the solemn warnings of the Father of his Country, and in derogation of the protests of Mr. Jefferson, repeated over and over again during his eventful life. I find that the late Secretary of State has again, in another passage, summed up the objections which I entertained to the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, and I will call the attention of the Senate to it. It is this:

"But the President has a graver objection to entering into the proposed convention. HE HAS NO WISH TO DISGUISE THE FEELING, THAT THE COMPACT, ALTHOUGH EQUAL IN ITS TERMS, WOULD BE VERY UNEQUAL IN SUBSTANCE. France and England, by entering into it, would disable themselves from obtaining possession of an island remote from their seats of government, belonging to another European Power, whose natural right to possess it must always be as good as their own—a distant island, in another hemisphere, and one which by no ordinary or peaceful course of things could ever belong to either of them. If the present balance of power in Europe should be broken up; if Spain should become unable to maintain the island in her possession, and France and England should be engaged in a death-struggle with each other, Cuba might then be the prize of the victor. Till these events all take place, the President does not see how Cuba can belong to any European Power but Spain. THE UNITED STATES, ON THE OTHER HAND, WOULD, BY THE PROPOSED CONVENTION, DISABLE THEMSELVES FROM MAKING AN ACQUISITION WHICH MIGHT TAKE PLACE WITHOUT ANY DISTURBANCE OF EXISTING FOREIGN RELATIONS, AND IN THE NATURAL ORDER OF THINGS."

If the proposed guarantee never to annex Cuba was not reciprocal as between the United States and England, how is it that it can be said that a similar guarantee respecting Central America was reciprocal? Every argument urged by the late Secretary of State against reciprocity in one, applies with equal force to the other. It may be said that Cuba stands at the entrance of the Gulf of Mexico; but it can be said with equal truth that Central America is upon the public highway to our Pacific possessions. Both stand as gates to this public highway, and every argument urged in relation to the one is equally applicable to the other.

Now I have to quote the late Secretary of State and President Fillmore against the Senator from Delaware on another point. When I remarked that the history of this country showed that our growth and expansion could not be resisted, and would inevitably break through whatever barriers might be erected by the present generation to restrain our future progress, the Senator from Delaware assumed the right to rebuke me for uttering sentiments implying perfidy and moral turpitude. He desired to know if sentiments of that kind were to be tolerated in the American Senate? Let him hear his friend from Massachusetts on that point, in the same document:

"That a convention such as is proposed would be a TRANSITORY ARRANGEMENT, SURE TO BE SWEPT AWAY BY THE IRRESISTIBLE TIDE OF AFFAIRS IN A NEW COUNTRY, IS, TO THE APPREHENSION OF THE PRESIDENT, TOO OBVIOUS TO REQUIRE A LABORED ARGUMENT. The project rests on principles APPLICABLE, if at all, TO EUROPE, where international relations are in their basis of great antiquity, slowly modified for the most part in the progress of time and events; and NOT APPLICABLE TO AMERICA, which, but lately a waste, is filling up with intense rapidity, and adjusting, on natural principles, those territorial relations which on the first discovery of the continent were in a good degree fortuitous." * * * * *

"But whatever may be thought of these last suggestions, it would seem impossible for any one who reflects upon the events glanced at in this note to mistake the LAW OF AMERICAN GROWTH AND PROGRESS, OR THINK IT CAN BE ULTIMATELY ARRESTED BY A CONVENTION LIKE THAT PROPOSED. In the judgment of the President, IT WOULD BE AS EASY TO THROW A DAM FROM CAPE FLORIDA TO CUBA, IN THE HOPE OF STOPPING THE FLOW OF THE GULF STREAM, AS TO ATTEMPT, BY A COMPACT LIKE THIS, TO FIX THE FORTUNES OF CUBA, NOW AND FOR HEREAFTER, OR, as expressed in the French text of the convention, 'pour le present comme pour l'avenir,' THAT IS, FOR ALL COMING TIME."

There the Senator is told that such a stipulation might be applicable to European politics, but would be unsuited and unfitted to American affairs; that he has mistaken entirely the system of policy which should be applied to our own country; that he has predicated his action upon those old, antiquated notions which belong to the stationary and retrograde movements of the Old World, and find no sympathy in the youthful, uprising aspirations of the American heart. I indorse fully the sentiment. I insist that there is a difference, a wide difference, between the system of policy which should be pursued in America and that which would be applicable to Europe. Europe is antiquated, decrepit, tottering on the verge of dissolution. When you visit her, the objects which enlist your highest admiration are the relics of past greatness; the broken columns erected to departed power. It is one vast grave-yard, where you find here a tomb indicating the burial of the arts; there a monument marking the spot where liberty expired; another to the memory of a great man, whose place has never been filled. The choicest products of her classic soil consist in relics, which remain as sad memorials of departed glory and fallen greatness! They bring up the memories of the dead, but inspire no hope for the living! Here everything is fresh, blooming, expanding, and advancing. We wish a wise, practical policy adapted to our condition and position. Sir, the statesman who would shape the policy of America by European models, has failed to perceive the antagonism which exists in the relative position, history, institutions—in everything pertaining to the Old and the New World.

The Senator from Delaware seems always to have had his back turned upon his own country, and his eye intently fixed upon Europe as the polar star of all his observations. If it would not qe deemed an indelicate interposition between the Senator from Delaware and his friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT,] I should be inclined to say that the criticism of the late Secretary of State, although not intended for the Senator from Delaware, is strictly applicable to his diplomacy, and fully deserved. I shall not go into the discussion of that question, however. I deny the right of the Senator from Delaware to come back at me on that point. I shall certainly turn him over to his friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT,] because he will not dare to accuse him of political prejudices and partisan feelings. He has said severer things of the Senator's diplomacy than I thought the rules of the Senate would authorize me to indulge in. The ex-President of the United States has sanctioned them, and now I think I am at liberty to refer to them, for if it were not within the rules of courtesy and diplomacy, they would not be sent here. But, sir, I may be permitted to add that the nation has sanctioned them too; for I am not aware that a State paper was ever issued in America that received a heartier response in most of its principles, than the letter of the late Secretary of State to the Comte de Sartiges, to which I have referred. Sir, if he had done nothing else to render his administration of the State Department illustrious, his name would live in all coming time in that diplomatic letter, as one who could appreciate the spirit of the age, and perceive the destiny of the nation. No document has ever received such a universal sanction of the American people as the one to which I have referred, condemning and repudiating the diplomacy of the Senator from Delaware in relation to the American continent.

Mr. President, I have not much more to add. The Senator has arraigned me also for having attempted to arouse unkind feelings between the United States and England. I deny that the arraignment is just. I have attempted no such thing. I have never attempted to foster jealousies or unkind feelings between our own country and any other. I have attempted to plant our relations on amicable terms, by speaking the truth plainly as we and they know it to exist. The remarks that I have made about friendly relations between the two countries, were drawn out by his statement that England was known to be so "friendly" to us. I said to him I did not think the friendly relations of England constituted any claim upon our gratitude. I have seen no evidence of that friendship. I said frankly I did not think that England loved us, and it was useless for us to pretend that we loved her. The history of the two countries proves it. The daily action of the two countries proves it. England is spending her millions to maintain her fortifications all along our coast—at the Bermudas, the Bahamas, and at Jamaica, and on every rock and barren waste along the American coast. What does she keep them up for? Does she make money out of them? Why, you all know that they are a source of unbounded expenditure to her. Does it extend her commerce? Does it employ her shipping? Not at all. Why does she keep them? In order to point her guns at America.

Well, if she is so friendly to us, and we are so friendly to her, what necessity is there for pointing her cannon all the time at us? And if these are evidences of friendship, why do we not reciprocate it by sending over a few cannon and planting them on every little island and rock near her coast? If we were to seize upon rock and expend millions in keeping up fortifications all along her coast, would that be any evidence of friendly feeling on our part towards England? I do not so see it.

Again: the moment it was discovered that we were to acquire California as a consequence of the Mexican war, England sent her armed ships and seized possession of the town of San Juan; and I have the authority of the Senator from Delaware for saying there is reason to believe that the act was done out of hostility to the American Government. Why did she want the town of San Juan? Simply for the reason that by the Mexican treaty our possessions had been enlarged upon the Pacific coast, and it evidently became necessary, in order to preserve this Union and maintain our commerce, that we should have the line of intercommunication between the two oceans so as to connect the Atlantic and Pacific States together; and therefore, in order to cut off our right of way, in order to establish a toll-gate upon our public highway, she seized possession of that point as the one from which she could annoy us most.

The Senator will not pretend that he believes that act originated in friendly feelings towards us on the part of England. I have his authority in his public documents for saying that he believes it originated in motives of jealousy and hostility. The object was, not to advance her own interest, not to increase her own commerce, not to extend her own power, but to restrain, fetter, and cripple our energies and our power. Are these acts evidence of friendship on her part towards us, and are we so constituted that we feel grateful for them? Sir, let us not play the hypocrite upon this subject. Let us speak out the naked truth, plainly, and boldly. We feel that this seizure of every rock and island upon our coast, and converting them into garrisoned fortresses, with guns to bear on American commerce and American interests, are no evidence of friendship. We feel that these attempts to surround and fetter us, and hem us in, are evidences of hostility, which it is our duty plainly to see and boldly to resist. Sir, the way to establish friendly relations with England is, to let her know that we are not so stupid as not to understand her policy, nor so pusillanimous as to submit to her aggressions. The moment she understands that we mean what we say, and will carry out any principle we profess, she will be very careful not to create any point of difference between us. It is a want of candor and frankness that keeps the two nations in conflict with each other. I say, that as long as this policy of hemming us in, and fettering us, and trying to restrain our growth and curtail our power continues, we cannot feel friendly and kindly towards her; and so long as she persists in that policy, we ought not to believe that she feels kindly towards us. If we tell her so, she will do one of two things; either abandon her aggressive course, or avow her hostility: and of all things let us know whether she is our friend or our enemy. Therefore, I will repeat very frankly, that it is useless to endeavor to conceal the fact that there are jealousies between us and England growing out of rival interests, and that her policy has for its aim to restrain our power rather than increasing her own. Our policy is, to enhance our own power and greatness, without attempting to restrain hers. Ours is generous, honorable, and justifiable; hers is illiberal, unkind, unjust, and we ought to tell her so.

I believe, Mr. President, I have said all I have to say upon this question. My object has been simply to reply to the points raised by the Senator in his speech. I do not wish to travel over the ground again. There are many other points in the discussion into which I could have gone. There are many other positions that the documents which have been lately published would furnish me ample material for prolonging the discussion, but I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate. I only wish to show that the real points at issue are: first, that the Senator preferred a partnership with England to an exclusive privilege to his own country for the great interoceanic canal. Secondly, that he believes in the policy of pledging this country never to annex any more territory in all time to come. I repudiate that policy. These are the main points between us, and the last point, in the course of the discussion, seems to have become the material one. He is opposed to all further annexation, and wishes to make treaties now to restrain us in all time to come from extending our possessions.

I do not wish to annex any more territory now. But I avow freely that I foresee the day when you will be compelled to do it, and cannot help it, and when treaties cannot prevent the consummation of the act. Hence my policy would be to hold the control of our own action, give no pledges upon the subject, but bide our time, and be at liberty to do whatever our interest, our honor, and duty require when the time for action may come. An old, decrepit nation, tottering and ready to fall to pieces, may well seek for pledges and guarantees from a youthful, vigorous, growing Power, to protect her in her old age. But a young nation, with all of her freshness, vigor, and youth, desires no limits fixed to her greatness, no boundaries to her future growth. She desires to be left free to exercise her own powers, exert her own energies, according to her own sense of duty, in all coming time. This, sir, is the main issue between us, and I am ready to submit it to the Senate and to the country.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, if this were a mere gladiatorial contest between the honorable Senators from Illinois and Delaware, I might forbear entering into the discussion; but topics have been discussed, doctrines avowed, and sentiments expressed, from which I wholly dissent. I do not propose now to go into the questions which have been raised in the discussion of this subject itself. I thought it unfortunate when the subject was first introduced by the Senator from Michigan. It has given rise, in my deliberate judgment, to an unpropitious discussion of matters connected with our foreign relations. Sir, when delicate questions of diplomacy and of our relations with other Governments shall become the subject of open discussion in this Senate—nay, more, sir, the subject of political agitation and of party issues—we cannot hope to be favorably regarded by that kind of judgment which history dictates, and which is far superior, in my opinion, to the ephemeral opinions of the day. I heard the Senator from Illinois with great interest, and perhaps the ability with which he has spoken has, in some measure, reconciled us to the discussion itself, whilst it has not vindicated its original introduction; but I heard him avow an opinion from which I wholly dissent; and it was, as I understood him—and I wish the Senator to understand me, for I intend to make my proposition intelligible, and to exempt it from the questions mainly at issue between himself and the Senator from Delaware—I understood him to maintain this proposition: That the Hise treaty, repugnant essentially in nearly all of its provisions to the Constitution of the United States, and at variance with the general usage of the Government, should have been sent by the President to the Senate for its consideration, and there to be moulded and amended in a form so as to serve one single view entertained by the gentleman from Illinois. The treaty was not only entered into by one without authority, but its entire predicate is in ignorance and disregard of the constitutional powers of this Government.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will restate my position. I stated expressly the other day, and intended to express the same idea now, that when the Hise treaty came to the State Department, it having been executed without authority, the Department was entirely at liberty either to withhold it or reject it unconditionally, or send it to the Senate, as it saw proper. The rule, as I understand it, is, that when a treaty is made in pursuance of instruction, the Department is under obligation implied to the foreign Power, to send it here. When one is made without instruction, it may or may not send it as it sees proper; and I said, if the Senator from Delaware had been in favor of the exclusive privilege, and only objected to the details of the Hise treaty, it was his duty to send the treaty here that the objects desired might be secured.

Mr. BUTLER. In that I differ entirely from the Senator from Illinois, as a cardinal principle affecting the functionary agency of this Government. The President of the United States is exclusively vested with the power of making treaties and having them perfected by the concurrence of two thirds of the Senate; and, sir, it is the duty of the President to send a treaty down, an entire treaty, without expecting the Senate to perfect it for him.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator allow me to make my meaning intelligible to him?

Mr. BUTLER. Not now; because I am going on to say further, that the President of the United States, in my deliberate judgment, ought not to have sent the Hise treaty to the Senate, for it contained provisions that could receive the sanction of not only no Senator upon this floor, but of no jurist that can read and understand the Constitution of the United States. He dared not, according to my judgment, have sent it here. I suppose the Senator from Illinois will admit that there were provisions wholly repugnant to the Constitution in that treaty, and they were the essential and leading provisions constituting the staple of the treaty; they were not mere omissions or incidental objections. I am not going to enter into the contest which is carried on between the Senators from Illinois and Delaware. It is as a Senator of the United States that I wish to express my opinion upon the single proposition referred to, and one I consider of cardinal interest and importance, and one that may affect deeply the practical and constitutional workings of this Government—confounding the functions of one department of the Government with those which properly belong to another; in other words, making the Senate, which is but the advisory part of the treaty-making power, assume a primary jurisdiction and responsibility. I take the broad ground, that the President ought to perfect the treaty in its essential provisions, and such as would receive the sanction of his judgment, before he sends it at all to the Senate for its consideration and concurrence; and when it contains provisions repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, he should not send it. I know that the honorable Senator, if he should ever occupy that place, would not do it; yet I understood him to say that the Hise treaty should have been sent here; that we should have taken, amended, and moulded it in such a way as to subserve the great objects contemplated. That could not be, according to the organization of this Government. The President has no right to send any but a treaty that he approves. I maintain the broad proposition, that the President of the United States should send the treaty down as an entirety, and ask the Senate to ratify it or not, and amend it in such a way as to make it conform to the essential provisions, which had received the approbation of the President. But to send a treaty down here, and ask the Senate to mould it in such a way as to make it proper, would be changing the whole function of this Government, and would be a dangerous innovation. It would be something like the very innovation which has taken place by this debate—the making of this body the initiatory organ in relation to matters of diplomacy. Now what would be thought of such a procedure as this: Suppose the President were to send to the Senate a treaty with many provisions not having his approbation, with a recommendation that the Senate would take a single provision of minor importance and graft upon it all other provisions that would make it an acceptable treaty? This would be, in my opinion, inverting the organic action of the Government. It would be devolving upon the Senate the function of making a treaty, and asking the President to concur in it. Whereas, by the Constitution of the United States, "He shall have power, by and with the 'advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, 'provided two thirds of the Senators present con-'cur." From this, it is clear that it was contemplated that the Senate should be a reviewing and concurring body in and of a treaty already made by the President.

I rose merely to make this remark; but, sir, I am pledged in some measure to my constituents to discuss this subject fully. I am not prepared to do it now, because I do not think I ought to interfere in such a debate as has been going on. Whilst I shall forbear at present from entering into the general topics of the debate, I must allow myself to make one or two remarks, and I shall make them in perfect kindness to the Senator from Illinois. I do not undertake to say that the expansibility of our system is to be restrained by treaties. I do not mean to say that our progress is to be retarded in that way. Why, sir, the progress of human events is beyond the absolute control of any written law. It was unwise when Lycurgus made a code of laws which was never to be changed, and left his country with an injunction that it never should be changed. Laws are stationary, things are progressive. I concede that much to the honorable Senator from Illinois. But, when I am told that the United States, as a civilized confederacy of Republics, are not to resort to the ordinary appliances of civilization to conduct their concerns and intercourse with the world by treaties, and that they are not to observe their obligations, or that they will not be restrained by them, but that the aggressive spirit of progress has no other or higher law than the temptation of interest and policy, I do feel that if that prevails, we may grow fast, but we cannot live long. Nations, as well as individuals, must submit to the penalties of transgression; and if the historian who is to write the history of this day, or of the events which are now transpiring with such eventful interest, were to pass his judgment, a part of that judgment would be, that whenever the United States in the spirit of progress, the spirit of aggressive progress, shall maintain, or shall have illustrated the doctrine that "might makes right," and that treaties can be violated with impunity, it was one of the elements of their decay. It seems to me that the doctrine of the honorable Senator from Illinois would make us a people to illustrate the destiny of Benjamin: "He shall raven as a wolf: in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil."

Sir, are we to fulfill that destiny, without law, without constraint? In my deliberate judgment, treaties and constitutions and laws are the restraining influences to prevent us from running with an acceleration that is likely to result in ruin. I love the restraints of treaties. I love all the restraints and controlling influences of civilization. I do not wish American society and the American Government to be like the Numidian cavalry, riding with spurs, and without bridles, to rush impetuously into the charge, perhaps to be successful for a moment, but to perish in the end. Sir, I want the bridle. The very thing which I want is the bridle, to restrain and control, and not altogether the spurs, to drive you on with ruinous impetuosity. Treaties must be resorted to. They are the very things upon which civilized nations must rely. All treaties, in their ordinary language, are made to be perpetual; and yet we know that they never have been perpetual. They impose upon the parties making them the obligation of good faith; they are leagues of honorable covenants for the mutual benefit of the parties to them. In the progress of events it may become the interest of both parties to remodel and amend them by mutual consent. They are founded upon the assumption, that mutual good faith will preserve them. There are occasions when they might become unjust and oppressive upon one of the parties; and without a mutual release from their obligations, it might be an occasion calling for the highest exercise of sovereign judgment. In such cases the last arbiter of nations must come in to decide the differences. The occasion, in the contemplation of the great tribunal of nations, must furnish its own justification, and such as cannot be the subject of definite prescription.

The Senator from Illinois remarked, that if we wanted Mexico, the treaty we have made could not restrain the acquisition, or something of the same import. Now it may follow that we may not have to take Mexico against her consent; her interest as well as ours, may conform to the law of progress, to which the gentleman has so often alluded. That is, if we want Mexico, Mexico will be just as well prepared to accede to our terms as we are to hers to annul the treaty; or if we want Cuba, it may be our interest to have it, or if another nation attempts to put her hand on Cuba against our policy or consent, what is the resort? War. We resort to it, as every other nation resorts to any measure of policy, under the sanction of its own judgment. Each nation is entirely the judge of its own rights. But, sir, what would be the justification of war? There is a higher tribunal than ourselves. I hope there is a tribunal in Heaven, to which nations will appeal. But history and posterity are the tribunals to which we should look, and not to the tribunal that we may erect for our own pleadings upon a subject of this kind. In looking to such a judgment, we, as the parties, must not exclusively consult the dictates of our own interests. Duty and justice require that we should regard the rights of others, not only as they are involved in solemn treaties, but as the justice of the nations of the earth should regard them. Until some occasion should arise to justify the disregard of treaties, let us not inculcate a popular sentiment that would reconcile it merely to our interests.

The Senator has spoken on other topics, with a gushing exuberance, well calculated to attract applause; but I fear also well calculated to excite prejudice and to exasperate national resentments. In speaking of the growth of his own country, he had much to justify him in his highly-flattering picture of her prosperity. But when with taunting disparagement he spoke of the decrepitude of England and the other nations of Europe, he spoke in a way well calculated to wound national sensibility; and especially so, when I cannot regard his opinions just. He said that decrepitude had come upon them in their decline and old age. They were the mere mouldering columns of an edifice that had been; and as such their laws and policy could no longer shed light on the path of the young and vigorous people that, with Herculean strength, could throw off the shackles of European instruction. In this judgment, tempered with so much asperity, I am certain that he will find few that are impartial to concur with him. England may become our rival; but in her present strength and vigor of manhood, she cannot but command respect and consideration from all the other nations of the earth. We may claim to be her peer, but we nevertheless are her debtor.

Sir, when we despise England, we must despise the very soil in which grew the tree from whose fruits we have been fed; we must despise Hampden, and Sidney, and Chatham, and Shakspeare, and Burke. Will the Senator tell me that I am to despise them, or to hate England more than any other nation? If he does, I differ from him. I do not say that I have any especial love for any nation. It is not a word properly applicable to other nations. We love our own country—a sentiment of patriotism inspires that feeling. But as to other nations, we have feelings and opinions of different kinds. For some, we have much more respect and regard than for others. But, sir, I say here, in my place, if the word love be a word of preference, I avow it openly, that we have more sympathy with and are under deeper obligations to Great Britain, than to any other nation on earth. I do not hesitate to say, in the sense I have spoken, that I love her more than any other foreign nation on earth. England, in our origin, law, literature, and free institutions, is our mother. In vernacular language, she is our mother country. The very roots of our institutions run into her soil.

From what country do we derive the maxims, the spirit, the institutions, the safeguards of our liberty? Have not the streams of her literature been poured out upon us? Have we not all drunk of them with delight and improvement? From what country do we get Magna Charta, trial by jury, the common-law, with its hardy morality, inculcating all that has given liberty security? Sir, will the gentleman answer? I am willing, in all the arts of peace, in commerce, in literature, in science, in morals, to become the rival of England. But I can see no inducement, consulting national policy, to assume towards her the position of an hostile adversary. Remarks which have been made during this discussion, are well calculated to sow the seeds of jealousy and hatred between the two countries—that is, unless there shall be good sense to have a true understanding of them, when the national interest shall demand it; and I wish the occasion to speak for itself. I would not shrink from a collision or war with Great Britain sooner than any other nation. There is not much patriotism, however, in a mere abuse of her. But, Mr. President, as is sometimes the case, I have spoken beyond what I intended when I rose, and take my seat.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In reply to the honorable Senator from South Carolina, I wish to state to him, without going into the controversy as to which is the right policy for the President when a treaty contains objects desirable and details obnoxious, that he will find an example in point in the case of the Mexican treaty containing provisions which the President and Senate both regarded as unconstitutional, yet the President sent the treaty here, and pointed out the obnoxious parts. The Senator and those acting with him modified it, perfected it, voted for it, and ratified it in opposition to my vote, and it became the law of the land. It is a case precisely in point, and I merely mention it, and leave that part of the question.

Mr. BUTLER. I think the Mexican treaty was sent as an entirety. We amended it no doubt, but it was sent as an entirety by President Polk, saying that Mr. Trist had usurped power which he did not possess. It was exactly one of those instances in which the treaty had been made, and he asked the Senate to adopt it, but he sent it in as an entire thing.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The President sent it in, stating that there were certain provisions in it which must be stricken out before it could be sanctioned by him. But now as to another point: The gentleman commented upon a remark that I had made, and which also was contained in the letter of the late Secretary of State, [Mr. EVERETT,] and seems to suppose that we were advocating the doctrine of not observing the faith of treaties. That did not put us before the country in the true position which we have assumed. My position is this: That we should never make a treaty which we cannot carry into full execution; that good faith requires us not to make a treaty unless we intend to execute it, nor make one which we probably cannot be able to execute. My argument, therefore, was an argument against the making of treaties improperly upon points that were unnecessary, and which could not be carried into effect, and not in favor of violating any treaties that had been made. It was an argument in favor of the sanctity of treaties; and those who make treaties profusely and recklessly, binding us for all time to come without reference to the ability in future to execute them, are the ones who ought to be arraigned, if anybody should be, for not being faithful to treaty stipulations. I wish, therefore, to make this explanation, in order that no misapprehension as to the position which I have assumed may be entertained in any quarter.

The Senator referred to a remark of mine in regard to the decay and decline of European Powers, and made it the excuse for a eulogium upon England as the source from which we have derived everything that is valuable in science and arts, in literature, laws, and politics.

When I am reminded of the greatness of England, as connected with her statesmen and orators, and the illustrious names of Hampden and Sidney are pointed to as examples, I cannot fail to remember—I can never forget—that the same England which gave them birth, and should have felt a mother's pride and love in their virtues and services, persecuted her noble sons to the dungeon and the scaffold, and attempted to brand their names with infamy in all coming time, for the very causes which have endeared them to us and filled the republican world with their fame! Nor am I unmindful of the debt of gratitude which the present generation owes to the brilliant galaxy of great names whose fortune it was to have been born and to have suffered in England, and whose labors and researches in political, legal, and physical sciences—in literature, poetry, and art, have added so much luster to their native land. Some pursue their labors under the protection and patronage of England—others in defiance of her tyranny and vengeance. I award all credit and praise to the authors of all the blessings and advantages we have inherited from that source.

I cannot go as far as the Senator from South Carolina. I cannot recognize England as our mother. If so, she is and ever has been a cruel and unnatural mother. I do not find the evidence of her affection in her watchfulness over our infancy, nor in her joy and pride at our ever-blooming prosperity and swelling power, since we assumed an independent position.

The proposition is not historically true. Our ancestry were not all of English origin. They were of Scotch, Irish, German, French, and of Norman descent as well as English. In short, we inherit from every branch of the Caucasian race. It has been our aim and policy to profit by their example—to reject their errors and follies—and to retain, imitate, cultivate, perpetuate all that was valuable and desirable. So far as any portion of the credit may be due to England and Englishmen—and much of it is—let it be freely awarded and recorded in her ancient archives, which seem to have been long since forgotten by her, and the memory of which her present policy towards us is not well calculated to revive. But, that the Senator from South Carolina, in view of our present position and of his location in this Confederacy, should indulge in glowing and eloquent eulogiums of England for the blessings and benefits she has conferred and is still lavishing upon us, and urge these considerations in palliation of the wrongs she is daily perpetrating, is to me amazing. He speaks in terms of delight and gratitude of the copious and refreshing streams which English literature and science are pouring into our country and diffusing throughout the land. Is he not aware that nearly every English book circulated and read in this country contains lurking and insidious slanders and libels upon the character of our people and the institutions and policy of our Government? Does he not know that abolitionism, which has so seriously threatened the peace and safety of this Republic, had its origin in England, and has been incorporated into the policy of that Government for the purpose of operating upon the peculiar institutions of some of the States of this Confederacy, and thus render the Union itself insecure? Does she not keep her missionaries perambulating this country, delivering lectures and scattering broadcast incendiary publications, designed to incite prejudices, hate, and strife between the different sections of this Union? I had supposed that South Carolina and the other slaveholding States of this Confederacy had been sufficiently refreshed and enlightened by a certain species of English literature, designed to stir up treason and insurrection around his own fire-side, to have excused the Senator from offering up praises and hosannas to our English mother! [Applause in the galleries.] Is not the heart, intellect, and press of England this moment employed in flooding America with this species of "English literature?" Even the wives and daughters of the nobility and the high officers of Government have had the presumption to address the women of America, and in the name of philanthropy appeal to them to engage in the treasonable plot against the institutions and Government of their own choice in their native land, while millions are being expended to distribute "Uncle Tom's Cabin" throughout the world, with the view of combining the fanaticism, ignorance, and hatred of all the nations of the earth in a common crusade against the peculiar institutions of the State and section of this Union represented by the Senator from South Carolina; and he unwittingly encourages it, by giving vent to his rapturous joy over these copious and refreshing streams with which England is irrigating the American intellect. [Renewed applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. RUSK in the chair.) There must be order in the galleries. If there is not, they will be ordered to be cleared.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire to ask that the galleries may be cleared if such an outrage occurs again.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope it will be done. It is manifestly improper to have such proceedings in the galleries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It certainly will be done, if the same thing occurs again.

Mr. BUTLER. I have but one word to say in reply to the Senator from Illinois. When I spoke of our gratitude to England, I did not allude to the sentimental kind of literature to which the Senator refers. I thought I indicated the authors of the literature to which I referred; and I do not thank the Senator for going out of his way, and indicating impure streams, as if they had a connection with my remark, for there are impure streams flowing from other sources besides Great Britain; and there are impure examples in other parts of the world besides Great Britain. When I spoke of it, I spoke in emphatic terms of those writers who have poured upon us what the Senator himself will not deny to be refreshing streams; what I hope he will regard as refreshing to him, and to the intelligence of the age. I named authors. Will he dissent from Burke? Will he dissent from Chatham? Will he dissent from Shakspeare? Will he dissent from the literature and the eloquence and the example and the tone of feeling of Hampden and Sidney? Sir, when I spoke in the spirit of a man judging the literature of England, I did not expect to be diverted by this miserable allusion to "Uncle Tom's Cabin." [Laughter.] That may do for an ad captandum, but it is not a manly mode of meeting what I said in relation to the literature of England.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I spoke in terms of reverence and respect of the monuments and tombstones which were found in England, to the great men, to their patriotism, to their legal learning and science and poetry, and all that was great and noble and admirable. I spoke of them with respect as a matter in the past; but, sir, I do not think it was a legitimate argument to go back two or three centuries past to justify English aggressions in the present upon this continent; and when I heard the allusion and laudations and eulogiums upon past English history in palliation of present English enormity, I thought it was right and proper to remind the Senator himself of some of the present conduct of England, which should be borne in mind when he pronounced eulogies upon the past. I am talking of the present, and its bearing upon the future. It is that to which I am directing my remarks, and not to the past.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to know how England is to be responsible for "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Is England the indorser of it? I have alluded to the masterly intellects of England, and not to the spurious, miserable, sickly sentimentality of the day. If such literature as that to which he alludes is to be taken as a standard, England is not the only place in which it is found. She is no more responsible for that miserable cant in relation to this subject than others. But with regard to England, in all our commercial relations, in all our connection with her as a civilized nation, I presume the honorable Senator would not be disposed to postpone her to any other nation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would neither postpone nor give her the preference. I have no eulogium to make upon her. I will treat her as our duty as a nation requires.

Mr. BUTLER. I have pronounced no other eulogium than history yields to her literature, commerce, and civilization, and we are bound to maintain our relations with England if we intend to be a civilized nation ourselves. I made no allusion to the kind of literature which the Senator has brought in debate. We can find this miserable sentimentality anywhere, and there are many other things which the Senator might as well have brought in, which would have been as pertinent to the debate. He had better get up a discussion of the Maine liquor law. [Laughter.] I do not see why he should not. It has about as much connection with the question as the other.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have introduced into this discussion none of these extraneous topics. I have contented myself with replying when others have brought them forward and thrust them upon me. My object has been to confine the debate to the points at issue between the Senator from Delaware and myself, and I have not departed from that line except when compelled to do so by the remarks of others.

Mr. CLAYTON. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] will recollect how this discussion in open session was forced upon me. It was introduced here by the member from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] on the 14th of February, and I was compelled to defend myself in open session, because the Senate permitted the attack to be made in open session. I wish no concealment, and do not mean to permit the member from Illinois to escape an exposure in public of the misstatements he has publicly made. He shall not avoid the notice of his own changes of position, by charging the same things on me.

The Senator from South Carolina justly considers that treaty as so absurd on its own face, that no President would have been justified in submitting it to the Senate for ratification. Such a course would have implied his approbation of it. In the event that England had refused all our proposals for an equal right of passage, he might have sent it to the Senate, if he had deemed it expedient, to ascertain whether his constitutional advisers desired an exclusive privilege to be acquired. But it could not possibly have in any event been confirmed, without so changing it as to make an entirely new treaty.

The Senator from Illinois has not ventured to deny that the treaty was unconstitutional as it stood. He evades that point, because he knows he cannot defend his favorite Hise treaty as a constitutional measure for a moment. He dared not attempt to defend it, after I had exposed it. Yet he had committed himself in favor of it by at least four or five electioneering speeches last summer, (one of which he made and published at Richmond,) and by his speeches here in the Senate so often, that he knew not how to retreat without discredit. When I read his Hise treaty to the Senate, it not only shocked the honorable Senator from South Carolina, who has just given utterance to his feelings, but I will venture to say it astonished nearly every other Senator present, that any man should have been so reckless as to have maintained for years past that such a treaty should have been sent to the Senate for confirmation. Now he is driven, by the exposure made here, to desert everything he ever said in favor of it before, with this solitary exception, that he still is in favor of the exclusive privilege provided for in it. All his declamation in its favor has ended in that.

Sir, it was not only objectionable on the ground that it was a violation of the Constitution, but on the ground that it was a gross political and entangling alliance. The very remarks which the Senator has made so often in opposition to the treaty which Mr. Squier negotiated, and the treaty of the 19th of April, 1850, lie in justice, with all their force, to the treaty of Mr. Hise, but not one of them had any justice whatever when applied to the treaties to which he has objected. Neither of them provided for any political connection or entangling alliance.

I quoted, on a former occasion, the names of some of the most distinguished statesmen of this country, in favor of the principle which I had adopted, of opening the right of way to all nations on the same terms; that is, on condition of protection from all. But the Senator will be satisfied with nothing but an exclusive right or monopoly vested in us. He misrepresents the contract obtained by American citizens, and intended to be protected by the treaty of Mr. Squier, when he says that grant was a grant to English as well as American capitalists. It was a grant to American capitalists.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator misunderstood me. I did not speak of the specific terms of the treaty of Mr. Squier, for the reason that the injunction of secrecy has not yet been removed, although I saw some papers friendly to the Senator putting some sections of it in the paper.

Mr. CLAYTON. What papers?

Mr. DOUGLAS. A New York paper did it the other day. I only spoke of the general terms used by Mr. Squier, and published by the Senator in 1850. But when I said that it opened to England and to us jointly, I spoke of the Senator having provided for that in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. CLAYTON. The whole contract protected by the Squier treaty, of which I am speaking, was published two years ago, and is in a document before Congress.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was speaking of the treaty.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then why did you interrupt me? You knew I was speaking of the contract or grant, and not of the treaty. The substance of the treaty was published long ago. It has been published at least two years; and there is not anything in it or the grant, about a partnership between European and American capitalists.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator from Delaware say that the Squier treaty has been published by authority?

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir; but you know the substance of it was published long ago, and the injunction of secrecy has long since been taken off the treaty of the 19th of April, 1850, which discloses the principle of both. The Senator has shown that he has not the slightest difficulty in speaking of either of these treaties, or of anything connected with either of them.

The Senator presents new issues for discussion, and changes his ground in his reply. But I mean to bring him back to the points from which he seeks to escape. He has not attempted, in his reply, to fasten on me, as he endeavored to do in the beginning of the debate, and as he did in his speech of the 14th of February, the charge that I had, in negotiating the treaty of the 19th of April, 1850, abnegated, as he expressed it, the Monroe doctrine. No, sir; he has abandoned that, and he will not venture to touch it again. He has good reason to, shun it, for it burnt his fingers. He has fled from it. He cannot now vindicate a word he uttered on that subject. He beats a retreat.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, sir; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then he is not willing to retreat, after he has become totally silenced on the subject, and ceased to make battle.

Now, a word as to his favorite exclusive privilege. If we had it, it would involve us in controversies with all other nations, and would prove a curse instead of a blessing. In the event of a war between this country and any great naval power, the canal would be seized. The Senator fears nothing—oh no, not he! He would fortify it at both ends! Yes, sir; build a fort at both ends. A fort at San Juan de Nicaragua, and a fort on the Pacific; and then we must garrison them, and keep a standing army there. How many soldiers would it take to garrison a fortress if England and France, or either of them, should go to war with us? How many would the Senator have at San Juan?—how many on the Pacific? Does he suppose that any force that this country could possibly send there, and at that distance from us, could resist the other great Powers of the world, in a war? He is fond of boasting (and I love to hear it—it is quite flattering) that we are a giant Republic; and the Senator himself is said to be a "little giant;" [laughter;] yes, sir, quite a giant, and everything that he talks about in these latter days is gigantic. [Laughter.] He has become so magnificent of late, that he cannot consent to enter into a partnership on equal terms with any nation on earth—not he! He must have the exclusive right in himself and our noble selves! We must own the canal. Why not demand the same exclusive privilege at Gibraltar? What is the difference in principle? Why should we not seek to obtain the exclusive right of passage into the Mediterranean, as well as the passage across the Isthmus?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator permit me——

Mr. CLAYTON. If he is anxious to make more remarks, I am willing to hear him when I have done.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator; but I understand him to ask me, and look for an answer.

Mr. CLAYTON. Let him be quiet. He meant to say that one is a European and the other an American passage. That is all he had to say. And as the distinction is without a difference, I do not desire to hear him. Knowing all he was about to say, I thought I could say it quite as well myself. [Laughter.]

Sir, his are not the principles of the American Senate. His are not the principles of the forty-two men who, on the 22d of May, 1850, ratified the treaty. The Senator does not merely arraign me: he arraigns all those constitutional advisers of the President of the United States.

His own colleague [Mr. SHIELDS] was among the number who voted for the treaty. Most of the distinguished gentlemen now around me, who were here at that day, voted for it. You, yourself, Mr. President, were one of the men who proclaimed the same principle, by voting for the treaty with New Granada! This doctrine of the exclusive right to make, construct, and protect a canal outside the limits of the United States, was not known to the statesmen who lived fourteen years ago. Sir, it was a stranger to the statesmen who have governed this country for a quarter of a century.

The Senator denied again that I had a right to use the great character of Jackson, with his own party, in favor of the treaty. I stated the fact that Livingston, the Secretary of State under Jackson, had proclaimed, on the 20th of July, 1831, the hostility of this Government to anything like an exclusive privilege through that canal. The letter of Mr. Livingston to Mr. Jeffers, of that date, is decisive of the sentiments of President Jackson, on the ground that an exclusive privilege in any one nation would be a violation of the leading engagement in our own treaty and every other treaty of commerce with any local Government in Central America which should grant such an exclusive privilege. He instructed Mr. Jeffers to present that conclusive objection to any grant of exclusive privilege to the Dutch capitalists who, under the patronage of the King of the Netherlands, had applied for and obtained a grant to cut the canal at Nicaragua. It was, as I stated before, ascertained that there was no exclusive privilege granted to or asked for by the King of the Netherlands. I said, therefore, I had the authority, in favor of the doctrine of the treaty, of the Dutch Government, and its great chief himself—a man on whom I have no time to pronounce a eulogy, but who has been eulogized by men who were quite as capable of conferring distinction, by anything they might say, as even the Senator from Illinois himself. At the distance of nearly a quarter of a century ago, when desiring to open the great avenue to the Pacific, he did not dream of such a thing as the exclusive privilege. His contract, which I have before me, provided for opening the canal which he projected, to all the nations of the earth on the same terms; and, in fact, there is not a principle established by the Senate in its resolution of 1835, by the House of Representatives in its resolution of 1839, and by the concurrent action of Presidents Jackson, Polk, and Taylor, that is not in accordance with the principle established by the capitalists who were patronized by the Dutch Government. Foreigners have not adopted the narrow and contracted policy which so commended itself to the member from Illinois, of procuring an exclusive right over a canal which no one State could possibly maintain and protect in the face of the great commercial nations of the earth.

But the Senator said—and I must call the attention of the Senate back to the fact—that when we had obtained the exclusive right, he would not keep it—not he! He was too liberal, too generous, too fair towards other nations of the earth to keep any such thing! As soon as he obtained his exclusive right, and made his canal, and had the monopoly of navigating it; as soon as he had fortified it and protected it, so as to compel other nations to respect it—he would turn round and give to everybody else in the world the right to go through it at our expense! Is not that a magnificent conception? When my neighbors propose to make a highway, I say: "No, you shall not. No man shall dare to spend a dollar on it. I will have the exclusive right of way! I will make the highway: but after I have gone to the expense of making it, and while I have the sole burden of keeping up all the repairs, if any of you desire to travel upon it, on the same terms with myself, you are perfectly welcome! But take care! Dare not attempt to repair it, or use any means to protect or preserve it from destruction—I must have the exclusive honor of that." A mere restatement of such a proposition seems to me to make it absolutely unnecessary to comment upon it.

But the Senator takes the ground that I have prevented the grant of the right of way from the local Government. He said, again and again, that I had prevented that. It was one of the chief objects of solicitude with me, while acting as Secretary of State, that our capitalists should obtain that. It was obtained; and on the true policy which had been recognized by all the leading statesmen of this country. The treaty with Nicaragua was negotiated under instructions from President Taylor. It provided for the protection of the right of way. It was presented to the Senate of the United States; and, for reasons which I have never known, and do not know to this day—after I resigned the office of Secretary of State, and had gone away from this place—it was not acted upon. It was never rejected. No vote was taken upon it. It was overlooked in the mass of business, or for some other cause it was entirely neglected; and yet I am censured, forsooth, by him, one of the very men who neglected a public duty, in regard to it, because that treaty did not pass! I hear from others that he opposed it, because he preferred the Hise treaty, and that he assisted in defeating it! The Senator means that I defeated the right of way, because I did not send the Hise treaty here—a treaty which, I say again, no Senator could have voted for, if it had come here.

Sir, the right of way was secured by American capitalists, aided by all the efforts the Minister sent by President Taylor to Central America could make. The Senator ought to have known it was granted to American citizens at the very moment he charged me with the loss of it. He has repeatedly said we had obtained it by a grant to English and American capitalists. At the same time, if he had read the public documents sent to Congress on a subject about which he has talked more than any other living man, he would have known that statement was incorrect, and that the grant was made on the application of American capitalists to themselves. The President did all he had a right to do to encourage and protect it.

If these capitalists construct a ship canal, England will protect it, the United States will protect it, and every other civilized nation we apply to will protect it when accomplished; because no nation can be or ought to be entitled to use it, except upon the terms of agreeing to protect it. England agrees, by the treaty, to assist us, not only in protecting this ship canal, but any railroad or ship canal that can be made through the whole isthmus. We have no interest, that I am aware of, to prefer the route by way of Nicaragua to that by Tehuantepec. If we could obtain a canal route nearer our country than either Nicaragua or Panama, we ought to prefer it. Undoubtedly, if we could obtain the Tehuantepec route, we ought to prefer that; but if we cannot obtain a passage at a point nearer to us than the southern part of the Isthmus of Darien, it is of the deepest interest to this country to have it at that point. Pains were taken, as the Senator will know by looking into the correspondence, to ascertain which was the most practicable route; and from all the information before me, including that obtained from Lord Palmerston himself, as well as from my own countrymen, the route believed to be the most easily practicable was through Nicaragua. Whether it is the best route, I am not at all interested to affirm or deny; for if a ship canal can be obtained anywhere through that isthmus, the treaty I signed protects it, and insures to my countrymen the right of passage through it; and we have no longer any cause for such jealousy as was entertained by President Jackson and Mr. Livingston, the Secretary of State, in 1831. No matter who may construct this or any other canal, in any part of the whole isthmus between North and South America, we have the right to navigate it on the terms of the most favored nation, by virtue of the very treaty which the Senator so violently denounces, for his own personal and party purposes.

The Senator says, that by adopting the treaty I have recognized the right of Great Britain or any European nation to interfere in the affairs of this continent. This Government has, to a much greater extent, recognized their right to claim an equity of commercial privileges, from its very origin, by every commercial treaty which it has ever made. You have made your commercial treaties with all the European Powers. In each of them you have agreed to a certain extent that they have the right to interfere in your affairs, and they have conceded the right, on your part, to interfere in their affairs. Does the Senator mean to condemn every commercial treaty which we have ever made? Does he think that he can make an appeal successfully to the vulgar passions, in order to make this treaty odious, and thereby to make the men in the Senate of the United States who voted for it odious? We never made a treaty of any kind with a European Power which does not acknowledge to as great an extent, or greater, the right of European interference in the affairs of this continent. He has voted for treaties which regulate all our tonnage and import duties, and all our commercial intercourse with them. We have made treaties with them to control our own boundaries, and legislative arrangements to control our most important political and commercial interests.

The Senator has rung the changes on the word "partnership," from day to day, until one who did not know him would suppose that we had entered into some great joint-stock mercantile establishment with England. You might as well say that all men living near a navigable river, or a turnpike road, or a railroad, had entered into a partnership, as to say that the nations of the earth about to travel this highway on the same terms had entered into a "partnership." Every man in the District of Columbia has entered into partnership about Pennsylvania Avenue of the same kind. We all travel it on the same terms. If anybody should attempt to destroy it, we are all equally interested to protect it, and we would protect it.

The reference made by the Senator to the instructions to our chargé d'affaires in Central America, to prove that he was directed to oppose the treaty of Mr. Hise, is evidence of a degree of recklessness or folly of which I should regret to accuse any Senator. Instructions plainly referring to a contract are construed by him to refer to a treaty. I endeavored to correct him at the time he referred to the instructions, but in vain; and on he went to his own manifest destiny. The very passage he quoted distinctly proves him to have entirely misrepresented the instructions. He has confounded the "charter or grant of the right of way," made to "the proprietors of the canal," with a treaty to protect it. His remarks on this subject, compared with the quotation which he has made from the instructions, will convict him without any exposure from me. I will quote the whole passage he has cited from my instructions, with a view to show the injustice of his remarks. The instructions say:—

"See that it [the contract or grant] is not assignable to others," [meaning to others than the capitalists—the American citizens who obtained it;] "that no exclusive privileges are granted to any nation that will not agree to the same treaty stipulations with Nicaragua; that the tolls to be demanded by the OWNERS are not unreasonable or oppressive; that no power be reserved to THE PROPRIETORS OF THE CANAL OR THEIR SUCCESSORS to extort at any time hereafter, or unjustly to obstruct or embarrass, the RIGHT OF PASSAGE. THIS will require all your vigilance and skill. If THEY do not agree to GRANT us passage on reasonable and proper terms, refuse our protection and our countenance to procure the contract from Nicaragua.

"If a CHARTER or GRANT OF THE RIGHT OF WAY shall have been incautiously or inconsiderately made before your arrival in that country, seek to have it properly modified to answer the ends we have in view."

The Senator's ignorance of this plain language is unaccountable. He had confounded the grant of the right of way or charter to the company of Americans who asked for it, with the treaty between Nicaragua and this Government.

I interrupted him, and explained it to him; and the more clearly it was made to appear that he was wrong, the more strongly he seemed to adhere to his error. He knew well enough that the word "us" referred to our countrymen. The instructions say: "If they [the company] do not agree to grant us [Americans] passage on reasonable and proper terms, refuse our protection," &c. He knew well enough what this meant; yet he put to me the question: "Was he [I] one of the company, and therefore authorized to use the word 'us,' when speaking of the rights and privileges to be acquired of a foreign nation through his agency as Secretary of State?" He surely did not mean, by putting such a question to me, to insinuate that I was one of the company of "capitalists, proprietors, and speculators who might become the owners of the charter." If he did, I will not charge him here with falsehood, but, with all possible politeness, I will prove him to be guilty of it.

Mr. President, I do not at all object to any statement of the fact that I utterly disapproved of the Hise treaty. I only complained of his misrepresentations in regard to it. His statement that the clause guarantying the independence of Nicaragua was not one of the reasons which induced me to withhold the Hise treaty from the Senate, is palpably incorrect. To sustain himself in his assertion, he refers to my letter to Mr. Lawrence, of the 20th October, 1849. The very passage he has cited shows that "if our effort to place, by our own arrangement with the British Government, our interests upon a just and satisfactory foundation should prove abortive, (that is, upon the foundation of equal privileges in the treaty,) then the President will not hesitate to submit this or some other treaty" (that is, the treaty of Hise or the treaty of Squier; the one for exclusive privileges, or the other for equal privileges to all nations) "which may be concluded by the present chargé d'affaires to Guatemala, to the Senate of the United States for their advice." It was a threat, if you please, that if the British Government continued to occupy Central America as they had done, and should refuse to yield us the right of passage through the isthmus on equal terms with them, then we would submit, when we could obtain no justice from Great Britain, some treaty to the Senate which would grant us the right of way on the most favorable terms, without regard to the interests of Great Britain. We should have been perfectly justified in endeavoring to exclude her, if we saw evidently that she intended to exclude us; and we desired her fairly to understand that. The very quotation from the instructions to Mr. Lawrence which he has made, proves that he himself well knew that my reference to the Hise treaty was nothing more than a threat, that if we could not obtain equal privileges with Great Britain with her own consent, we would have them in dispite of her. With a view to expose his misstatements on this subject, I quote from the dispatch to Mr. Lawrence—the very passage on which he pretends to rely:

"If, however, the British Government shall reject these overtures on our part, and shall refuse to cooperate with us in the generous and philanthropic scheme of rendering the interoceanic communication, by the way of the port and river San Juan, free to all nations upon the same terms, we shall deem ourselves justified in protecting our interests independently of her aid, and despite her opposition or hostility. With a view to this alternative, we have a treaty with the State of Nicaragua, a copy of which has been sent to you, and the stipulations of which you should unreservedly impart to Lord Palmerston. You will inform him, however, that this treaty was concluded without a power or instruction from this Government; that the President had no knowledge of its existence, or of the intention to form it, until it was presented to him by Mr Hise, our late chargé d'affaires to Guatemala, about the first of September last; and that, consequently, we are not bound to ratify it, and will take no step for that purpose, if we can, by arrangement with the British Government, place our interests upon a just and satisfactory foundation. But if our effort for this end should be abortive, the President will not hesitate to submit this or some other treaty which may be concluded by the present chargé d'affaires to Guatemala, to the Senate of the United States, for their advice and consent, with a view to its ratification; and, if that enlightened body should approve it, he also will give it his hearty sanction, and will exert all his constitutional power to execute its provisions in good faith—a determination in which he may confidently count upon the good will of the people of the United States."

It is impossible to reason with one who says he does not understand the object for which this passage in the dispatch was written.

But he has quoted another passage from the same dispatch. I could not wish to expose him more effectually than by quoting it myself. It is as follows:

"You may suggest, for instance, that the United States and Great Britain should enter into a treaty guarantying the independence of Nicaragua, Honduras, and Costa Rica, which treaty may also guaranty to British subjects the privileges acquired in those States by the treaties between Great Britain and Spain, provided that the limits of those States on the east be acknowledged to be the Caribbean sea."

After citing this, he gravely asks me, "What has become of my objection to the guarantee of the independence of Nicaragua?" His question scarcely deserves an answer. Great Britain was in possession of the country, in virtue of the protectorate, and we were not; and the proposition made to her was, that she should not only abandon it, but also guaranty the independence of the Central American States adjoining the proposed canal. The Senator is incapable of perceiving the difference between a treaty of the United States and Nicaragua, guarantying the independence of Nicaragua, and a treaty of the United States and Great Britain jointly, on the one part, and Nicaragua on the other, for the same purpose. If Great Britain had joined us in such a treaty, we should have readily reached our whole object. She refused to accede to this proposition; and it was palpably a suggestion to ascertain her views. The separate guarantee of independence by us alone, was indeed an objection to the Hise treaty, and it was one among many other objections which made the whole insurmountable. Our separate guarantee was a guarantee against Great Britain, the party in possession. A joint guarantee with her was liable to no such exception, and could not possibly entangle us.

The Senator is guilty of so many other misstatements, that it is a difficult matter to correct them all. He says that I voted for the Mexican treaty of peace—the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo—according to his recollection. His recollection is in this respect, as in many others, entirely at fault. The record shows that I did not vote upon the treaty.

His statement that the Hise treaty was evidence of the fact that Nicaragua was willing and anxious to grant to the United States forever the exclusive right and control over a ship canal between the two oceans, is contradicted by the letter of Carcache, the Nicaraguan minister, who declares she rejected it after it had been signed by Señor Selva, the commissioner on her part. The treaty was evidence of extreme folly, and of little else beside.

The Senator recurs again to his objection that the convention will not permit us to annex Central America, and points with triumph to a passage in the letter of my distinguished friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT,] to the Comte de Sartiges, in which he expresses a doubt whether the Constitution would permit us, by the tripartite treaty proposed by France and England, to declare that we would never purchase Cuba. The Senator from Illinois held this up as a conclusive authority to prove that the treaty of the 19th April, 1850, was unconstitutional. He did not venture to argue this position. The treaty of 1850 was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, was at the time a member, who joined in reporting the treaty and in voting for it: did he not understand the Constitution? Without referring to all the other distinguished jurists who voted for it, or to the numerous treaties in which this Government has defined the limits of its own territory as perpetual, including the Ashburton treaty, and the treaty of Ghent, and the treaty with Mexico, and I know not how many others, I say to the Senator from Illinois, that I acknowledge a wide distinction between the purchase of Cuba and the annexation of Central America. Cuba was not in the possession of Great Britain, under the name of a protectorate or otherwise. A large part of Central America was. We had no canal to make in Cuba. She presented no obstacle to us in our passage to California and Oregon. Central America did. Sir, I do most cordially concur in all the encomiums upon the letter of my friend from Massachusetts. I approved of all the policy of President Fillmore in regard to Cuba, while my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT,] was at the head of the Department of State.

President Taylor, at an early period of his administration, was informed of the substance of Mr. Forsyth's letter, which has been since published, instructing our Minister at Madrid to say to the Spanish Government that we would defend the title of Spain to Cuba, with all the naval and military power of the United States. I thought it impolitic, as it led, of course, to a similar communication to Spain from Great Britain and France. The French and English Governments, being apprised by Spain of our guarantee against them, of course, I thought, would give her a similar guarantee against us. The assurance of the United States, Great Britain, and France, thus made to Spain, virtually guarantying Cuba to Spain, was equal in efficacy to any tripartite treaty that could have been concluded. By the President's direction, I did not continue the assurance on our part.

I allude to this as illustrating the identical policy adopted by my honorable friend from Massachusetts in his letter to the Comte de Sartiges. Our Minister at Madrid was instructed, on the 2d of August, 1849, that the President could not comprehend or appreciate the motives or expediency of openly declaring to Spain that the whole power of the United States would be employed to prevent the occupation, in whole or in part, of Cuba from passing into other hands, because he had reason to believe that this declaration of Mr. Forsyth, on our part, had led to counter declarations to Spain of a similar character by other interested Powers; that whilst this Government was resolutely determined that the Island of Cuba should never be ceded by Spain to any other Power than the United States, it did not desire, in future, to enter into any guarantees with Spain on that subject; that, without guarantees, we should be ready, when the time came, to act; that the news of the cession of Cuba to any foreign Power would, in the United States, be the instant signal for war; and that no foreign Power would attempt to take it that did not expect a hostile collision with us as an inevitable consequence.

This discontinuance, or revocation, of Mr. Forsyth's declaration, which had bound this Government for so many years, was not exactly a refusal to agree to such a tripartite convention, as was very properly rejected by my honorable friend from Massachusetts, but it was the first instance in which this Government gave unmistakable evidence of its policy not to agree to any such convention.

Sir, the Senator said that I had abolished the Monroe doctrine. If I have really done that, I have done more than I ever thought I was capable of doing. If I have done that, I have abolished a fruitful source of controversy between my own country and other nations. But how and in what sense have I abolished the Monroe doctrine? One of the principles on which I acted, in the formation of the treaty, was the exclusion of a European nation from further interference on a part of this continent. Was that exclusion an abolition of the Monroe doctrine? Will he tell me of any instance in the history of this country, in which any other Administration has carried out the Monroe doctrine in the same way, or in any other way? Can he find any other instance in which there has been the slightest approximation to it.

As to the Indian protectorate in Nicaragua, I have only to say of it as I said before, "Stat nominis umbra"—it stands, the shadow of a name!

The Senator is fond of talking violently about driving European nations from this continent. When he discourses in such magnificent terms as he employed a few years ago, about "fifty-four forty or fight," he does no harm among his own countrymen. We all know exactly what it means. But when these speeches reach the other side of the Atlantic, they have a different effect. They induce foreigners to believe that we are a quarrelsome, violent, and aggressive race, denying to all other men equal rights with ourselves; and they are well calculated to make us odious among other nations. We once held among them a high character for probity and honor; but if it shall come to be understood among them that we are bent upon seizing every country to which we may take a fancy, we shall be looked upon as pirates and enemies of the human race. Then it will be found that, instead of maintaining the highest position upon earth, we have descended to the lowest, and the sun of our glory will set forever. I am, and profess to be, an American in heart—every inch an American; as determined to assert and enforce respect for American rights, and the duty of protecting American interests at home and abroad, as any man; but I am also resolved to assert and maintain American faith and honor. Let us proclaim it among all the nations of the earth that there does not exist under the sun a people more proud of observing and maintaining their treaties and all their contracts than the people of the United States. Let us discountenance this system now practiced by the Senator from Illinois and others among us, of denouncing Europeans, and of inculcating it as a duty to hate the men of any other nation. I cannot express my sentiments on the subject in more appropriate terms, than by asking the Secretary to read a passage from the Farewell Address of the Father of his Country. Let us refresh and strengthen ourselves, at the close of this turbulent debate, by a resort to that fountain whose bright waters have never failed to invigorate us.

The Clerk read it, as follows:

"Nothing is more essential than that permanent inveterate antipathies against particular nations, and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is, in some degree, a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable, when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill-will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the Government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The Government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts, through passion, what reason would reject; at other times it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes, perhaps, the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

"So, likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducement or justification. It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill-will, and a disposition to retaliate, in the parties from whom EQUAL PRIVILEGES are withheld. And it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens (who devote themselves to the favorite nation) facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation."

Mr. President, I have done. The first resolution which I offered, calling for information, has been passed, and the other may sleep upon the table, if I can be assured that the information sought by it can be had, as it ought to be, without it. I am quite indifferent to its fate. My chief object was to defend my own position, and that object has been accomplished.*

The further consideration of the subject was then postponed until to-morrow.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR OF THE SENATE.

Mr. FISH submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the 48th rule of the Senate be amended by inserting after the word "Treasury," the words "Secretary of the Interior," and also by adding the following to the rule:

No person except members and officers of the Senate shall be admitted at either of the side doors of the Senate Chamber, and all persons claiming admission on the floor, excepting members and the Clerk of the House of Representatives for the time being, the heads of the several Departments, the Private Secretary of the President, the chaplains of Congress, the judges of the United States, foreign ministers and their secretaries, and officers who by name shall have received the thanks of Congress, or medals by a vote of Congress, shall, each time before being admitted upon the floor, enter their names, together with the official position in right of which they claim admission, in a book to be provided and kept at the main entrance to the Senate Chamber; and no person except members of the Senate shall be allowed within the bar of the Senate, or to occupy the seat of any Senator.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COOPER in the chair.) The Secretary of the Board to examine the claims of Lieutenant Colonel Frémont, has addressed a letter to the President of the Senate requesting permission to withdraw a report submitted on the 29th December last, with the view of correcting certain errors. Will the Senate grant the leave asked for?

Mr. WELLER. Let that lie over until I can have an opportunity of seeing what that report is.

It accordingly went over.

On motion by Mr. COOPER, it was Ordered, That Daniel Nippes have leave to withdraw certain papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion by Mr. ADAMS, it was Ordered, That leave be given to withdraw the papers on the claim of Clemens, Bryant & Co., from the files of the Senate.

On motion by Mr. JAMES, it was Ordered, That Margaret Barnett have leave to withdraw her papers from the files of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 17, 1853.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Department of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 21st instant, transmitting a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

SELECT COMMITTEES.

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, it was Ordered, That the vacancies in the Select Committee on Frauds, &c., occasioned by the expiration of the terms of Mr. UNDERWOOD and Mr. BROOKE, be filled by the Chair.

And Mr. MORTON, and Mr. THOMPSON of Kentucky, were appointed.

On motion by Mr. WELLER, it was Ordered, That the vacancy in the Select Committee on the Mexican Boundary, occasioned by the expiration of the term of Mr. CLARKE, be filled by the President.

And Mr. FISH was appointed.

COAL FOR THE JAPAN EXPEDITION.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent to make an explanation connected with some remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COOPER,] the other day, reflecting on a constituent of mine, who is one of the officers of this Government.

Unanimous consent was given.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COOPER,] the other day, in introducing certain resolutions, which I hold in my hand, made the following remark:

"He meant to cast no reproach on the late Secretary of the Navy or his predecessor; they were both high-minded and honorable men, men of character and integrity; but nevertheless these contracts have been made by the bureaus possibly without their knowledge. He desired to have this information; and he hoped the resolution would now be passed."

The resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, required to communicate to the Senate the contract entered into with Messrs. Howland & Aspinwall for supplying the Japan squadron with coal, the price per ton which the said coal will cost delivered in the Chinese seas, the amount of commissions and insurance, respectively, together with the rate of exchange which the Government will be required to pay for such of the coal as may be purchased in England.

"That the Secretary be also required to inform the Senate whether offers were made by other parties than Messrs. Howland & Aspinwall, to supply the above-named squadron with coal, by delivering the same at such places as might be designated in the Chinese seas, the prices per ton at which these parties proposed to deliver it, stating particularly the rates at which anthracite, American bituminous, and English bituminous were respectively offered; and whether, after these offers had been made, a contract at higher prices was not entered into with Messrs. Howland & Aspinwall for English coal.

"That the Secretary be further required to inform the Senate whether, previous to the time of contracting for the supply of the said squadron with coal, the Government had not regularly-authorized agents employed for the express purpose of purchasing and inspecting all coal necessary for the supply of the Navy, and what commission the said agents received by way of compensation for their services. That he be required further to inform the Senate whether Messrs. Howland & Aspinwall were not appointed agents to purchase and inspect the whole or a greater part of the coal necessary for the supply of the Japan squadron; whether the commissions allowed them are not double the amount of those allowed and paid to the regular purchasing and inspecting agents; whether the said commissions are not counted on the gross price of coal—namely, on the price with freight, exchange, and insurance added. That he be required also to inform the Senate what quantity of coal it is estimated will be required for the supply of the said squadron annually, and what kind principally will be used; what amount of demurrage has been paid, and for what quantity of coal, for what length of time, and to whom; also, what rate of demurrage is to be paid hereafter."

Whilst the remark exempts the Secretaries of the Navy from censure and blame, it leaves but one inference, that it may be applicable only to the head of the Naval Bureau, my friend and constituent Commodore Shubrick, than whom no one in the public service could be less liable to such a censure.

In fact there was no contract entered into by the Navy Department, either by the Secretary himself or the head of the bureau, with Howland & Aspinwall, for coal, in the proper acceptation of the term contract. The Navy Department, by express law, and in change of an old regulation, is authorized to purchase coal for the use of the Navy. The mode of making such purchases is left to the judgment of the Secretary, under his official responsibility. In carrying out the provisions of this law, the late Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Graham, appointed Howland & Aspinwall as agents to supply the Japan squadron with coal. To enable them to do so with certainty and precision, that is, as to quantity and place, they are subject to the requisition and orders of the head of the bureau. For their services as agents, thus appointed, they receive a stipulated commission, previously agreed upon between themselves and the Secretary of the Navy. The only function to be performed by the head of the bureau is strictly ministerial, that is, to make a requisition on the agents, and to pay their bills when duly presented and authenticated.

Commodore Shubrick, the head of the bureau, confining himself strictly in the sphere of his official agency, has done nothing more nor less than carry out the stipulated arrangements of the Secretary of the Navy. He could have no inducement to do anything else; and I will answer for it, sir, that if anything had depended on his discretion, it would have been performed with good judgment and honorable purpose. I have no doubt that the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania had no intention of saying anything to wound the feelings or touch the honor of my honorable friend and constituent.

Mr. COOPER. The Senator from South Carolina certainly did me no more than justice, when he said that I intended to cast no reflection upon Commodore Shubrick. I did not intend to convey the idea that Commodore Shubrick had acted dishonestly, or perhaps even improperly. I believe I stated at the time that the contracts were made by the Bureau of Construction and Supply, and it is probable that if I had reflected a moment, I would have known that Commodore Shubrick was at the head of that bureau. But there is one suggestion in that letter that I think had better have been left out.

Mr. BUTLER. It is not a letter. It is my own memorandum from his conversation.

Mr. COOPER. He states that there is no contract entered into. There is no contract, perhaps, made with the persons who furnish the coal, but they are appointed agents, and ex officio their duty is to furnish coal, and they become in law contractors with the Government. Now, sir, let me say further, that instead of paying a commission of five per cent.) which the regularly-authorized agents of the Government are entitled to receive, these men receive ten per cent. In addition to that, by the bills, as they will be seen in the return made to the resolution by the present Secretary of the Navy, they have bargained at ten and a half per cent., by way of exchange; and instead of purchasing American coal at the price at which it was offered to them, which by the tests made by the engineers in chief, and by the officers in command of steamers, is greatly preferable to English coal, they have bought English coal at a higher price. Now, I certainly did not intend to reflect on the Senator's constituent. I never would do injustice to any man, high or low; but when I see the Government funds squandered, and American interests neglected, in order that some parties may be benefited, I must take notice of it. I do not refer to the bureaus, by any means. I think it was really, from what I have heard and seen, through the agency of other persons; but that is the state of the case, and the community, the great constituency which we all represent, will judge whether I was right in what I said or not.

* CORRECTION.—An error occurred in the publication of Mr. CLAYTON'S speech of the 15th instant. Nineteen lines at the foot of the first column of page 268 of the Appendix to the Congressional Globe, beginning—"Mr. DOUGLAS. I never said that I would not," &c., were inserted by mistake. Also, two paragraphs at the top of the second column of the same page.

Mr. BUTLER. All I have to say in rejoinder is, that Commodore Shubrick had a limited administrative agency, and of course none of the blame or censure could fall upon him. It was a stipulation, I suppose, entered into by the Navy Department itself, perhaps, as the Senator says, under some influences; but I do not believe that Commodore Shubrick can be charged as having intentionally either perpetrated a wrong on the Government, or done anything to the prejudice of American interests.

Mr. PEARCE. The remarks which have been made might seem to throw some censure upon the late Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Graham, and I think it due to him that I should state my recollection of a conversation which I had with him last summer in relation to the supply of coal for the Japan expedition. Though I do not profess to recollect all the points with accuracy, I think I can state, with a little certainty, a few things which will go to excuse that gentleman from any reproach which may be cast upon him.

I understand that Commmodore Perry came here to see the Secretary of the Navy, and urge upon him the importance of securing the supply of coal from persons of such undoubted respectability as that there could be no possibility of a failure to deliver the coal at the proper place and time. It was thought to be all-important to the success of the expedition, and that it might be entirely prostrated, or at least paralyzed if the coal was not put in such a condition as to be obtained when wanted. He was therefore induced to make the arrangement which he did make, and undoubtedly the statement of Commodore Shubrick is correct, with Howland & Aspinwall. I believe their competency was undoubted. Their ability to comply with the contract, at the precise time necessary for the delivery of coal, was unquestioned. But in addition to that, the Secretary then informed me, and I do not think that I am mistaken, that after examining the whole subject, the conclusion was arrived at that the operation would be quite as economical as that in the place of which it was substituted. Thus much I have thought proper to state, and I will say no more, because I understand there is a full report on the subject by the present Secretary of the Navy.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions offered by Mr. CLAYTON, on the 7th instant.

Mr. EVERETT. When the Senator from Delaware took his seat yesterday, I was desirous of catching the eye of the President, with the view of obtaining the floor to make a few remarks upon the subject which has been under discussion; and I should have been glad to have done so at that time. I did not succeed; and now by the courtesy of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who moved to postpone the subject, I have the opportunity of addressing you at this time. I am not desirous by any means of entering into the debate which has occupied the Senate during the past week. I presume it is hardly the expectation of the Senate that that debate should extend beyond those gentlemen who have been necessarily drawn into it. Being however, sir, under the impression that if the debate should close here altogether, it would leave a somewhat painful and unsatisfactory impression upon the public mind in reference to the state of things in Central America, so far as we are concerned; and having had the honor, not long ago, in another capacity, to submit a communication to the President, which was transmitted to Congress, in reference to this subject, I am desirous, and I think it would be perhaps in some degree for the public interest, that some further explanation should be made in reference to the state of things in Central America at this time, so far as we are connected with it.

In doing this, which is really the principal, and I may say almost the only object which I have in view in claiming the attention of the Senate for a short time, I shall wish to make some reference to the proposition of the 30th of April last, which it was the object of the Senator from Delaware to get before the Senate. Inasmuch, therefore, as the Senate has made a special order for this day, for the election of certain officers of the Senate, it would be an accommodation to me, and I think also to the Senate, if the Senate would consent, by general acquiescence, to pass the resolutions of the Senator from Delaware. I understand it was his expectation in moving them, that the second resolution would require considerable time to meet it; that the answer would not come before the next session. It is a call for general information in reference to the affairs of Central America. But with reference to the first resolution, which calls for an answer with regard to the proposition of the 30th of April, it can be answered in half an hour, if it is the pleasure of the President. The papers can be sent in to the Senate to-morrow or the next day, and they can be referred to without inconvenience or impropriety, and it would be an accommodation to me that that should be the case before I proceed to address the Senate as I shall wish to do on the subject. I have consulted the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in reference to this matter, and he approves of the course which I suggest. I therefore respectfully ask that the resolutions of the Senator from Delaware be passed for the object that I have stated. The proposition of the 30th of April should be communicated to the Senate, and when we get that, the discussion of the subject can be resumed, if such is the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. MASON. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts did me the honor to confer with me this morning on the expediency of passing the first resolution offered by the Senator from Delaware, in order to bring before the Senate the information to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers, and very properly refers, as pertinent to the subject under debate. It refers to the message of the President of the United States of the 18th of February last, communicating the correspondence of the British Minister in reference to the affairs of Costa Rica and Nicaragua. That letter has been referred to in the Senate in a general way; but the information is not before us, and cannot be brought before us without the adoption of this resolution. I submit, therefore, cheerfully to the request of the Senator, that the Senate should pass the first resolution. The second resolution, before it is passed, I think should be altered so as very much to enlarge the scope of it.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia asks for a division of the question. The question will be on the adoption of the first resolution.

The first resolution, which is as follows, was adopted:

"Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested, if compatible, in his opinion, with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate the propositions mentioned in the letter of the Secretary of State accompanying the Executive message to the Senate of the 18th February last, as having been agreed upon by the Department of State, the British Minister, and the State of Costa Rica, on the 30th of April, 1852, having for their object the settlement of the territorial controversies between the States and Governments bordering on the river San Juan."

Mr. EVERETT. I now move a further postponement of the consideration of this subject until Monday next.

Mr. BADGER. I would suggest to the Chair whether, as these two resolutions were offered as one subject, the postponement of one would not carry the whole subject with it—the first resolution as well as the second?

The PRESIDENT. They can be divided by unanimous consent. The first resolution is adopted, and the question is on postponing the further consideration of the second.

Mr. MASON. I have no desire to interfere with the proposition of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts; but I entertained the idea that we should be able to adjourn on Monday next, sine die.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no; we cannot do that.

Mr. MASON. I submit the suggestion that the consideration of the subject be postponed until Saturday.

Mr. EVERETT. I have no objection.

Mr. MASON. I make that motion to test the sense of the Senate.

Mr. SHIELDS. It will be utterly impossible to do that. There is business of the Senate which requires that we should sit longer than until next Monday. I do not think it will be possible to adjourn at that time.

Mr. MASON. To test the sense of the Senate, I move to postpone the resolution until Saturday.

Mr. BADGER. I move to amend the motion by inserting Monday instead of Saturday.

Mr. BADGER's motion was agreed to.

PAY AND MILEAGE OF DAVID L. YULEE.

The Senate then took up for consideration the resolution submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 7th instant, to allow per diem and mileage to David L. Yulee during the time he contested the seat of Mr. MALLORY.

"Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to the Hon. David L. Yulee, a sum equal to the amount of mileage and per diem compensation of a Senator, from the commencement of the first session of the Thirty-second Congress to the 27th of August, 1852, the day on which the Senate decided that the Hon. Stephen R. Mallory, whose seat in the Senate was claimed by him, was duly elected a member of the Senate from the State of Florida."

Mr. MORTON. All I can say in advocacy of the resolution is this: I only ask for my former colleague that justice or liberality which has heretofore been given to persons in similar cases. It is the custom of this and the other House to pay the persons who contest a seat the per diem and mileage for the proper time.

Mr. BRIGHT. I do not know that I wish to be considered in the attitude of opposing the resolution; but as I was chairman of the committee that had charge of the contested-election case, I think it is my duty to remind the Senate that the committee unanimously reported against the right of Mr. Yulee to a seat here, and the Senate as unanimously confirmed that report. Now, if it is the pleasure of the Senate to pay the mileage and per diem under such circumstances, I shall not object; but I desire the Senate before they vote, to know that the committee were unanimous in reporting against the right of Mr. Yulee, and the Senate, without a dissenting voice, on the call of the yeas and nays, confirmed the report.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to say, and the Senate will recollect, that I wished a postponement of this question, that I might have an opportunity of examining it, and making a speech upon it. The examination I had given the subject convinced me, so far as it had gone, that there was great plausibility in the claim of Mr. Yulee, and I was inclined to think at that time—and I believe no man can doubt—that he believed he was entitled to a seat, and prosecuted his claim to it in good faith. No one that knows him can doubt that he believed that. And when a Senator prosecutes a claim in good faith, I have yet to learn that the Senate have ever declined to make such compensation as is asked by this resolution. If I recollect right, we have within this year paid a gentleman who did not claim a seat, or assert his right to it. It is true there were members of the Senate who thought him entitled to a seat, although he did not claim it. He set up no claim whatever. I believe there has not been a case in the history of the Government, where there has been a contest, in which the party who lost his seat has not been paid. Certainly we have not refused to pay where there has been no imputation that the contest was not made in good faith.

Mr. MASON. I think it due to the occasion to say, as I was a member of the select committee on the subject, that although that committee, as suggested by the honorable Senator from Indiana, was unanimous in the judgment to which they ultimately came, after a full examination of the subject, and although, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the committee, the purely legal question was against Mr. Yulee, yet there can be as little doubt that the gentleman honestly entertained the very opposite opinion to the committee; and it was evinced, by the degree of perseverance—industrious perseverance—on his part to bring the subject to a favorable result. He pressed the case very strongly, and with an earnestness which showed the honesty of his intention, and his desire to have the question properly determined. He employed, and had before the committee, gentlemen of the bar very elevated in their position and of great distinction, and he must have incurred a serious expense. So that although the opinion of the committee was against him, as well as the opinion of the Senate, yet, in my judgment, the Senate should give him the compensation which this resolution proposes to give.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Yulee represented a State that is a neighboring one to my own. I know him very well; and while my judgment from the beginning was decidedly against him, yet if it had been a question depending entirely upon common-law principles, he would have succeeded. And when I attended before the committee, and heard the arguments made by eminent counsel whom he employed, I know there were many friends who changed their opinion, who were of opinion that Mr. Yulee was right. I must say another thing, that so far as regards that discussion, many important principles were discussed, and I think settled—settled by the judgment of the Senate. Certainly, they were presented forcibly by arguments; and I am satisfied that Mr. Yulee's perseverance—his tenacity of purpose everybody knows—upon that occasion, evinced what the Senator from Illinois says, that he was conducting this protest against the honorable Senator who fills the seat, in good faith. In that view, I am reconciled to the resolution.

Mr. BADGER. As I was on the Select Committee, and concurred entirely in its report, and from the first examination of the case, and after the arguments, could find nothing on which to hang a doubt, I think it proper to add a word to what has been said by the Senator from Virginia. I think he is certainly correct. However clear may have been the judgment of the committee and the Senate, the gentleman who was claiming the seat was firmly convinced that he was entitled to it. And there is another consideration which weighs with me. He was asserting that claim, not with the view of procuring the seat for himself in this body, but to vindicate what he believed to be a constitutional principle and the right of the State of Florida; for he declared himself unequivocally, that that being his object and his sole object, if the vote of the Senate should award the seat to him, he would not take it, but would refer the matter again to the judgment of the Legislature of Florida. It being a case, then, of a gentleman, who, however mistaken, was yet sincere, and who though prosecuting the contest with zeal and energy and at great trouble and expense, was not seeking anything for himself, either of honor or of profit, but a mere vindication of what he believed to be a legal, constitutional truth, and the right of his State, I think it is but fair and just to pay him the compensation. I hope, therefore, the resolution will be agreed to.

Mr. BRIGHT. I did not mean to intimate by the remarks which I made when first up, that I doubted the sincerity of the contestant in the case referred to. I have no doubt that he believed he was honestly entitled to the place, and believed that at common-law he was entitled to the seat. He prosecuted it, as stated by the Senator from North Carolina, with the view as he said of settling a great principle; and if it be the pleasure of the Senate, under these circumstances, to award him the pay and mileage which belong to a sitting member of this body, I certainly raise no objection. I have my doubts, however, as to the propriety of such a result.

It is a very different case from the one referred to by the Senator from Illinois. I suppose he referred to the case of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Meriwether,) who, I understand, has not taken the pay awarded to him under the order of the Senate, but clearly would be entitled to take it if he thought proper to do so. That, I say, was a very different case from this. There are many gentlemen in this body yet who think that he was entitled to the seat; that the limitation imposed by the Governor of the State of Kentucky in the pro tem. appointment given by him, was a limitation not within his power to make; that he had power to fill the vacancy for the full time and not for the time limited in the appointment. In this instance, however,—but I am not going into the case; it has been settled—Senators understand why it was Mr. Yulee claimed the seat. He alleged that twenty-nine blank votes elected him. That was the point in a few words. With the honorable Senator from North Carolina, I never believed that he had the color of a claim, nor did I suppose at the time the case was disposed of, that he would assert his right to the compensation resulting from the prosecution of his claim; but if it is the pleasure of the Senate to give it to him, be it so.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall vote for this resolution, upon the ground that when Mr. Yulee presented his objections to the sitting member, I was uncertain whether the election of the sitting member was valid or not. The objections were such as at least, in my opinion, called for a legislative investigation. The result of the investigation removed all doubt in my mind, as it did in the mind of every other Senator. I am sure that there was such a question in the way of the sitting member, that, to do justice to the State of Florida, it was necessary to examine it. Now, I think there would have been no such investigation if it had not been brought about by Mr. Yulee; and it was his right to bring it about. I think, under such circumstances, it was his duty to bring it up; and having brought it up, he certainly ought, according to the past practice of the Senate, to receive some compensation.

Mr. ADAMS. When this resolution was first offered by the Senator from Florida, I opposed it, and I have seen no reason since to change my opinion. I then thought, and I still think, that if an individual thinks proper to contest the seat of a member elected by his State Legislature, he has a right to do so; but he should do it at his own hazard, unless the grounds for the contest are so plausible as to produce some division of opinion in the body. It is known that the Senate gave to Mr. Yulee a most patient investigation. They gave him a committee of this body—a learned and wise committee. That committee heard his counsel, and after every Senator had made up his mind, he was permitted to appear at the bar and make a speech of two hours at the close of the session when our appropriation bills were in danger, and when every Senator, notwithstanding his respect to him personally, had so completely made up his mind that there were few listening to his argument, and then after having consumed that period of anxiety and excitement, the liberty was extended to him to consume another hour; and after all that, not one single member of the body voted to give him his seat.

If, sir, we set this down as a precedent, where the claim was so fallacious as not to be able to get one man out of sixty-two to vote for it, and we should pay him for the entire session, we may as well pass a resolution that whoever runs against another and is defeated and contests the seat, shall be paid a per diem and mileage for the first session, and that will save the trouble of the Senate investigating each claim. What propriety, I ask Senators, is there in allowing Mr. Yulee pay, simply because he thought proper to prefer a claim to the seat of an individual elected to this body? I can see none. I know the House of Representatives has been in the habit, where a contest was plausible, and a doubt was entertained, and a difference of opinion prevailed in regard to the right, to refer it to a committee for investigation, and when the conclusion had been arrived at to pay both. I know that upon many occasions when this question has been determined in favor of one over the other claimant, where there was a doubt, and where it was thought right and proper that the question should be brought before the body, they have been paid. But, where the decision is unanimous, that the claim is an unfounded one, I can see no propriety in making the payment. If we do that, every man who thinks proper to do so, may come here and set up a claim, and although he may have the unanimous vote against him, he must have his mileage and per diem. He may stave off the decision the whole of the session, and go home and attend to his business and come back here at the end of a session of nine months, and obtain pay for the whole time. It may seem to some to be a matter of no consequence, but the principle involved is an important one, and we should properly decide it.

Mr. MORTON. It is perhaps due to myself and to my late colleague that I should here say a word. During the pendency of the contest before the Senate between my late and my present colleague, I studiously avoided participating in it in any form or shape. The acts and doings of my Legislature were passed in review before the Senate; but propriety on my part, I thought, required that I should not participate in the contest so long as it assumed no broader ground than the contest between the two gentlemen. In truth, the questions involved were constitutional and parliamentary questions, which I did not think myself qualified to decide; and I was willing that they should be decided by the able parliamentarians and constitutional lawyers elected by the Senate to decide the question. They, after nine months' consideration, decided that question, in which decision the Senate acquiesced. I have not a word to say in opposition to the decision. My situation was a delicate one. My relations were of the most friendly character towards both gentlemen. They both belong to a different party organization from the one to which I belong; and of course my vote on such a question could not have been controlled by a consideration of that kind. But I think it due to my late colleague, who now stands in the position of a constituent to me, that I should say here to the Senate, as most Senators who know him will believe, that he honestly and religiously believed that he was entitled to the seat which he demanded; that he believed it involved a high constitutional question which should be decided by the Senate; that he was not influenced by any sordid or mercenary motives in prosecuting the contest; that nothing of the kind had influenced him, but that he honestly believed that he was entitled to the seat.

As to the allusion which the Senator from Mississippi makes to the time during which the contest was pending before the Senate, the committee will bear me out in saying that it was no fault of my late colleague. The Senate will recollect the constitution of that committee; that after it was first appointed, some three or four were called home and vacated their seats, and other members had to be appointed. My late colleague was anxious that a prompt decision should be had; every courtesy was extended to him. He was heard before the committee and before the Senate. It is true he was heard, as the Senator from Mississippi said; but, if I may use an Irish bull, he was heard but not listened to. It was too near the close of the session for the Senate to attempt to review and pass judgment upon the decision of the committee.

I have felt bound in justice to my late colleague to say this. I think he was operated upon by no mercenary views and motives whatever. If he had been he would have gained nothing, for I doubt not that the loss of time, which was valuable to him, and the expenses incurred in the prosecution of his claim will not be covered by the amount of compensation proposed to be given him by this resolution.

Mr. BORLAND. I shall vote for this resolution, as I think all such resolutions have heretofore been adopted, so far as I can learn, both in the Senate and in the House of Representatives, without any reference to the question involved as affecting the right of the sitting member, or the one who lost his seat. All that I understand has been looked to in the action of either House, in settling a question of this kind is, Did the individual act in good faith in prosecuting his claim?

Mr. ADAMS. I will explain what I understand to be the case. Formerly, when an individual claimed the seat of the sitting member, and the sitting member was ousted, then the sitting member, and the one entitled to the seat were both paid. That was the custom for some time. More recently, I admit, the course mentioned by the Senator has been followed.

Mr. BORLAND. I am not thoroughly informed on this subject; but so far as I do know, there has never been an instance when the per diem and mileage has been refused. I have never heard of an instance.

A SENATOR. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. BORLAND. The Senator says I am mistaken. I am aware that my information is not perhaps as extensive as that of other Senators; but I am not aware of an instance. I think I may speak confidently in saying there has been no instance in the proceedings of the Senate.

But, Mr. President, something has been said with regard to the unanimous decision of the Senate upon the contested question—that there was no difference of opinion in the committee or in the Senate. It is true, that was the result; but we all know—nothing is better known—that in the beginning of that contest, and for a long time during its pendency, there was great doubt in the minds of gentlemen—very great doubt. I know that while some Senators doubted, others were of the opinion that Mr. Yulee was entitled to his seat, but who changed their minds after the investigation was had, and voted the other way. And some gentlemen did not vote at all, because, as they alleged at the time, the report of the committee had not been long enough before the Senate to enable members to examine it for themselves, and consider all the questions which were presented. I know several, myself among them, who failed to vote for that reason. Sir, nobody doubted, I apprehend, that Mr. Yulee prosecuted his claim in good faith, whatever may be their opinion of his judgment in the matter. I know further that before he commenced the prosecution of it, he consulted a great many Senators; that he took the opinion of a number of Senators, learned and experienced. While some expressed the opinion that he was entitled to the seat, hardly any whom he consulted failed to say there were plausible grounds in his favor, and really no good reason for supposing a good claim might not be made out. He undertook the prosecution of it, after consultation and advice; and I am satisfied upon as honest convictions as any man ever entertained that he was entitled to the seat.

Now, sir, with regard to the case quoted by the Senator from Illinois, and by the Senator from Indiana, (the Kentucky case,) it makes no difference whether the gentleman claimed his right to a seat or not. The Senate voted, I believe unanimously, that he, without contesting his seat, without even asserting his right to it, should have the per diem and mileage. It was supposed by many that there was a great principle involved, which was brought before the Senate to be settled. And in consideration of that fact, and because it was not one of those cases pressed before the Senate in a factious spirit, or for any personal advantage to the individual, the Senate awarded the per diem and mileage, acknowledging that it was convinced that he was entitled to it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not desire to occupy the time of the Senate, but I will take the liberty for calling for the yeas and nays on the question. I think there is no analogy between this case and the case referred to by the Senator from Arkansas, the Kentucky case. There was a division of sentiment in the Senate in relation to that case, and it was argued here by Senators. In the case of Mr. Yulee, so far as I recollect, there was no discussion in the Senate, nor any speeches made except by the contestant. I believe he convinced no one of anything except that his zeal extended only to an anxiety to displace the sitting member. However that was, and however zealous he might have been in the advocacy of constitutional principles, and however strong his desire might be to maintain them, I could not pretend to say; but it was very singular that the Senate should unanimously concur in the opinion that he was not entitled to a seat, and that he alone, when the facts were understood, as they must have been, should believe that he was entitled to a seat, and that the sitting member was not. Whatever expense may have accrued from the employment of counsel, Mr. President, forms no part of the consideration with me. I do not know how other gentlemen regard the system of receiving counsel before the committees in the argument of cases; but for myself, it is a system that I would not encourage. If trials are to go on in committee rooms, and the committees are to give audience to the counsel that go there for the purpose of litigating cases, there will be no end to it. I understand the gentlemen of the Senate to have sufficient capacity, especially such as constituted that committee, to arrive at sensible and just conclusions upon any subject, and to be able to make a decision as learned and sensible and just, as if they had all the able legal counsel in the United States to argue the case before them. It is the case in both branches of the National Legislature, that counsel are received and the cases tried pro and con in the case of impeachment, which are always ex parte; and the body acts as an inquest, and a special trial takes place, and no conclusions ever can be arrived at, because days are consumed just by the presentation of counsel and elaborate arguments. The cases here in this Senate, and if I understand it, in the House of Representatives also, are to be prepared for investigation in committees, and presented in the body where the trial in chief takes place.

If the gentleman in whose behalf this resolution has been introduced was the only human being mistaken in a case, the facts of which he must have misunderstood, his judgment certainly must have been very defective, and I think that if the rejection of this resolution would operate to rebuke gentlemen under similar circumstances, it ought to be rejected. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRODHEAD. As the yeas and nays are called, I beg leave to say that I think the honorable Senator from Texas misunderstands the true point in the case. He seems to think that it was a question of fact, and that Mr. Yulee should have ascertained that fact as well as the members of this body. If I recollect the case it was a question of law, and one with regard to which I doubted very much. The only question now to be decided is, as to the intentions and motives of Mr. Yulee. If he came here in good faith to bring that great question to the notice of the Senate, as he did with great ability, then, according to the usage of the Senate, he ought to be paid, and no invidious distinction should be made against him. Believing, as I do, that he came here in good faith, and knowing that he labored assiduously to get an early decision of the question, I shall most cheerfully vote for the resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania misapprehends me entirely. I did not state that it was a mere question of fact which was to be tried by the committee. It was a matter of law, as I understood it, and it was referred to a most select and judicious committee of gentlemen learned in the law, perhaps quite as much so as the gentleman who claimed the seat, or as the counsel he introduced before the committee, and equally competent to arrive at a just decision. It was a matter of principle that they could investigate as well as the fact. I do not think any evidence was introduced to sustain the claim of the applicant to the seat. I never heard there were any facts in the case but those which were admitted by all parties, and it was strictly a matter of constitutional law which they had to decide. In arriving at a conclusion, they had as many lights before the committee as could be furnished by the most able counsel, and were just as competent to decide the case correctly as after all the elaborate arguments of the counsel upon the subject. I cannot suppose that it was because it was a principle contended for by the gentleman, and that principle was in itself absurd, without any reason or foundation, we should vote an appropriation for his benefit, if he misapprehended a principle of law; for he was a learned jurist himself, and ought to have understood it. If his anxiety extended no further than merely to have a constitutional principle investigated and decided, the committee were competent to do that; and if he employed counsel, it was extraneous to the necessities of the case entirely, and I cannot vote for the resolution, either to cover the contingency of his attendance or for the employment of counsel.

Mr. WALKER. I shall vote for this resolution, and I believe the Senate would make an invidious distinction in the case of Mr. Yulee if they refuse to adopt it. It is claimed here that Mr. Yulee, for the principle for which he was contending, was negatived or decided against by a unanimous vote of the Senate. I do not remember precisely how the vote stood. If my recollection however serves me properly, the record will show that the number by which it was settled against him was a very small list of members; that there were a great many who did not vote at all, a great many who at the time had not made up their minds, and did not wish to be committed upon the record. I believe it will be found that I did not vote at all; and to this day, I must say, that whatever I may feel as to persons, I have extreme doubts in regard to the principle contended for by Mr. Yulee. What was it? It was a thing that affects us in the western and northwestern States, where the township system of government prevails, where the people come out and are called upon to say who they want for officers. Suppose a man is put in nomination, and there are twenty-nine who vote for him by name, and there are twenty-nine others present who cry out to the chairman of the board "Blank;" what, sir, would be the duty of the man sitting as chairman of the board, and of the board itself? To declare that there was no election? If that were so declared in eight cases out of ten an election might be prevented. Here is a plain case which comes practically to the mind of every man who comes from a State where the township system prevails.

This might be a practical question in those cases, and I must say, to this day my mind is not clear upon the point; and when gentlemen arise here and pronounce the principle raised as absurd, it seems to me they do not reflect upon the length to which the matter might be carried. It was a majority of the Senate I believe who voted unanimously that there was nothing in this thing. That is the way Mr. Mallory took his seat. There is no one more gratified to associate with that gentleman than myself. He represents his State most ably, and in social life is all that we could ask of him. But it is not a question as between the present sitting member and the one who contested his right. It is a principle that runs into the law of election; and it is one, I will venture to say if you bring it up in a different way, the Senate is not at this day prepared to determine. I do not agree, therefore, with those who pronounce this thing an absurdity.

If this be the state of the case, where was Mr. Yulee's fault? I believe this is the state of the case; and the record will show that there was far from being a unanimity in the body by an affirmative voice in favor of the absurdity of Mr. Yulee's position. The Senate was thin at the time, if I recollect aright, and by no means all who were present voted on the question. They were not satisfied with regard to the matter. The subject, however, is not now before the Senate. I am willing to bow to their decision. But this thing might come up with some phases that would leave the Senate exceedingly embarrassed to decide it. This, then, was the position of Mr. Yulee. He was contending for a principle of law, and contending for that alone; for as it resulted, really he was not contending for the seat for the purpose of occupying it; and I must say it would look a little hard to him, after he has persevered in the matter, as he did apparently with candor, with sincerity, and with magnanimous views, that he should now be turned off entirely, and told not only that he was voted and expelled as it were, by the unanimous vote of the Senate, but that it also should be said to him, contrary I believe to almost every other case that has ever come before the Senate, that he was not entitled to its consideration at all, so far as having a portion of the expenses with which he was embarrassed, paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate. It is in that point of view I look at the matter. He was our honorable associate in Congress. He occupied an honorable position in this body. We then fellowshipped with him. We looked upon him as one who represented, and represented well, the interests of Florida. Whether Florida considered her interests as well represented by him or not, I do not know, but we considered him as an efficient member, and in social life he was a gentleman.

We never saw him in a debauch. We never saw him degrade himself below the position of a gentleman. We always found him a kind, courteous, and affable gentleman; and it does look to me a little hard that when he is not here, when he is no longer before us, that we should in this manner turn the cold shoulder to him, and not be willing to do for him what we always do in such cases. I do not let my recollections go in this manner. I remember that man with kindly recollection. I found him here when I came here. There are few in this Senate who were here then; and I shall continue to remember him in the kindly relations of social life, as a gentleman; one who for the time being, occupied a respectable and honorable seat here; and when gentlemen assert that the position which he took in this contest was absurd, they will, I think, have some abatement of their zeal and earnestness in that assertion, when they reflect into how many channels the doctrine for which Mr. Yulee was contending may run. I think that we ought, in justice to Mr. Yulee, vote this compensation. I shall be glad to see it done.

Mr. BRIGHT. I can say, in all sincerity, that my recollections of the late Senator from Florida are of the same character with those mentioned by the Senator from Wisconsin; but a sense of public duty often compels legislators to forget personal feelings, and that is the case with myself in this instance. If I were to consult my own personal feelings, I would vote out of the public Treasury the amount of compensation and mileage proposed to be appropriated by the resolution under consideration. But, sir, my sense of public duty, as a legislator, prompts me to a different course. I have no anxiety to extend this debate, but I rise mainly to correct some remarks made by the Senator from Wisconsin.

He compares this to the case of a ballot before the people. There is no analogy whatever between the two cases. By a law of Florida, passed in 1844, no officer could be elected in the joint vote of the two Houses of her Legislature unless he received a majority of all the votes elected—not a majority of all the votes present, merely. To elect any gentleman a Senator, a judge of the circuit or district court, he must receive not merely a majority of the votes present, but a majority of the votes elected to the Legislature. Now, on the first ballot for a United States Senator, there being fifty-nine members in the two Houses, and there being fifty-eight votes in the joint meeting of the two Houses at that election—on the first ballot Mr. Yulee received twenty-nine, and "blank" received twenty-nine, one member being absent. The presiding officer declared that there was no election. A second, third, and fourth ballot were had with a like result. The convention adjourned until the following Monday, when the sitting member from Florida [Mr. Mallory] received thirty-one votes, and was declared duly elected, came here, was sworn in, and took his seat. Now, what did Mr. Yulee contend for? That the twenty-nine votes he received elected him. Why? Because the twenty-nine votes given for "blank" were not legal votes, entitled to be recognized by law. Perhaps he might have been correct, according to the common-law principle, if there had not been a statutory enactment staring him in the face, which made it a clear proposition, that by the laws of Florida no man could be elected to any offices indicated in the law, who did not, as I remarked before, receive a majority of all the votes elected to the Legislature. That was the point upon which the committee decided the case, and that was the point understood by the Senate when they ratified that report.

I do not propose, however, to extend my remarks upon the subject. As I remarked before, I do not wish to be considered as standing out alone against the payment of this modicum of money, perhaps two or three thousand dollars, to Mr. Yulee. If I believed he had a right to it, I would vote for it. If I consulted my personal feelings I would vote for it; but I believe the precedent would be a wrong one to set, and I believe he had no color of claim to the seat; and in that view I shall take the responsibility of voting against the resolution, notwithstanding the personal relations in which I stood to Mr. Yulee.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. As I shall perhaps be in a small minority in voting against this resolution, I desire to say a word or two in reference to it. Both in this House and in the other branch of Congress, it seems to me there has grown up a great abuse in reference to this thing of paying gentlemen who contest seats. The common-law notion is, that he who sets up a false clamor, whether it be in an action of ejectment for land, or in regard to personal property, if he fails to establish his right, he is amerced, and gets no mercy for his false clamor. A man is returned to either House of Congress. The presumption of the law is that the certifying and returning officers have done their duty. By the presumption of common sense and the common-law, the man returned by them is supposed to be the man entitled to his seat. A gentleman chooses to contest it. When he makes that contest, and, after a fair trial, loses it, and it is decided that he is not entitled to it—but one man is entitled to the per diem, the mileage, and the perquisites, whatever they be, you duplicate the pay for a contest which has delayed you in time, and caused you various other expenses; and thus, instead of letting the common-law notion prevail, you turn round and say that you will pay him for contesting a seat which you yourselves say he was not entitled to. If a man chooses to contest a seat, let him do it at his peril. I do not believe in the public policy of remunerating a man for coming here to contest a seat which you, by your own judgment, decide by the law of the land that he is not entitled to. It looks very much like belonging to that branch of the law pertaining to barratry and champerty., It does not look like the straight-forward, Anglo-Saxon notion about the stirrers-up of litigation. I say this without reference to the parties in the two cases which have been alluded to.

In the other branch of Congress I for some time belonged to the Committee on Elections. We had various contests and various controversies; and I regret to say that almost universally in the committee and in the House, the opinion of the members upon the legal question affecting the right of the member, went with the party, not by the law. A large volume of contested-election cases was given to us to enlighten us upon that subject. It contained precedents that were never followed, never looked after. We had there year after year contested-election cases as you begin to have them now in the Senate; and I insist the only way to discourage the thing, is to decide that one man is a Senator and entitled to the emoluments and to the pay; and that whoever undertakes to contest the seat of a member and fails should suffer for his false clamors. That will stop contested-election cases. I have read a vast number of these precedents. I remember when quite a young lawyer, the celebrated case of the contested election of Moore and Letcher of Kentucky. The other branch of Congress, after deliberating eight or ten months, and giving both parties the mileage and per diem, decided, although somebody must have been elected, that there was no election, and it was referred to the people. They could not count the votes, I suppose, and both came back and had a second race. This thing of putting it under the head of courtesy and compliment; this thing of saying that the man who contests is to be paid for it; that he does it for mere patriotism, is, in my judgment, all wrong. Malus usus abolendus est. While I am here, I will vote for no such claim.

The Senator from Indiana has said that a late Senator from Kentucky declared that he would not take the pay voted to him. I mean to say nothing harsh of that Senator or of Mr. Yulee; but as I understood the thing in Kentucky, the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Meriwether) came here not contesting the seat. By its own mere motion voluntarily, without any claim or pretense, the Senate gave him a sort of pension, voted the mileage and per diem to that gentleman until the time when the case was decided. The Senator from Maryland tells me that instead of the Senator from Indiana being correct, Mr. Meriwether has received the pay. Am I mistaken or not? The gentleman says I am right. Where is this thing to stand? I say that taking cases as they come up here, not to say anything harsh against either of the gentlemen, it would be an encouragement for contestants to come to this body and to the other branch of Congress and claim seats. The old common-law doctrine is, let the man have the seat and its perquisites and profits who is entitled to them, and then the man who by the judgment of the proper tribunal fails in his claim, let him go out of court and take nothing by his declaration. I shall vote against the resolution, while towards Mr. Meriwether and Mr. Yulee I have nothing but the kindest feelings. In my judgment it is impolitic to sanction such a principle.

Mr. ADAMS. If the Senate is prepared to vote, I have no objection; but if the debate is to continue, we have a special order for the election of our officers.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote now.

Mr. ADAMS. I just wish to say that no one has said aught against Mr. Yulee personally.

Mr. PETTIT. Not being advised upon this question sufficient to do justice either way, I ask to be excused from voting.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator will be excused, if there is no objection.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Borland, Brodhead, Butler, Cooper, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Everett, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hunter, James, Jones of Iowa, Mason, Morton, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Soulé, Sumner, and Walker—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Atherton, Bayard, Benjamin, Bright, Chase, Geyer, Hamlin, Houston, Norris, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Weller, and Wright—19.

So the resolution was adopted.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived which the Senate set apart for the election of certain officers of the Senate.

Mr. ADAMS. If I have the unanimous consent of the Senate, I move that Asbury Dickins be elected Secretary, Dunning R. McNair Sergeant-at-Arms, and Isaac Holland Doorkeeper.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will move to postpone the execution of the order until Monday next. I presume there will be no objection to that motion.

Several SENATORS. This hour has been fixed upon for proceeding to the election.

Mr. ADAMS. I hope we may have a vote on my proposition.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is no absolute necessity for proceeding with the election to-day, and if it lies over until Monday it will produce no difficulty. We ought to have an Executive session.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I hope the motion of the Senator from Illinois will not prevail. I hope the Senate will proceed to the execution of its order, adopted upon its deliberate judgment, which was a proceeding with which in the initiative or the consummation I had nothing to do. But the time has arrived for carrying it out, and I hope it will be done.

The motion to postpone was not agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS. I now ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to pursue the course which I suggested, that the persons whom I have named be unanimously elected.

Mr. SMITH. I think we ought to elect the officers of the Senate in the ordinary way.

The PRESIDENT. Objection being made, Senators will prepare their ballots.

The Senate then proceeded to ballot for the officers, with the following result:

For Secretary.

Whole number of votes cast		42
Of which Asbury Dickins received		37
B. B. French	"	4
Colonel Hickey	"	1

For Sergeant-at-Arms.

Whole number of votes cast		36
Of which Dunning R. McNair received		24
Robert Beale	"	5
Charles Jones	"	2
Mr. Holland	"	1
Blank	"	4

For Doorkeeper.

Whole number of votes cast		41
Of which Isaac Holland received		33
Blank	"	3
Sam'l J. Johnson	"	1
Charles Jones	"	1
Joshua Holland	"	2
Mr. Bassett	"	1

Mr. Dickins, Mr. McNair, and Mr. Holland, having been declared elected to the respective offices, the oath of office was administered to them by the President of the Senate.

RECESS.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BADGER. I think it was a little unkind for the Senator to submit that motion. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMLIN. I thought the Senator was not in the Chamber. I withdraw the motion to permit him to make it.

Mr. BADGER. I renew it; and wish to state a satisfactory reason why it should be agreed to, and why I intended, at the proper time, if the Senator had had patience, to submit the motion. To us on this side of the Chamber it is a matter of very slight importance to adjourn over; but it must be remembered that there are vastly important matters to be attended to connected with the business of the Senate which must interest a great many of our friends on the other side of the Chamber; and we shall actually hasten business by allowing them two or three days to make the preliminary arrangements.

Mr. WELLER called for the yeas and nays on the motion; and they were ordered.

Mr. PETTIT. I sincerely hope, for the reasons assigned by the Senator from North Carolina, that the motion will prevail. For one, I must say that I have been besought and begged by those for whom I have a great respect, to attend to some business for them; and I want to accommodate them, and see the heads of the Departments on their account. I have promised that as soon as I could get away from the Senate I would attend to their business, and I have almost promised some of them that if I could not get into the Departments I would take a mall and batter the doors down. I think I shall do that to-morrow. [Laughter.] That, of course, is in a figurative manner.

The question being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Bayard, Bright, Brodhead, Butler, Cooper, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Fitzpatrick, Hamlin, Jones of Iowa, Morton, Norris, Pettit, Rusk, Sebastian, Soulé, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Walker, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Benjamin, Borland, Chase, Evans, Everett, Geyer, Houston, Mason, Pearce, Seward, Shields, Smith, Sumner, Toucey, and Weller—16.

So the motion was agreed to.

THE LATE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate pay to Robert Beale, late Sergeant-at-Arms, the salary for the residue of the present year.

ADMITTANCE TO THE SENATE FLOOR.

Mr. FISH. I desire to call up the resolution which I submitted yesterday to amend the 48th rule of the Senate. It is to give to Senators the privilege of the floor.

The resolution was taken up for consideration.

Mr. SHIELDS. I move to amend the resolution by inserting in the rule before "members of either branch of Congress," the words "Secretaries and Clerks." The object of that is to admit ex-Secretaries of the Senate, and ex-Clerks of the House of Representatives, who have always been admitted on the floor of the Senate. I suppose it was an oversight on the part of the mover of the original resolution that it was not inserted.

Mr. FISH. I accept that.

Mr. PETTIT. I certainly am not in favor of that resolution. I had no idea that it would be taken up so soon. It would exclude a member of the other House from coming in here and taking his seat beside his Senator, to converse with him about matters of legislation. It ought not to be done. A member of the other House—not to say an ex-member—but a sitting member, during the session of Congress, ought to be at liberty to come in and take a seat beside his Senator to talk about any other matter mutually interesting to them and the country. The resolution is certainly too stringent on that point, and it is perhaps equally stringent and wrong in other respects. That is clearly wrong. A member from my State may want to come in and talk with me, and it would be more convenient for him to take a vacant seat beside me than for me to leave the Senate Chamber and go out with him.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know how he could take a seat beside the Senator, unless he would occupy some other Senator's seat, and that is the very thing I complain of in many instances.

The resolution was then adopted; and the rule, as amended, reads as follows:

The following persons, and none others, shall be admitted on the floor of the Senate: Members of the House of Representatives and their Clerk; the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Attorney General, and the Postmaster General; the Private Secretary of the President, chaplains to Congress, judges of the United States, foreign ministers and their secretaries; officers who by name have received, or shall hereafter receive, the thanks of Congress for their gallantry and good conduct in the service of their country, or who have received medals by a vote of Congress; the Governor for the time being of any State or Territory of the Union; the ex-Governors of the several States; the ex-officers of the Senate, such gentlemen as have been heads of Departments, or secretaries and clerks and members of either branch of Congress; persons who, for the time being, belong to the respective State and Territorial Legislatures, and persons belonging to such Legislatures of foreign Governments as are in amity with the United States.

No person except members and officers of the Senate shall be admitted at either of the side doors of the Senate Chamber, and all persons claiming admission on the floor, excepting members and the Clerk of the House of Representatives for the time being, the heads of the several Departments, the Private Secretary of the President, the chaplains to Congress, the judges of the United States, foreign ministers and their secretaries, and officers who by name shall have received the thanks of Congress, or medals by a vote of Congress, shall, each time before being admitted upon the floor, enter their names, together with the official position in right of which they claim admission, in a book to be provided and kept at the main entrance to the Senate Chamber; and no person except members of the Senate shall be allowed within the bar of the Senate, or to occupy the seat of any Senator.

NAVAL DEPÔT IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BADGER submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inquire whether it will not be advantageous to the Government of the United States to establish a naval depôt at Beaufort in North Carolina, and report to the Senate at the next session.

RINGGOLD'S COAST OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to purchase one thousand copies of Ringgold's maps, charts, and sailing directions of the coast of California, for the use of the Senate: Provided, The price shall not exceed four dollars per copy.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, March 21, 1853.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

On motion by Mr. BAYARD, it was Ordered, That Santiago E. Arquillo have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. SEBASTIAN, it was Ordered, That one thousand extra copies of the report of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs in California be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. WALKER, by direction of a majority of the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and they are hereby, authorized to delegate one of their number to proceed, during the ensuing recess of Congress, to take testimony in the matter now on reference to said committee, touching certain frauds alleged to have been committed by Alexander Ramsay and others, in making payment of moneys to certain bands of the Sioux Indians; and that the member of said committee so to be delegated have power to proceed to such points as may be necessary, and to send for persons and papers, and swear witnesses, and take their testimony, and certify the same with other proofs to said committee for their report thereon at the next session of Congress.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the same extra compensation be allowed to the Superintendent of Printing and the clerks and messenger under him, as is paid by the resolution of the Senate to other clerks and messengers of a similar grade.

Mr. MORTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and required to purchase for the use of the Senate five hundred copies of the work entitled "Naval Dry Docks of the United States;" and also five hundred copies of the work entitled "Naval and Mail Steamers of the United States," by the Engineer-in-Chief of the United States Navy: Provided, The first work does not exceed ten dollars per copy, and the latter five dollars per copy.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, which was submitted by Mr. CLAYTON on the 7th instant:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the Senate such information as it may be in the power of his Department to furnish, in regard to the conflicting claims of Great Britain and the State of Honduras to the Islands of Roatan, Bonacca, Utilla, Barbarat, Helene, and Morat, in or near the Bay of Honduras."

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. President, it has not been my intention, as I had the honor to state to the Senate on Thursday last, to engage in the debate which has been conducted with so much ability in this place, during the last eight or ten days.

It was quite natural, in fact it was unavoidable, that the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] after returning to the Senate, of which for twenty-four years he had been one of the brightest ornaments, should be desirous of availing himself of the first opportunity of vindicating the negotiation of the treaty of the 19th of April, 1850, which was conducted by him under the direction of President Taylor. It was not less a matter of course that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. MASON,] and that the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] who had taken part in the debates of the last session, should reply to the statements of the honorable Senator from Delaware. But, for my own part, my humble connection with the affairs of Central America is much more recent and slight. Entirely a stranger to the negotiation of the treaty, and not less a stranger to the debate which took place in this Chamber in the early part of the last session, I should have considered it rather obtrusive to throw myself into the discussion of the general subjects which have been controverted with so much ability by the gentlemen to whom I have just alluded. I will also take the liberty to say, that when I took my place upon this floor about three weeks ago—and I consider it the highest honor of my public life that I have been permitted to have a seat here—I came here in such a state of complete exhaustion, bodily and mental, after the fatigues of the last winter in another capacity, that I felt myself altogether indisposed to any considerable mental exertion.

But the discussion that has taken place in reference to the history of past events has connected itself with the present condition of affairs in Central America, toward which my attention has been recently called. A communication was made to he Department of State in the early part of February by the Minister of the British Government, at Washington, with the express intimation of a wish that the purport of that communication should in some proper public form come before the Government of the United States. That was done through the medium of a report from the Department of State to the President, of the 16th of February, which was by him sent to the two Houses on the 18th of the same month. That communication seemed to me to afford an opportunity of making a new effort, with considerable prospect of success, to bring all the difficult controverted matters in that quarter to an amicable and desirable issue. It seemed to me particularly to suggest the propriety of putting our diplomatic relations with Central America upon a better and more efficient footing than they have stood upon for some time past. This suggestion was made by me to the President; it was approved by him, was by him submitted to Congress, and has been honored by their sanction, the two Houses having made the requisite appropriation for a full minister to be sent by this Government to the States of Central America, to reside at either or any of the capitals of those States, respectively, as he may think expedient, and thus to be able to bring to bear all the influence of his character and station in reconciling the difficulties which exist between those Republics, and bringing the questions at issue between them and us to an amicable settlement.

There are other circumstances which led me to suppose that this was a propitious moment for making this effort; and it does seem to me, from the character of the recent debate, that if it should now finally terminate without any allusion to those circumstances, it would, as I stated last Thursday, leave upon the public mind, not only an incorrect, but a somewhat painful impression as to the real state of affairs in that part of the world, and our connection with them; that the country would be alarmed with the idea that the state of affairs is more critical in that quarter than it really is. To rectify this impression is the main object of my addressing the Senate at this time.

Before I do this, I wish to make my acknowledgment to the distinguished Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] whom I do not at this moment see in his place, for the very complimentary notice he was pleased to take of the letter addressed by me on the 1st of December to the Ministers of France and England on the subject of the tripartite convention relating to Cuba. If I could think that he did not, in the warmth of the argument in which he was engaged, overstate the merits of that letter, I should certainly feel that, with the favorable notice taken of it by so distinguished a judge, my highest ambition as a public man ought to be satisfied. It was a subject of great difficulty, importance, and delicacy, dividing to some extent the opinions of the people, and it was my desire in that matter, to find out if possible, and to assert a line of principle and of policy which would be generally approved by the country; which would show that it was possible to reconcile the progressive spirit and tendency of the country and of the age with the preservation of the public faith, with the sanctity of the public honor, and with the dictates of an enlightened and liberal conservatism. This was the object which I had in view, and if I shall be thought in any degree to have attained it, my utmost ambition will be satisfied.

Allow me to say one other word, as I have alluded to this topic, of a personal nature. Called as I was, in the month of November last, without a day's preparation, after a retirement of seven years from all active participation in political life, to occupy—but alas! sir, how far from filling—the place of one of the foremost statesmen of the age; called upon within three or four weeks, the greater part of which time was passed in the bustle of an inn, without a book to refer to, without a leisure moment for research or inquiry, to take up such important questions as the Lobos Islands, the Crescent City affair, the difficulty about the fisheries, and then this last great subject of a tripartite convention; to dispose of all these questions under the daily pressure of the routine of the Department, enough of itself to put to the test the stoutest capacity of labor and endurance, I did feel that this was a task of no ordinary magnitude, and one that should entitle a person to some charitable consideration for any imperfection or defect in the performance of his duty. And, sir, if in the State papers which I was obliged, in very rapid succession, to produce, it should be found, under the severe scrutiny to which they must of necessity be subjected, that some things,—as I understand is alleged to be the case,—are omitted which had better been said, that some things are put forward which had better been reserved for other opportunities, and some things stated, abstractly true, but without sufficient qualification and guards, if anything of this shall be found, I trust that due allowance will be made; as I also confidently trust it will still be found that there is nothing committing the honor or the interest of the country.

The hondrable Senator from Illinois cited some sentences from my letter of the 1st of December, 1852, which he thought were in direct contradiction, on the ground of constitutional principle, with some of the provisions of the treaty which was negotiated by my friend from Delaware. Now, sir, I think that if a due allowance is made for the entire difference in the nature of the compacts, and of the relations of the contracting parties to the subject-matter, the total dissimilarity in the geographical and historical circumstances that give the character to the two conventions, it will be allowed that the constitutional doubt which I expressed—for it was but a doubt—and which applied in the one case, does not apply in the other. Sir, the compacts were totally different. One of them, the Cuban convention, would not have received, I am sure, a single vote in the Senate, if the Executive had been ill advised enough to send it here. The other was confirmed by a majority largely exceeding that which was required by the Constitution. The Senator from Delaware has said that he concurs in the principles of the letter of the 1st of December, and he has shown you that the policy pursued by him towards Cuba was precisely the same as that pursued by the late Administration. If there is the difference which the Senator from Illinois thinks there is between some of the doctrines of the Cuban letter and the principles of the treaty, I should feel that it behoved me quite as much to look to my letter, as it does the Senator from Delaware to look to his treaty; and instead of attacking him, I should think it was much wiser for me to look around to find how I might fortify myself. In fact, my friend from Delaware is one of the last men with whom I should wish to engage in a parliamentary warfare, even with the advantage of the alliance of a leader so vigorous and skillful as the Senator from Illinois. I should fear that that alliance would prove an "entangling alliance" to me, which, if not absolutely unconstitutional, it might be very unadvisable one for me to enter into.

But it is time that I should proceed to the exposition which I propose to make, and which I must forewarn you, Mr. President, in the outset, is to be of a plain, business-like character, which it would be idle to seek to invest with any rhetorical attractions. Our relations with Central America have for some time formed one of the most important topics of consideration within the whole range of our foreign relations,—an importance out of all proportion to the consequence of these States themselves; that is, either to their population, to their political weight, or to any commercial relations which we either have or ever can expect to have with them. The five States, Guatemala, San Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica, all together do not contain a population greater than that of the single State of Ohio. And that population, instead of being compact, homogeneous, brought together, is divided into five States, with their capitals remote from each other, with very inadequate means of communication, and in other respects wholly disabled from making itself felt in any relations with foreign countries, like the population of the State, the noble State, which I have just named. The State with which we have been brought most into connection, that of Nicaragua, according to the account of Mr. Squier, has but two hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, and ten thousand only of these are of the pure European blood, while the rest, the remaining two hundred and forty thousand, are of mixed races, colors, and castes.

I do not say this by way of disparagement. I do not mean to argue that our relations with these States are unimportant because they are small. They are incidentally of great magnitude. I do not undervalue these little Republics. They have had everything to contend with. They were educated in the worst possible political school, that is, the old Spanish colonial régime. They have struggled into independence under the greatest inconveniences and obstacles. They are in their infancy. They will grow, I have no doubt, and prosper. They have a beautiful position, lying between the two great oceans, with some of the finest ports upon either shore. Their climate, for a tropical climate, is for the most part salubrious and agreeable. They have a fertile soil which yields all the valuable products of the tropics, and they have mines of silver and gold; they have lakes and rivers which furnish facilities of communication; they have agriculture and some commerce; and they have made some progress in the arts of civilization. But they have yet a great deal to learn; and it will be for their permanent advantage, if in the result of their communication with other Powers more advanced than themselves, they shall derive some important lessons. Their internal feuds are deplorable, and their incessant border wars are a drawback upon all progress. While I am speaking, the State of Guatemala, with a population of eight hundred thousand, is marching an army of six thousand men against her sister State of Honduras with three hundred thousand; and Honduras, in her turn, is sending a military force to dislodge the English wood-cutters upon her disputed frontier. Sir, these feuds, these border wars, and contentions, can produce, they do produce, no other result than a series of bloody revolutions, which, besides leaving them in a state of almost semi-barbarism, has the effect of disheartening their friends in every other part of the world.

These States have formed, or at least have endeavored to form, their political institutions after the model of our own. While they might have learned from us that a Federal union which, leaving everything that belongs to local administration to the separate States, confers on the central government only those matters that are of general concernment; in short, a government like ours, if wisely and purely administered, may be the strongest government on the earth, as I believe ours in the long run will turn out to be; on the other hand, there is no form of government so weak, so hopeless, so contemptible as that of small separate States lying side by side without harmony, without concert, and employing all their energies in making war upon each other.

Though there was a great interest taken by the United States in the fortunes of the Spanish American colonies when they threw off the yoke of the mother country, and asserted their independence—an interest mainly inspired by the kindling eloquence of Henry Clay—there was perhaps no part of these vast territorial possessions that excited less interest than the five States into which the ancient kingdom of Guatemala resolved itself. They were small separately and small collectively. We had little or no commercial intercourse with them. They had no great places of resort to attract the curiosity of the traveler; in fact, we knew but little about them; they were almost lost upon the map of America. In 1822, the year after the revolution was effected, the State of San Salvador passed a formal act in her Legislature providing for her incorporation into the American Union; she sent two commissioners to Washington to carry that act into effect. I do not know that the least notice was taken of them. I suppose they were treated with personal civility, as a matter of course, but no communication was made to Congress upon the subject. I am not sure that any official response was made to it, even from the Executive. I am inclined to think there was none. At subsequent periods, and under various Administrations, attempts were made to enlist the active interference of the United States in favor of the Central American Republics, but never with the least success under any Administration. I do not say this reproachfully; it is no matter of reproach. Looking back for a period of nearly thirty years, upon the history of these countries, I cannot find the time nor the occasion when we could have enlisted actively in their affairs with any prospect of doing them the least good, or without departing from all the safe and settled principles of policy of our own country.

But at length the time came; at length an era opened, not only in our own history but theirs, and in the history of the whole world. You know that I refer to the acquisition of California, and the discovery of its gold. Then, sir, an intense necessity was immediately felt for the speediest and most economical and most convenient routes of communication between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans—between the Atlantic States and our new acquisitions on the shores of the great sea. Then, sir, the tide of emigration—I cannot compare it to anything else but what I have witnessed a hundred times on the sea-shore—the tide of emigration, like the tides of the ocean, went pouring down the coast, swelling over every rock and every shoal, rushing into every inlet, turning back the currents of the rivers, and seeking by a kind of irresistible, moral necessity an outlet into the Pacific ocean. The project of a canal had often been started before, propositions had been made, charters applied for, surveys undertaken; but nothing practical had been done. But now it was plain that the time had come when something practical must be done. Attempts were commenced, and pretty soon we heard of small steamers that were navigating the inland streams and lakes of Central America, and companies of pilgrims of both sexes and of all ages from the United States, were seen winding their way through those dark tropical forests, through the branches of which the rays of the sun had never penetrated since creation.

A charter for a canal was soon granted by Nicaragua to a company of American citizens, and if no political difficulties had existed, and if Central America had been occupied by a population like that which poured the waters of Lake Erie into the bed of the Hudson at Albany, I do not know that it would be extravagant to say, that at this very moment three-masted vessels of twenty feet draught would be navigating the waters of Lake Nicaragua, on their way to the Pacific.

But unfortunately political obstacles did exist—obstacles of all kinds. There were dissensions between the neighboring States of Nicaragua and Costa Rica. There was a difference between Nicaragua and the British Government, assuming to be the protector of the Mosquito Indians; and jealousies, it must be said, were entertained—unfounded jealousies, I think—but jealousies were sincerely entertained between the United States and Great Britain—that each of these great maritime Powers was desirous of obtaining some exclusive advantage to itself in reference to the opening of this route of interoceanic communication.

Now, sir, it was a great object, as I understand it, of the treaty negotiated on the part of this Government by my friend from Delaware, to remove these difficulties, particularly so far as the United States and Great Britain were concerned; and to establish the principle that neither of these great Powers wished for any separate and exclusive advantage. That treaty was negotiated precisely on the principles that had governed every movement and every step which had been taken from the first by the United States, in reference to artificial interoceanic communication. As I think, it was the right principle; that is, that neither party would seek any exclusive advantage; and that the two great Powers would unite, so far as depended upon them, in opening this great pathway to the commerce of the whole world.

It is a point which I think has not received sufficient attention, viz: that if the whole matter was to be peaceably disposed of, it was absolutely necessary that such an understanding should take place between the United States and Great Britain. The United States could not take a grant of exclusive privileges from Nicaragua, because Nicaragua was not in a condition to give such a grant. She claimed an unbroken sovereignty over the whole route. She was satisfied that her claim was good, and perhaps we were satisfied that it was good. I think myself that it was; but it was not uncontested. There was another great Power that denied the validity of the claim; there was a great Power that set up rival pretensions, and it was necessary that these should be disposed of; and that, as I said, was the great object, or one of the great objects effected by the treaty of the 19th of April, 1850. And I will say this,—I wish to do no more and no less than justice to Great Britain,—although she did set up this claim, and although we think it unfounded, yet in reference to the canal, she set it up only to waive it. She did not make any use of this pretension to obstruct the execution of the charter which Nicaragua had given. She said in effect, that Nicaragua had no right to give such a charter, because she did not own the territory for the whole distance. But she did not use her rival claim to obstruct that charter. On the contrary, it was one of the leading objects of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, to give the assent of Great Britain to the execution of that charter which was granted to American citizens. She gave her own consent in the form of obtaining the assent of the Mosquito Indians, over whom she claimed a protectorate. It was only a form of giving her own consent. She not only gave her own consent, and that of the Mosquito Indians, but she undertook to use her influence, in conjunction with the United States, to obtain that of Costa Rica; so that whatever we may think of her rights as the protector of the Mosquito Indians, she availed herself of them, not to obstruct, but to aid the work.

Now, as to the protectorate which Great Britain claims it is her right and her duty to exercise over the Mosquito Indians, my friend from Delaware has characterized it very well. Using the famous motto of Junius, he has called this Mosquito kingdom nominis umbra, the shadow of a name. And it is certainly nothing more. There is in an important document which lies on your table, a letter from Mr. Rives to Mr. Clayton, then Secretary of State, giving a report of a conference which he had, by direction of the Department of State, with Lord Palmerston on his way to Paris, in 1849. Lord Palmerston said to Mr. Rives:

"From a very early period the Mosquito Indians had been treated by the British Government as a separate and an independent State—they had what was called a king, who, by-the-by, he added (says Mr. Rives) in a tone of pleasantry, was as much a king as you or I."

After this account which the British Minister for Foreign Affairs gives of the Mosquito kingdom and of the Mosquito king, I think it would be wasting the time of the Senate of the United States for me to bestow many words to prove the inanity of the king and kingdom. Nevertheless, it was really an ancient affair. There was something of history in it. It had a pedigree. It ran back two centuries, and Great Britain maintained, apparently in good faith, that in the course of these two centuries she has contracted certain obligations and duties towards these Mosquito Indians, now reduced to a mere handful, and they in the most wretched condition, which she does not feel herself at liberty to disregard.

This Mosquito kingdom in its origin and progress is really a little more important than it might otherwise be thought. It played a very important part in the history of the world. It was a prominent incident in the Spanish colonial system, which for a century and a half gave a character to the politics of the whole civilized world. America having been discovered by the great navigator who sailed under Spanish auspices, Spain possessed herself of the largest and the noblest part of the continent. From California to Cape Horn, with the exception of Brazil, everything fell into her hands. It was not merely the largest and fairest part, but it was the part which contained within itself those tropical treasures, and especially those treasures of silver and gold which have in all times overmastered the imaginations of men. Why, sir, I believe such was the state of things in the seventeenth century, that the whole exportable product of what is now known as the United States, did not exceed one half a million of dollars annually, and that, I need not tell you, was perhaps no more than half the amount contained in one of the treasure ships which were regularly dispatched from Vera Cruz to Cadiz. Spain locked up all this treasure beneath the bolts and bars of her colonial monopoly. She did no more with respect to her colonies than England with respect to hers. It was the ancient colonial system; but the productions of the Spanish colonies were so much more important than those of England, that the whole commercial world sought its revenge by endeavoring to force a contraband trade with the Spanish colonies. This trade was carried on by the wholesale and retail, by private individuals and by armed squadrons, by adventurers in whom the trader, the buccaneer, and the pirate were so much mixed up, that it was hard to say which character prevailed. After Jamaica was conquered, in the time of Cromwell, that island became the basis of these operations. Spain of course sought to defend herself, and she not only instituted a line of guarda costas all along her shores to drive off every vessel that was seen hovering in those waters, as if a pestilence lurked in her sails—for such was the detestable character of this ancient colonial system—but she also undertook to institute a right of search of any merchant vessel which should show itself within a considerable distance of the Spanish coast. Of course this led to infinite collisions. Wars were constantly breaking out; in these wars islands were seized, and establishments were formed upon the main. Roatan and the other Bay Islands were captured by Admiral Vernon in the first half of the last century. When the war ceased, these islands would be surrendered, and the establishments given up, or pretended to be given up. But the peace would prove to be hollow truce, the same system of forcing a contraband trade would recommence, the same right of search would be instituted, war would break out again, and then the same circle of operations be repeated.

It is but fair to say that in this long struggle of a century and a half, the whole commercial world took sides against Spain. We now are inclined to sympathize with her, we think but meanly of this Mosquito protectorate, and we regard the occupation of those islands and these establishments on the main by Great Britain as acts of injustice and violence. But it was not thought so then. The whole commercial world, exclusive of Spain and her allies, sympathized with England, and no part of the world more than the English colonies, now the United States. I have been amused in reading the old colonial journals to see the effusions of the loyal feeling constantly poured out from these colonies, when the public mind was greatly excited in England upon subjects of this kind. On that memorable occasion, which you recollect from the history of those times, when a certain Captain Jenkins was brought upon the floor of Parliament, and exhibited his mutilated ears, and a fragment which had been torn from one of them, and produced such an excitement, that England, against the opinion of the Prime Minister, was thrown into a war with Spain, in the whole compass of the British Empire, there was perhaps nowhere such fervent, loyal zeal exhibited as in these transatlantic colonies. In the war which took place, the fleets and armies of England were recruited in these American colonies. I can tell you, sir, that in the old graveyards of New England, you can still read the epitaphs of men who brought home the diseases of the tropics from Porto Bello and Carthagena. There are men now living, whose great-grandfathers laid down their bones upon the Spanish main. Sir, the name of the home of Washington upon the banks of the Potomac, here in your neighborhood, derived its origin from the enthusiasm felt by Washington's elder brother for one of the unfortunate heroes of those wars, who found upon these pestiferous coasts an enemy against which human courage and strength were of no avail:

"You, gallant VERNON, saw
The miserable scene; you pitying saw
To infant weakness shrunk the warrior's arm;
Saw the deep-racking pang, the ghastly form,
The lip pale quivering and the beamless eye,
No more in ardor bright; you heard the groans
Of agonizing ships from shore to shore;
Heard nightly plunged beneath the sullen wave
The frequent corse."

Sir, it was owing to nothing but the yearnings of a fond maternal heart that our beloved Washington himself, for whom a warrant as midshipman in the royal navy had been obtained, did not, a few years later, enlist himself in those disastrous wars, with an equal prospect of sacrificing his life in the support of the system of which this wretched Mosquito protectorate was a part.

This was the origin, this the character of this Mosquito claim, carried on in defiance of the power of Spain, as long as the power of Spain existed, and after the Spanish colonies threw off the yoke, carried on in defiance, or with the acquiescence of the coterminous States. Such I understand to have been its origin, such its history, reduced at the present day to very small dimensions, the state of affairs having wholly changed, and the English Government having no longer any interest or any motive in adhering to the protectorate. Such she assures us is the case.

Now, in reference to this canal, its southern terminus, the port of San Juan, fell within the limits of the territory which was claimed to be (claimed to be is all I say) under this protectorate. This claim was of course denied by Nicaragua. She had temporarily possessed herself of the port after a long dispute with the British; but in January, 1848, the Nicaraguans were promptly expelled by an English force, and the first thing that was done by the British authority—and I must say, in my opinion, in very bad taste—was to change the ancient euphonious name of San Juan del Norte or San Juan de Nicaragua (I do not care which) into the modern, and to my ear very insipid, appellation of Greytown. I hope the first thing that will be done by the independent authorities of San Juan, if they are independent, will be to change it back again. Let us have again that fine, old, and well-sounding Spanish name.

Now, as I said, the convention negotiated by my friend from Delaware, with the approbation of the President, on the 19th of April, 1850, removed a considerable part of the obstacles which grew out of the claim to the protectorate; but there were other difficulties remaining. Costa Rica and Nicaragua were still at variance. Nicaragua refused, in any way, to recognize the independent existence of the Mosquito Indians. She refused to renounce her territorial rights to San Juan. In the mean time the preliminary surveys had been instituted, and it was found that the canal would not pass all the way on the left bank of the river. It was found that probably in some places it would go into the bed of the river and in other places it would go on the right bank of the river; and Costa Rica claimed that her rightful boundary came up to the right bank of the river. Then how could we get along with a charter that was given upon the principle of the exclusive sovereignty of Nicaragua? It was impossible that foreign capitalists, who do not enter into these matters with the critical skill of diplomatists, would risk their capital in a country like Central America, where domestic feuds and border wars are the order of the day, to build an enormously expensive canal which would cost perhaps $100,000,000, over disputed territory, where the soil was liable to be wrested from them at any moment by a contesting Power. It was necessary that something further should be done to adjust all these controverted questions.

Who should do it? The mediation of the United States and Great Britain had over and over again been invoked by both States. In the treaty of the 19th of April, 1850, to which I have so often to allude, there was an express stipulation, that if any differences existed between the States or the Government in reference to the canal, or any question of right of property connected with it, the high contracting parties would exert their good offices to reconcile those differences, so that while it was absolutely necessary that the work of adjustment should be attempted, it seemed impossible that anybody else than the two friendly Powers could undertake it. Accordingly they felt it their duty to undertake it, and in the month, I think it was, of July, 1851, a conference was held here, in Washington, between the Secretary of State and the British Minister on one side, and the envoys of Costa Rica and Nicaragua on the other; but without any favorable result. About that time Nicaragua had entered into a partial confederacy with Honduras and San Salvador, to strengthen herself against Costa Rica. She had merged her separate political sovereignty in this federation. She had no longer the power, if she had the desire, to treat separately upon this subject. An interval of eight or ten months accordingly followed.

At length it was thought by the two Governments that a further delay was out of the question; that it was already amounting to an indefinite postponement of all energetic proceedings towards the construction of the canal; and it was absolutely necessary that something decisive should be done. Accordingly, in the month of April, 1852, the Secretary of State and the British Minister, acting under the instructions of their Governments respectively, came together and held conferences on this subject; and, after mature deliberation, they agreed to the propositions commonly called the propositions of the 30th of April, 1852, which were to be offered to the two Governments. They were only advisory. They could be nothing else. They were recommendations of two friendly Powers, having no interest at variance with that of either party; regarding them both with the most friendly eye; and anxiously seeking the best method by which all these difficulties could be reconciled, and an effectual impulse given to the execution of the great work. They were only propositions. They were not a convention. They were the basis of a convention that was to be submitted to the two Governments of Nicaragua and Costa Rica. After having been arranged with great deliberation here, they were sent by separate commissioners to the capitals of Nicaragua and Costa Rica. They were accepted by Costa Rica; they were rejected by Nicaragua. Now, sir, let us for a moment consider what these propositions were.

I shall not take up the time of the Senate by going into a very great detail. It would be hard to be understood without a map of the country, and without more time than it would be convenient for the Senate to bestow on the subject; but the main objects were few and simple. The first was this: out of the very large tract of country lying east of Nicaragua covered by the claim of the Mosquito Indians, to retain a moderate reservation for the temporary use of the Mosquito Indians. They were all to be collected here; they were to be withdrawn from every other point which they may have occupied. In the center of the coast of this territory lay the ancient settlement of Bluefields, the foundation of which runs back into the seventeenth century, if I am not mistaken. They were all to be brought together on this reservation, and all the rest of this large territory east and south of it was to be ceded in full sovereignty to Nicaragua. This cession included the much-desired port of San Juan. The great bone of contention, if I may so call it, was to be given up to Nicaragua by these propositions; and in consideration of the large cession of territory, and of getting rid of the disagreeable controversy, it was proposed—proposed only, all this was a proposition—that Nicaragua, as a pecuniary indemnity to the Mosquito nation, should pay the net proceeds of an ad valorem duty of ten per cent. upon articles imported into San Juan, for three years. How much that would amount to I cannot undertake to say, but I do not suppose it would amount in the whole to more than fifty or sixty thousand dollars. That was the entire pecuniary consideration which was to be paid for the surrender of the sovereignty of San Juan, and for the cession of the rest of the country lying west and southwest of the reservation to which I have alluded.

This was not all. The reservation itself was not intended to be perpetual. On the contrary, it was expressly provided, in a separate article, that the terms of the settlement should not preclude Nicaragua from making any private agreement she might please with the Mosquito Indians for what we should call the extinguishment of their title. She was to be at liberty at any time to make a private arrangement with the Mosquito Indians for the final extinguishment of the title, and consequently the absorption of the reservation into the Nicaraguan State—the Indians to be incorporated with the citizens of that State, of course; which would be no hardship, because by far the largest part of the population of Nicaragua is composed of the native race and their descendants.

These were the propositions as far as concerns the Mosquito protectorate and San Juan, and all that part of the controversy. Nicaragua being so highly favored on that side, it was thought no more than reasonable that Costa Rica, the other party, should be somewhat favored on her side, not however by giving her all that was asked, because she claimed to go up the San Juan river through its whole extent from the lake to the ocean. That was not admitted in the propositions. She also claimed that she had an equal right with Nicaragua in the port of San Juan. That could not be admitted, because the exclusive sovereignty was proposed to be given to Nicaragua; but it was proposed that Costa Rica should go to the Colorado, a branch that strikes off from the San Juan to the right, and, giving the large delta between the Colorado and the San Juan to Nicaragua, that Costa Rica should follow up the right bank of the Colorado, then the right bank of the San Juan to the lake, and then that the southern shore of the lake should be the boundary, with the privilege of navigating the lake; and then the river La Flor to the Pacific. I admit that this was a favorable boundary to Costa Rica, though it did not, as I have said, give her all that she thought she was entitled to; and Nicaragua had been greatly favored on the other side. How, in a boundary contest between two Powers of about equal strength, can you ever come to a settlement on any other basis than that of compromise and mutual concession? The United States and England have done it over and over again. We claimed our boundary on the northeast as running up far beyond the river St. John—for we have our San Juan too—we claimed that we went far beyond that river on the northeastern boundary of Maine. England said that the boundary line began at Mars' Hill, far south of the St. John. The controversy lasted fifty years; and finally we were obliged to settle it by each party giving up something of its extreme pretension.

So it was on the coast of the Pacific. There we claimed up to 54° 40'. The British said, on the other hand, that the line ought to follow the Columbia river down to the Pacific. The two countries were brought almost to the point of collision on this question, but at last it was thought on all sides that the only practicable and honorable mode of settling the question was to adopt a middle term, and take the line of the forty-ninth degree of latitude—which was the boundary east of the Rocky Mountains—as the line of demarkation to the sea. If great Powers like England and the United States, the leading Powers of the commercial and maritime world, find it necessary to settle their border controversies by these mutual sacrifices, can Nicaragua, can Costa Rica expect to adjust theirs on any better principle? However, as I said, the terms of the settlement proposed were accepted by Costa Rica, but Nicaragua did not think it expedient for her to adopt them.

While these matters were passing, a very singular event occurred in San Juan, of which I believe I can best give an account to the Senate by reading an extract from a dispatch of our consular agent, Mr. Boone, who arrived at San Juan on the 3d of June last. He writes the following, under date of the 5th of June, 1852:

"I find the government of the place in the hands of a corporation, or organization, formed principally of American citizens. It consists of a mayor and a city council. They have a constitution which recognizes the trial by jury, and is altogether formed, as far as it goes, upon liberal principles They have a well organized police, judges and aldermen, all elected annually by the people. There is likewise a captain of the port and a health officer. All articles of commerce are admitted free of duty." * * *

"In March last, Mr. Green, the British consul and agent of the Mosquito king, president of the then council at Greytown, upon the request being made by some of the principal inhabitants, issued a proclamation or order for a convention of the people of the town to meet and frame a new constitution. The convention was held and the present constitution was adopted, under which all the before-mentioned officers have been elected."

Now, this Government is carried on under the name of the Mosquito king; and Mr. Boone represents that there is a decided preponderance of the British influence in the Government. The officers, by the way, I am informed, are all American; but I doubt not that Mr. Boone correctly states the fact that they are decidedly under British influence. I suppose this is pretty natural, considering the previous history of affairs there; because this small municipality naturally relies upon the name of the Mosquito protectorate as a security for the present against the invasion of the State of Nicaragua, until they shall be sufficiently strong to protect themselves.

With respect to the manner in which affairs are managed by this new municipal government I would speak with some reserve. I do not like at this distance to give a decided opinion founded upon ex parte information; but I must say that this new government, though founded on a principle with which, in the United States, we must have all our sympathies enlisted—that of popular election—would seem to be carrying on their affairs very badly. They have lately, by an act of violence for which no doubt some provocation was given, gone across the river and pulled down the buildings of the transit company; and I have also received information of some transactions towards certain French settlers established there, which, if they are truly represented, will involve the municipal authorities of this new corporation in a heavy responsibility to the French empire. As I said before, these may be unfounded reports, and it would be wrong to form a decided opinion upon ex parte information. I hope, as the new constitution is organized upon popular principle, that it will by a wise administration do credit to such an origin.

Such was the state of things in that quarter when I went into the Department of State, last November. It was out of my power for some time, for causes beyond my control, to give any impulse to the negotiations in reference to Central America. In the month of January, we received the information that a change of ministry had taken place in England, and that a new Government had been formed under the Earl of Aberdeen, as prime minister. In a fortnight or three weeks I received from the British minister here a communication which showed that one of the first objects to which the new ministry had directed its attention, with the view of bringing about some practical terms of final adjustment, were these difficulties in Central America. I will confess to you, Mr. President, that this communication produced an agreeable impression on my mind. It reminded me of what took place eleven or twelve years ago, when I found myself in London, as the representative of this Government. You recollect that at that time we were still involved in the controversies about the northeastern boundary, the affair of the "Caroline," the arrest of McLeod, and the seizure and detention of American vessels on the coast of Africa. These subjects had been discussed, some of them for half a century; and with no other effect than to confirm each party in the conviction that it had all the right on its own side; and in fact to bring the two great Powers to the verge of a conflict. Such was the condition of affairs at that time. In this state of things, late one night in December, as I was meditating upon these matters, not in the best spirits, and feeling a pretty heavy sense of responsibility as to my own position, having been sent there to discuss all these questions without a word of instruction from the Government upon any one of them, I received a note from Lord Aberdeen, appointing an interview for the next day, the object of which turned out to be to inform me that the Queen's Government, lately formed under Sir Robert Peel, had come to the conclusion to make a new, and as it hoped a successful, attempt to settle all matters in controversy between the two countries; and that for this purpose, it had determined to send a special minister to the United States, and had selected Lord Ashburton for the mission, on the express ground that, though he would of course look after the interests of his own country, he was the individual, perhaps, in the whole British empire, in a position to undertake the duty, who would carry to the United States the kindest feelings and the most friendly domestic and personal associations. I confess that that communication, made in that amicable tone for the express object mentioned, did, as it were, lift a somewhat heavy load from my mind. I thought I saw, at no great distance, the prospect of an adjustment of all these embarrassing and dangerous questions; a prospect which was so happily realized in the course of the summer by the conclusion of the treaty of Washington of the 9th of August, 1842.

It may be comparing small things with great, but I must say that it was with a somewhat similar feeling of satisfaction that I found that one of the first acts of Lord Aberdeen's new Government was to make an overture to us for the settlement of this, not so formidable, but still by no means inconsiderable difficulty down in Central America. The purport of the communication was, that the Government of her Britannic Majesty was disposed to agree to almost anything reasonable. It was willing to recognize, it had recognized, the independent government that was set up at San Juan. With respect to the protectorate, it desired nothing more than to be wholly disembarrassed from it, so far as it could without an entire sacrifice of the duties of charity and paternal regard which it owed to the broken-down fragments of the Indian tribes which for two hundred years had been, to a certain extent, under its protection. It wished only to get out of it with honor and credit. That was the purport of the communication. It was willing to go there with the United States, and treat with the municipal authorities of San Juan, and was willing that they should continue to govern the territory, American citizens though they were. It was willing that they should continue in power under the cover of the Mosquito king, or they might assume the absolute sovereignty, and extend just such protection to the Indians as their condition and wants should require.

They invited us to go there with them, to join them in treating with the municipal authorities, and if the arrangement could be completed, then to join, not in guaranteeing the independence of this little new republic—for that it was thought would not be deemed by us an advisable step—but to act in concert with them in extending such friendly countenance to the poor remnants of the Indians as might be requisite to secure them from internal violence, and prevent them from perishing from the face of the earth.

I must confess that I thought this a very reasonable and satisfactory communication. I thought it held out the prospect that something practical would at length be done. I consequently made the suggestion to the President to which I have alluded, which was approved by him and sanctioned by Congress, that in order to do our part toward bringing about this arrangement, we should put our diplomatic relations with those States upon the most advantageous footing. I will say, however, that I thought, and still think, that instead of recognizing the independence of this new municipal organization, this free city of San Juan—(and it appears to me it would be like one of the Hanse towns of Germany)—considering the antecedents of the question and the history of the whole affair, it would be better to renew to Nicaragua the propositions that we made to her last April, and give up San Juan to her, and allow her to establish her sovereignty over the city. I feel, it is true, that there will be some inconvenience in that course, if this town is to grow. For, mind you, sir, it will be an American town. Mr. Boone writes that out of seventy vessels that arrived in the six months he was there, sixty, if I recollect, were American vessels; and if the canal is to be constructed, as this will be the eastern terminus of the great route of interoceanic communication, it will become in time a great American city, inhabited, for the most part, by citizens of the United States; and I do feel that there will be a considerable inconvenience with this prospect, in requiring the little independent municipality, which has now asserted its inherent right to establish its own government there, to go back under the sovereignty of Nicaragua. Still, under the circumstances of the case, I should be in favor, if it rested with me, of giving Nicaragua that option, and trusting, I have no doubt safely trusting, to her good sense not to press the inhabitants of that city. I believe she would give them an independent government, and allow them to carry on their affairs in their own way, by means of municipal authorities of their own election.

Now, sir, how far this project will succeed depends very much in the first instance upon the individual sent on the mission. I look upon it as a very important mission. Small as those States are, I really think that at this time, it is more important who is sent by the United States to Central America, than who is sent to London, to Paris, or St. Petersburg; and I must say, without intending to use any language of compliment, that I place entire confidence in the President of the United States, that out of the able and distinguished men of his own party, he will select the right man. I have no doubt he will do it, and I have pleasure in saying so. The only diplomatic appointments which have yet been made by him, that to Switzerland and that to Peru, are sufficient pledges to my mind that he will have regard to merit and to qualifications. Those appointments, in my opinion, do him the highest honor, as they do the highest honor to his political friends upon this floor, who confirmed them without hesitation and without a division. I have no doubt that he will be governed by the same good sense in the appointment to be made for this mission; and if the right man can be found, and if he can be induced to go down there to take this work in hand and bring these protracted controversies to a desirable conclusion, he will cover himself with honor. I do not see any point in the range of our foreign relations where so much good is now to be done. And, sir, allow me to say one other word on this point. It seems to me that this is the last chance we have for settling affairs on a desirable and honorable footing. If this fails, I do not myself see any hope of taking up the subject in any other form with a better prospect of success. If we cannot now settle all these matters and remove all the difficulties that obstruct the execution of the canal, as far as depends upon political considerations, I do not see but that Nicaragua and Costa Rica must be left to struggle on together with each other, with the certainty, the moral and political certainty that the construction of the canal through their country is indefinitely postponed. Whether that would be for the interest of Nicaragua it is for her to judge.

I have taken up more of the time of the Senate than I had intended, and have now said all that I have to say on the main subject. Before I take my seat, however, I will add a few words in reference to topics on which I may be expected to say something; I mean the Belize, the Bay Islands, and the recent operations in Honduras, and the opinion entertained by distinguished Senators, that those settlements and operations furnish just ground for accusing England of a breach of the stipulations of the treaty of the 19th of April, 1850. In reference to this, I will candidly say that I do not think England has either violated or intended to violate the faith of that treaty. Why should she? What had she to gain by entering into a treaty stipulation, with no other intention than to break it? She was not obliged to make the treaty. She had no motive in making it, except the motive of faithfully executing its provisions. She owed us nothing in reference to Central America or the canal. We had no claim upon her which required her to enter into the compact with us. What possible inducement of interest or ambition, or any other corrupt motive that could influence a State, can it be supposed England could have had to enter into the treaty for the sole purpose of breaking it? Why, sir, there was difficulty enough before. The pretension to the Mosquito protectorate was itself troublesome enough. Why should England voluntarily and gratuitously add to that difficulty a new difficulty that would immediately present itself, by breaking her solemnly-plighted faith with the United States? I cannot think that she would be so senseless as to do it.

Then in reference to the affairs of Central America proper, by which I mean what is commonly so considered, leaving out of the account Belize and Honduras, I cannot see but what England has done all she contracted to do. There may have been some difference in the interpretation which the two parties placed upon the stipulation, but she has been continually receding. She has given up this, and she has given up that. She is desirous not only to disembarrass herself of the protectorate, but she has resigned the sovereignty of San Juan, and has proposed the cession of the whole Mosquito country east of Nicaragua. If a suspicion of bad faith, which I do not admit, could rest upon either party; if there were a disposition to cavil upon the occasion, it might be said rather that the United States, in view of the recent transactions at San Juan, had broken their faith, for there we see an independent government establishing itself by a popular movement, and creating a municipality composed of American citizens. We all know that the Government of the United States has had nothing to do in bringing it about. The utmost that we have done—and I do not know that we have done that—is to furnish some degree of countenance and recognition towards the new municipal government. But yet the fact is that there is an independent government at San Juan under the name of the Mosquito king, it is true, but composed of American citizens elected by the people. I mention this only to show, that if one were disposed to take exception, there would be reasonable ground for taking it against the United States.

With respect to the settlements at Belize, after all that has been said in the course of the winter on this subject, especially after the speeches of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. PEARCE] and the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD;] after the view taken of the subject by the Committee on Foreign Relations in their able report, and the explanations that have taken place in the course of the recent discussion, I do not think it would be worth while for me to take up the time of the Senate by dwelling upon the question. I believe it is now admitted upon all sides of the Senate Chamber, let the decision of the geographical question be what it may, let the Belize be in Central America or in Mexico, let the origin and foundation of these settlements be what they will,—that they were not in the contemplation of the parties to the treaty at the time it was negotiated, or of the Senate at the time it was approved.

Attention was not at all turned to these settlements. The parties had something else in view. They were thinking of the canal and the means of carrying forward that great work of interoceanic communication.

The same remark may be made in reference to the Bay Islands. They have been for a century and more a part of the dependencies of Belize, and it was not the understanding of the contracting parties that they should be affected one way or the other by the stipulations of the treaty of 19th of April, 1850.

I understand the facts in reference to the recent establishment of the colony to be these: These islands were among those which were seized, given up, and seized again, while the state of things lasted which I described in a former part of my remarks, and finally the English of late years have considered that the title "de facto and de jure," (I quote the words of a dispatch of Lord Palmerston,) was in them. As to the validity of the claim, I have not a word to say. I am only stating the pretensions of England; and I suppose it is admitted that at the time the treaty was negotiated, those dependencies were not, any more than Belize itself, understood by the negotiators to be included in the stipulations of the treaty. Two or three years ago, as I understand, the inhabitants of the islands, not being very numerous, sent a messenger to the superintendent of the Belize, and informed him that they were without any regular government, and that they wished one to be established. He told them, very reasonably, that her Britannic Majesty could not afford to govern them for nothing; and that they must see how much they could raise by voluntary taxation to defray the expenses of the Government. They held a meeting and agreed that they would tax themselves £200 a year. They sent word of the result to the superintendent of the Belize, who told them that for that he thought he could get them a regular government. In consequence of that, the order of last July was issued establishing the colony of the Bay Islands. Such is the account I have received of the origin of this colonial organization, not however, I ought to add, from any official source.

If these facts are as I have stated, I think it may be said that there is no violation of the stipulation of the treaty in organising that colony. At the same time, I must candidly say, that I think it is an ill-advised step. I have no doubt it has been hastily taken on the suggestion of the colonial authorities, and that it has been passed inadvertently through the Foreign Office at London, without a sufficient consideration of the circumstances of the case. I think that the organization, the avowed organization into a colony of islands belonging geographically—whatever may be the case politically—to Central America, and within sight of the Honduras coast, is, considering the just susceptibility of the American mind on this subject, which is not greater than would exist in England on a similar subject and in a parallel state of affairs, a very ill-advised and indiscreet step. I have no doubt the consent of the Home Government has been surprised into it, by the officious zeal of the colonial authorities, and I entertain a strong expectation that when, through the dispassionate representation of this Government it shall be brought to the consideration of the British minister, it will be retraced. I hope it will. I think it will be as it was in the case of the Sandwich Islands in 1843. You know that at that time the United States first agreed to recognize the independence of those islands. A communication was made by me to that effect to the British Minister for Foreign Affairs in London. He agreed that his Government would recognize their independence, and use its best influence to induce France to do the same. The next news that came was that Lord George Paulet, who commanded the British squadron in the Pacific, had seized the islands, had struck the Hawaiian flag, and hoisted the flag of England. The first thing done by the British Government was to disavow the rash and unauthorized act. It was the same thing with the seizure of Tigre Island by Mr. Chatfield, in 1848; and although the case is different, these islands having for a long time been in the unqualified, though contested, possession of Great Britian, I do think, under all the circumstances of the case, that on a calm and dispassionate representation from this Government, this hasty step will be retraced.

With respect to the transactions at Truxillo, we have nothing but newspaper information on the subject, and even that informs us that there has been no bombardment, no cannonading of the place, as at first reported; but Sir George Seymour, the commander of the British squadron in the West Indies, an officer of great moderation, who is distinguished for his friendly feelings towards the United States, and at whose instance the British Admiralty have very lately put in the possession of Commodore Perry, commander of the squadron sent out by this Government to Japan, a large number of charts and hydrographic works—everything, in short, to facilitate the expedition—has sent a war steamer to Truxillo to tell the authorities there that they must recall an armed party which they had sent over the frontier to break up the settlements of the English wood-cutters on the river Limas. I do not think anything serious will grow out of these transactions; and I can only say, that if there were a disputed boundary between us and Mexico, and Mexico were to send an armed force to break up a settlement of Americans, and destroy their establishments, I think we should tell them in the plainest terms the English language contains, that the United States did not understand that way of settling boundary controversies.

The Senate will infer, from what I have now said, that I do not apprehend any disturbance of the peaceful relations between this country and Great Britain, in consequence of the state of things in Central America. In the last speech which I had the honor to make in the House of Representatives, now eighteen years ago, I expressed the opinion that there was no danger of a war between the United States and France, with whom our friendly relations were seriously menaced in consequence of the delay of the French Chambers to make an appropriation to carry into effect Mr. Rives's treaty of indemnity. I am not sorry, in raising my voice for the first time as a member of the Senate, that it is for the purpose of expressing similar sentiments in reference to Great Britain.

It is not because either in this case or in that I am indifferent to the interests or the honor of my country. Far otherwise, sir; it is because I do not think they are in danger. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] that England does not love us. In the relations of countries which are governed by Constitutions, by Parliaments, and by Congresses, there is no room for love or for hate, or for any sentimental influence; enlightened regard to the public interest is the only rule of action. It is only under absolute governments—under a monarch who, like Louis XIV., can say "I am the State"—that there is room for love and for hate. Between us and England, and the rest of the constitutional Powers of Europe, there is room only for the influence of the dictates of an enlightened regard to the public weal. But this I will say, that I am persuaded at this time that with all parties in England a mutually beneficial, peaceful intercourse with the United States is considered a cardinal principle of the policy of the Government; and I think that on our side toward England, and toward Europe, we ought to consider a mutually beneficial, peaceful intercourse as a cardinal principle of our policy.

I cordially sympathize with the distinguished Senator from Illinois, in the glowing views that he entertains of the future growth and glory of our country. I wish I could persuade him that this glorious future of America is not inconsistent with an equally auspicious future for the friendly Powers of Europe. I wish I could persuade him that that part of the world is not exclusively the region of tombs and monuments that he so graphically described, but that in every country in Europe, more in some than in others, but visibly in all, there is progress; that liberal ideas are at work; that popular institutions and influences are steadily forming themselves; that the melioration of the laboring classes is going on; that education and social comforts are making their way there. It is true, I beg the gentleman to believe me, it is true; and nothing will promote this favorable state of things more than the kindly sympathy and a salutary example on the part of this country. And I will also say that there is no country in Europe that I have ever visited, whatever temporary causes of irritation may have existed with this government or that government—there is not a country of Europe where the name and character of an American citizen is not a direct passport to every good office that a stranger can desire, and nowhere more than in England.

Sir, in our views of the glorious future that awaits the Union, we are apt to regard geographical extension as the measure and the index of our country's progress. I do not deny the general correctness of that impression. It is necessary for the formation of the highest type of national character that it should be formed and exhibited upon a grand and extensive scale. It cannot be developed within the bounds of a petty State. Nor do I admit that this idea of geographical extension necessarily carries with it—though it does perhaps by natural association—that of collision with other Powers. But, sir, I think there is no fear, so far as geographical extension is necessary, that we shall in the natural progress of things, have as much of it, and as rapidly as the best interests of the country admit or require. In the mean time, if we wish a real, solid, substantial growth—a growth which will not bring us in collision with foreign Powers—we shall have it in twenty-five years to our heart's content; not by the geographical accession of dead acres; not by the purchase of Cuba, or by the partition of Mexico, but by the simple peaceful increase of our population.

Sir, have you well considered that that mysterious law which was promulgated on the sixth day of the Creation—"Be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth"—will, in twenty-five years of peace and union—for it is all wrapped up in that—aided by the foreign immigration, give us another America of living men as large as that which we now possess? Yes, sir, as far as living men are concerned, besides replacing the millions which will have passed off the stage, it will give us all that the arm of Omnipotence could give us, if it should call up from the depths of the Pacific, and join to the Union another America as populous as ours. If by any stroke of power or policy you could to-morrow extend your jurisdiction from Hudson's Bay to Cape Horn, and take in every State and every Government, and all their population, it would not give to you a greater amount of population, including your own, than you will have at the end of twenty-five years by the simple law of increase, aided by immigration from abroad.

I shall not live to see it. My children probably will. The Senator from Illinois, in all human probability, will live to see it, and there is, perhaps, no one more likely than he to impress his views of public policy upon the mind of those growing millions, and to receive from them in return all the honors and trusts which a grateful people can bestow upon those they respect and love. Let me adjure him, then, to follow the generous impulses of his nature, and after giving, like a true patriot, his first affections to his own country, to be willing to comprehend all the other friendly countries of the earth within the scope of a liberal consideration, and above all to cultivate the spirit and arts of peace—of peace.

Sir, it is the opposite spirit of military aggrandizement, the spirit of conquest, that has forged those chains in Europe which the Senator so eloquently deplores. It was this that brought down Asia to the dust in the morning of the world, and has kept her seated in sackcloth and ashes ever since. This blasted Greece; this destroyed Rome. It was not a foreign enemy that laid the ax to the root of Rome's freedom; it was her own proconsuls coming home from the successful wars of Asia, gorged with the gold of conquered provinces. The spirit of military aggrandizement and conquest have done the same for Europe. Will they not do it here if we indulge them? Do not let the Senator think that I suspect he wishes to indulge them; but will they not do it? Will they not give us vast standing armies, overshadowing navies, colossal military establishments, frightful expenditures, contracts, jobs, corruption which it sickens the heart to contemplate? And how can our simple republican institutions, our elective magistracies, our annual or biennial choice of those who are to rule over us, unsupported by hereditary claims or pretorian guards, be carried on under such influences?

Do not mistake me, however, sir. I counsel no pusillanimous doctrine of non-resistance. Heaven forbid! Providence has placed us between the two great world oceans, and we shall always be a maritime Power of the first order. Our commerce already visits every sea, and wherever it floats it must be protected. Our immense inland frontier will always require a considerable army; and it should be kept in the highest state of discipline. The schools at Annapolis and West Point ought to be the foster children of our Republic. Our arsenals and our armories ought to be kept filled with every weapon and munition of war, and every vulnerable point on the coast ought to be fortified. But while we act on the maxim "in peace prepare for war," let us also remember that the best preparation for war is peace. This swells your numbers; this augments your means; this knits the sinews of your strength; this covers you all over with a panoply of might; and then, if war must come, in a just cause, no Power on earth—no, sir, not all combined—can send forth an adversary from whose encounter you need shrink.

But give us these twenty-five years of peace. I do believe that the coming quarter of a century is to be the most important in our whole history, and I do beseech you let us have the twenty-five years, at least, of peace. Let our fertile wastes be filled up with swarming millions; let the tide of immigration continue to flow in from Europe; let the steamer, let the canal, let the railway, especially the great Pacific railway, subdue these mighty distances, and bring this vast extension into a span; let us pay back the ingots of California gold with bars of Atlantic iron; let agriculture clothe our vast wastes with waving plenty; let the industrial and mechanic arts erect their peaceful fortresses at the waterfalls of our rivers; and then in the train of this growing population, let the printing office, the lecture-room, the school-room, and the village church, be scattered over the country; and, sir, in these twenty-five years, we shall exhibit a spectacle of national prosperity, such as the world has never seen on so large a scale, and yet within the reach of a sober, practical contemplation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not intend to prolong this discussion, but I think it due to myself to make a word of comment upon one remark which fell from the eminent Senator from Massachusetts. I understand him to agree with the Senator from Delaware, that his letter in relation to Cuba, in which he laid down the policy of making no pledge in regard to its future condition, was not applicable to Central America; and that therefore those two Senators agree to stand on a common platform upon that point. Sir, I am not willing, by the concurrence of those two Senators, to be put in the position of having made a misapplication of that letter. The main point to which I referred in the letter of the Senator from Massachusetts to the Compte de Sartiges, was this: in it the Senator said that it was not within the competent authority of this Government, under the Constitution, to give any pledge that in all coming time we would never annex any territory, which in the course of events might become desirable, to this Union. If it was not competent, under the Constitution, to give that pledge in reference to the Island of Cuba, where does he find the constitutional authority to give it in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty with reference to Costa Rica and Nicaragua, and other Central American States? If there be an absence of constitutional power in the one case, it ought to be binding upon the consciences of men in all other cases. Therefore, until they explain away that constitutional barrier, I cannot permit those two Senators to put themselves in concert and accuse me of having made a misapplication of the letter. That is all I desire to say upon that point.

So far as the Senator's remarks relate to the preservation of peace, I fully and cordially agree with him. If there is any one line of policy more dear to my heart than all others, it is that which shall avoid any just cause of war, and preserve peace in all time to come. If there be a difference of opinion between us, it is upon the point as to which line of policy will best accomplish that object. I believe that the true policy is to make no pledges at present which are to bind our successors in all time to come with reference to a state of facts which now does not exist, but then may require action. I have not said that I wish to annex any portion of Central America to this country. I only protest against the pledge that our successors may not do that which their interest, duty, and honor, may require when the time for action comes. With these remarks, I am willing to close the discussion.

Mr. MASON. There will be no question, I take it for granted, that the President will have it in his power during the vacation of Congress to obtain a vast amount of necessary information to guide the future policy of this country towards Central America. There can be as little doubt that when the information is obtained it will be laid before the Congress of the United States. I have said, therefore, to the honorable Senator from Delaware, who offered the resolution, that we shall have the information for which he calls without a call of the Senate; but if that call must be made, it will be necessary, in my judgment, very much to enlarge it, because it applies only to information as to the dominion in the islands. In order, however, to dispose of the subject, which I do with the approbation of the Senator from Delaware, I move that the resolution lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

A message was received from the President of the United States in answer to a resolution of the 17th instant, requesting copies of certain propositions to Nicaragua and Costa Rica, relative to the settlement of the territorial controversies between the States and Governments bordering on the river San Juan, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State, and the documents by which it was accompanied; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting additional papers in relation to the allegation of fraud contained in certain public prints with regard to the disbursements by Alexander Ramsey of money appropriated to carry out the stipulations of treaties concluded with the Sioux Indians; which, on the motion of Mr. SEBASTIAN, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting additional papers in relation to the Mexican Boundary Commission; which, on the motion of Mr. WELLER, was referred to the Select Committee on the subject, and ordered to be printed.

CLERK TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. JAMES, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the clerk to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, be continued during the recess of the Senate, at the usual rate of compensation, to be employed in preparing for the use of said committee an alphabetical index and digest of the reports heretofore made by the several Committees on Patents and the Patent Office.

MEXICAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

Mr. WELLER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on the Mexican Boundary be allowed until the next session of Congress to report upon the various subjects referred to them.

Mr. HUNTER. I have no objection to the committee making a report, but I object to any committee sitting during the recess. I think it would be establishing a bad precedent.

Mr. WELLER. It is not proposed by the resolution that the committee shall sit during the recess. The testimony before it has been closed. It occupies more than five hundred pages, and it is utterly impossible for the committee during this session to examine it so as to be able to make a report. The object of the resolution is to allow the committee to make their report, not to continue their sitting during the recess.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator will add a proviso that the committee shall not sit during the recess, I will have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. WELLER. As chairman of the committee, I propose going home very early next month, and I am sure there will be no sessions of the committee in the recess. The resolution simply proposes to allow the committee to report, and I do not think under that authority, they could, if they desired, sit during the recess. However, if my friend from Virginia thinks it necessary, I have no objection to adding the proviso.

Mr. HUNTER. I think they might sit under the authority conferred by the resolution; and I should therefore like to have the proviso added. I know there will be other applications to continue committees, and I shall oppose them all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COOPER in the chair.) The Senator from California accepts the modification suggested by the Senator from Virginia.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion by Mr. SUMNER, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the papers relating to the claim of the Boston Steamboat Relief Company, B. B. Forbes.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON FRAUDS, ETC.

Mr. BORLAND. I have a report, Mr. President, which I am directed to make from the Select Committee on Frauds, Abuses, &c. Before doing so, however, it will be proper to recur briefly to the circumstances under which the committee have acted.

This committee was originally appointed last summer, but was unable, for want of time, to complete its duties during that session, which adjourned the last of August. During the recent session it was reappointed, and continued its investigations until the close. Finding its duties still unfinished, owing to the mass of testimony they had taken, and which had to be arranged and embodied in a report, permission was asked and obtained to continue their sittings during this special session, in order to prepare and present their report.

The committee consisted of five members—three Democrats and two Whigs. Of these, the Senatorial terms of the two Whig members (Mr. UNDERWOOD of Kentucky, and Mr. BROOKE of Mississippi) terminated with the Congress on the 4th of this month. It became necessary, therefore, to make up the regular number of the committee to supply these vacancies; and two other Whig members (Mr. MORTON of Florida, and Mr. THOMPSON of Kentucky) were appointed. These gentlemen met the other members of the committee a few days ago—the whole committee consisting of Mr. HOUSTON, chairman, Mr. BORLAND, Mr. WALKER, Mr. MORTON, and Mr. THOMPSON—when the cases which had been examined were submitted, and the substance of the report upon them, as drawn up, was read.

I have deemed this statement proper, and it was understood by the committee that I should make it, in justice especially to the two new members of the committee, who have not, of course, had time or opportunity to examine the testimony in the several cases, and cannot be responsible for the report. They heard the report read, and acquiesced in it only so far as to assent to its being made to the Senate, reserving their right to judge of it when it shall have been printed, and they have had an opportunity to examine the testimony upon which it is based.

It is deemed important by the committee that this report should be printed at the earliest practicable day; important to the public interest. In connection with one part of it, it will be remembered that during the recent session, when the deficiency bill was under consideration, I offered two amendments in relation to the proposed appropriation of $400,000 as a deficiency of former appropriations for the Capitol extension. My amendments suspended the disbursement of the proposed appropriation until the 1st day of April, and restored it to the former and usual course of auditing and controlling all expenditures of the public money at the Treasury. Objection was then made to my amendments, upon the ground that they reflected injuriously, and it might be unjustly, upon the characters of the persons who had been intrusted with the duties of managing the work and disbursing the money. I stated at the time that such was not my purpose, but that as charges of gross improprieties against the Architect and others intrusted with these duties had been made, and as the committee were then engaged in an investigation which threatened in its result to sustain those charges, I deemed it due to the public interest that no more money should be given into the same hands for disbursement until the material facts could be ascertained, and duly presented in the form of a report; and further, that as a few weeks more would enable the committee to report the facts, and as no harm could result from the proposed short delay, it was but right that the Executive should have the means at hand to act understandingly, as well as to the mode to be adopted as to the agents to be employed in the prosecution of the work.

My amendments were adopted; and not only is the disbursement of the money restored to the former and usual mode, whereby the safeguards of checks and official responsibility are thrown around it, but it is suspended, and the work along with it, until the 1st of April. That day is near at hand, when the Executive will have to cause the work to begin again, and to determine who shall be intrusted with its management. In the opinion of the committee, their report contains matters important to be known to the Executive to act understandingly in this connection. To serve the public interest generally, and with this view directly, the committee have exerted themselves to make their report at an earlier day. Circumstances of difficulty have delayed them until now. It is now here, and will, I presume, be printed, as is usual with reports. But it is voluminous, and will require some time to be printed in the usual way, in pamphlet form. The purpose, then, with which I have made these remarks, is to connect them with the report; or, rather, to let the report come in as part of my remarks, and by this means authorize and enable our reporters to print it in the official newspapers as part of our debates. In this way, I could get it much earlier in print, and in a form available for the more immediate practical service to the public I believe it capable of rendering. As embodying, therefore, what I would say to the Senate, I propose to read the report.

Mr. BADGER. I object.

Mr. BORLAND. It is not my wish to weary the Senate by reading a document so voluminous as this. I know they would be unwilling to listen to it now. But, for the purpose I have indicated, I would like to begin the reading of it now; and, as is not unusual with Senators when they desire to incorporate certain papers in their speeches, let it be considered as read, and, as part of my remarks, be reported and printed accordingly. If it be the pleasure of the Senate, I will pursue that course.

Mr. BADGER. The difficulty is, it will cost $15 a column to print it.

Mr. BORLAND. In my opinion it is worth a great deal more than that. Not that anything which I could write and offer to the Senate would be worth so much, but as the result of several months' patient investigation, by a committee of this body, of matters important to the public interest and morals, and as the development of facts of an extraordinary character, which should be early known, it is, in my opinion, of far more value than any such amount as we pay for printing the reports of our proceedings. I wish, then, to know if it be the pleasure of the Senate that this "Report of the Select Committee on Frauds, Abuses, &c., appointed under the resolution of the Senate, of August 6, 1852," shall be considered and printed as a part of my remarks?

Mr. MASON. If the Senator will allow me, I think it is a very unusual course to have a report printed as a part of the reported debates of the Senate, and I submit, with very great respect to the Senator, whether, inasmuch as it is unusual, it would be well to adopt it in this instance? I take it for granted that the report, although large, can, at his request of the Superintendent of the Printing, receive unusual attention and care, and be printed in the usual form before the expiration of the session. I presume the Senator has the right, if he thinks proper, to have it printed in the debates of the Senate; but it is an unusual course to pursue, and therefore I take the liberty of making this suggestion to him.

Mr. ADAMS. I would suggest that the usual course is for the committee to make its report. It is then read by the Secretary. Whether it is considered as having been read by the Senator who makes it, or by the Secretary at the desk, it will still be published, not as a part of the debates, it is true, but among the reports.

Mr. BORLAND. Unless a report on any matter goes in as a part of the remarks of the Senator, it is excluded from publication in the debates; and I desire that this report shall be so published. In answer to the Senator from Virginia, I would merely say that I know the course which I propose is unusual, and for that reason I have made the request. The case is an unusual and extraordinary one.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the object which the Senator has in view may be accomplished in this way without compromising at all the practice of the Senate. He has stated certain facts. I think he can incorporate them as a part of his remarks, for which the Senate will be in nowise responsible. If he chooses to use them in that way, and make them a part of his speech, as if he was making an extract from a book, he may accomplish his object without compromitting the practice of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CHASE in the chair.) The Chair will suggest that, strictly, there is nothing before the Senate. The Senator from Arkansas rises to make a report from a Select Committee, but no question is at present before the Senate.

Mr. BORLAND. I have not made the report yet. It is not unusual, and I believe is always permitted, for a Senator when making a report to accompany it by some explanatory remarks.

Mr. BADGER. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator. I was in the Senate at the time we commenced our present system of printing the debates. When it was commenced, it was the custom, when papers were read and reports made, to insert them in the debates. That was immediately decided against, upon the ground that it was not the intention of the Senate to pay for printing as a part of the daily debates of the Senate, those matters which we printed as a part of our documents. Since that time the practice has been entirely discontinued. But I would suggest, independently of this variation from the course of proceeding which has been usual, and which I think should not be departed from unless in cases of extreme necessity, whether the plan proposed by the Senator would not appear in some respects to do an injustice. Suppose the report is printed in the debates: the Senator says there is a large mass of testimony accompanying it. I presume he does not intend to print that in the debates. If he does not, what is the consequence? The conclusions of the committee go out to influence the action of the Executive, without at the same time furnishing the Executive with the evidence upon which they are founded, and enabling him to draw his own conclusions; and that, too, in regard to a report which cannot be considered as unanimous. It seems to me, under these circumstances, the usual course of the Senate ought not to be departed from; and I concur in the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia, that if the Senator from Arkansas will signify to the Superintendent of Printing that it is desirable that the report should be printed immediately, he will take it out of its course, and have it printed without waiting for the ordinary delay.

Mr. BORLAND. For the very reason which the Senator from North Carolina has suggested, I desire to present the whole question to the Senate. I might have gone on and read a portion of the report as a part of my remarks, and it would have been printed, but I should have considered that as taking an advantage of the Senate, and keeping back something which it had a right to know; and for that reason I stated the whole case precisely, as to my object and what would be the effect of it. Now, if it should be the sense of the Senate that it should be done, I would be gratified; but if it is not the sense of the Senate, and they desire otherwise, I am perfectly willing that the document should take the ordinary course, and be printed as the report of the committee. I therefore submit the report, and move that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I will merely remark that the course taken meets my approbation. The Senator from Florida [Mr. MORTON] and myself have only been members of the committee during this called session; and of course so far as the testimony is concerned we had no opportunity of entering into an examination of the witnesses. We, however, have heard a synopsis of the testimony read, and have seen the report, and agree that it should be reported to the Senate, neither concurring in the views taken in the report, nor agreeing to the accuracy of the synopsis. We are willing to let it go out for what it is worth, and come before the Senate in its printed form for any legislative action which the Senate may choose to take upon it. The Senator from Arkansas was perfectly right in saying that we consented to the understanding that the report should go before the country in that way for such future action as the Senate and Congress might desire to take upon it.

Mr. BORLAND. There is no proposition made by the committee. The committee do not recommend any particular legislation upon the subject. The report is only a development of facts, and the opinion of the committee expressed upon those facts, without recommending anything, leaving it of course to the discretion of the Senate to take any action which it thinks proper.

Mr. THOMPSON. Perhaps there is some alteration of the rules of the Senate suggested.

Mr. BORLAND. There is one suggestion as to what it would be well to do, but it is only in the form of a suggestion. There is no resolution offered—no bill reported. It is simply an informal suggestion.

Mr. BADGER. There is nothing for us to concur in.

Mr. BORLAND. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the motion to print include the documents?

Mr. BORLAND. They are a part of the report, in the form of an appendix, and of course are included.

The motion to print was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 18th of January last, calling for further correspondence touching the revolution in France of December, 1851; which was ordered to be printed.

SUPERINTENDENT OF PRINTING.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, which was submitted yesterday:

"Resolved, That the same extra compensation be allowed to the Superintendent of Printing and the clerks and messenger under him, as is paid by the resolution of the Senate to other clerks and messengers of a similar grade."

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to say that by the ordinary legislation of the Senate, we pay to the Librarian and laborers around the Capitol, to our engrossing clerk, and to the clerks of committees, a certain additional compensation. By an omission—for it must have been by an omission, as I can see no other reason for it—the clerks of the Superintendent of the Public Printing of this and of the other House of Congress are overlooked, and they are made a marked case, and set aside as distinct from all the others. Now, I undertake to say that however industrious the clerks may be in this or the other end of the Capitol, there are none who, in the year, will perform more service, or so much service as these. They remain here during the year, and are employed most of the time. Many of the clerks are employed only during the session, and they have got their additional compensation, and all except these have received it. I hope the resolution may pass.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I want to inquire of the Senator from Maine whether these gentlemen have received a pro rata compensation from the House of Representatives.

Mr. HAMLIN. They have received nothing.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I make the inquiry, because sometimes in these cases duplicate compensation is given, the House of Representatives and the Senate both giving additional compensation. The reason why these persons were not embraced in the resolution giving extra compensation to the clerks and other officers of the Senate, was because they were an entirely new class of officers, unknown before. They are officers whose offices have been created since the original resolution was passed. But there is another point. Extra compensation is granted upon the supposition that the clerks have performed long and arduous service. If these clerks have been in service for a long time, it is right to give it; but if they have been in service but a short time it is not right.

Mr. HAMLIN. They have been in service as long as any clerks around the Capitol, clerks of committees or any others, and they will be in service till December next, which is not true of others.

Mr. BADGER. I will suggest to the Senator from Maine, that the phraseology of the resolution should be altered, so that it will be: "That there be allowed and paid under the direction of the Committee to Audit and Control the Public Expenses of the Senate, out of the contingent fund of the Senate the same," &c., and then at the end, "as was paid at the last session."

Mr. HAMLIN. I accept the modification.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have no objection to the resolution, if the Senator from Maine will add:

Provided, It be expressly understood that hereafter no extra compensation shall be given.

I think that the greatest abuse which has grown up here is this extra compensation to all the persons about this Capitol, leading persons to seek for places here just before the close of a session for the purpose of getting the extra compensation, or getting pay which bears no sort of proportion to the service rendered. It is an abuse which is growing up here yearly, and I do hope we will fix the salaries at what they ought to be, and then put an end to this growing enormity, which I believe is more corrupting than any other thing about the Capitol. I hope that the proviso may be added, by way of a notice with respect to the future.

Mr. HAMLIN. I would certainly place these clerks on the same footing as others, and I do not know that any proviso is necessary. They will stand at the end of another session precisely as the other clerks, only they do not come within that class of clerks to which the Senator has alluded. These are clerks that have performed service during the session, and will perform it during the recess.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not make the objection to the clerks particularly who are provided for in the resolution; but the principal reason why I wish to have the proviso adopted is this: Each session we are told we must give the extra compensation this time, but that we will put a stop to the practice hereafter. If the proviso is not now put upon it, we will be next year in precisely the same situation as we have been in before, and we shall be told we must give it now, but we will stop it hereafter. But it never will stop unless some proviso is made giving notice that it will not be paid. I move as an amendment:

Provided, It is distinctly understood, that hereafter no extra compensation of any kind will be allowed to any officer of the Senate, or any person in the employ of the Senate.

Mr. BADGER. We have a committee instructed now, expressly on the motion of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] to make an arrangement of a system of compensation to avoid the extra compensation. I hope, therefore, the Senator will not offer his amendment now.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If that is the case, I will withdraw it.

Mr. PEARCE. What is the salary of the Superintendent of the Public Printing?

Mr. HAMLIN. It is twenty-five hundred dollars.

Mr. PEARCE. He is an officer employed by law, and I suppose his salary is fixed by law. He is not an officer of this House or of the other. I suppose the same is true of his clerks. They are not the peculiar employees of this or the other House.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, they are. They take care of our printing. They do much of what the Printing Committee formerly did.

Mr. PEARCE. I think this practice has gone far enough, and should be stopped.

Mr. STUART. I move to strike out of the resolution the words, "Superintendent of the Public Printing;" thus modifying the resolution so that it shall apply only to the clerks. I have asked about me for some reason why that officer should receive extra pay. I recollect distinctly when this system was adopted in the other House, economy was one of the strongest arguments used there. I believed it myself. But if we are to take the very first opportunity after an officer is created, to increase his pay, we shall make but a sorry exhibition of our effort to carry out our principles of economy. I think you might as well take the President of the United States, and increase his pay by a resolution of the Senate. I confess to you, I see no reason for it whatever, which would not exist in the case of any other officer under this Government, and I certainly cannot vote for it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. It is true that the Superintendent of Printing is an officer whose salary is fixed by law. It is equally true that the Secretary of the Senate is an officer whose salary is fixed by law. It is equally true that the Clerk of the House is an officer whose salary is fixed by law. The Librarian, all the clerks around the Capitol, all the officers in the Senate and House are officers whose salaries are fixed by law; and you have given to them all an additional compensation. The only reason why I would give it to the Superintendent of the Public Printing is, that I would place him upon the same footing with the other officers who are properly officers of Congress. They are not, truly speaking, officers of the Senate, but they are officers of the Senate and House. They superintend our printing; they take care of it; they audit the accounts; they are established for that purpose as much as the Secretary of the Senate is placed here for the purpose of taking care of and making up the records of the Senate. I can see no reason why you should exclude the Superintendent and make a distinction between his case and that of all the rest. I agree with the remarks which have fallen from the Senator from Illinois, and I will most cheerfully concur in fixing the sum which we are to pay to all our officers, and not give any of them increased compensation. But when you have given to all the classes of persons which I have named, I hope my friend from Michigan will not make an invidious distinction against the Superintendent, who, I believe is as meritorious as any of our officers.

Mr. BADGER. We are reduced now, according to the count which I make, to 16 Senators; I therefore move an adjournment.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 23, 1853.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. BADGER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, inquire and report whether the compensation for the expenses of the agent employed to procure and compile the information called for by the resolution of the Senate of March 8, 1851, is payable out of the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the Senate; and if not, how the same should be paid.

PAPER WITHDRAWN.

On motion by Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That Mr. Rossemeyer have leave to withdraw from the papers submitted by him a certificate of a certain contract entered into by him.

EXTRA COMPENSATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, under the direction of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to the Superintendent of Public Printing, and the clerks and messenger under him, the same allowance as was paid to the clerks of the Senate at the last session of Congress.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. STUART to strike out "Superintendent of Public Printing."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BADGER. It now becomes necessary to strike out the word "him" after "under," and insert "Superintendent of Public Printing."

Mr. HAMLIN. I can see no reason why the Librarian and the Secretary of the Senate should be paid, and the Superintendent omitted.

Mr. BADGER. Voluntas sit pro ratione—the will of the Senate makes the reason.

Mr. BADGER's amendment was agreed to, and the resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HAMLIN. The question is now, I suppose, on concurring in the amendment adopted in committee. I wish to say but one word in regard to that. You have paid the Secretary of the Senate, the Librarian, and all your clerks an additional compensation, and now the question which I submit to the Senate is, why shall you exclude the Superintendent of your Public Printing from the rule which you apply to every other officer of the body?

Mr. STUART. The amendment which was agreed to in Committee of the Whole was proposed by me. I agree to what was said by the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] that the whole system of extra compensation is a bad one—a decidedly bad one. But, sir, I thought I could see a distinguishing reason why we should not apply the principle to the Superintendent of Public Printing. He is an officer appointed on the recommendation of the President; an officer over whose appointment neither House of Congress has any control, except in the mode pointed out. The officers named by the Senator from Maine are appointed by one or both Houses of Congress, and this system, bad as it is, has, therefore, a reason in its application to them, but has none whatever to the Superintendent of Printing, as I stated yesterday, no more than to any other officer appointed under the Government. The reason to which I have alluded, applicable to other officers, might, perhaps, be so extended as to apply to the public printer, elected by the vote of both Houses; but you might as well apply it to any officer who is appointed on the nomination of the President as to the Superintendent of Public Printing.

Besides, Mr. President, I do not like the reasoning upon which the thing is founded, to pay an individual because you have paid somebody else. Is the pay of the Superintendent of Public Printing too small? Then increase it permanently. If the system is a bad one, as I think it is, it should not be extended. If it is a good one, it should not be extended beyond the principle which it embraces, and that is to confine it to officers elected or appointed by one or the other or both Houses of Congress. This, sir, it seems to me, ought to be satisfactory.

It was with great reluctance I said anything upon the question at all. I did not intend at this session to say a word upon any question. Especially did I not intend to say anything about the subject of paying out money. But I would conclude by asking the question, and let every Senator apply it to his own case: By what rule of propriety will you pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate an officer appointed on the nomination of the President?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will merely say to my friend from Michigan that some of the officers whom we have already paid by our resolution are nominated to, and confirmed by the Senate before they can occupy their places. I refer to the Librarian and Commissioner of Public Buildings. Still they are properly the officers of the House and Senate. The Librarian takes care of the Congressional Library. The Superintendent of Public Printing is also properly an officer of the House and Senate; and I only insist that we shall not make fish of one and flesh of another.

Mr. ADAMS. I concur with the suggestion made, that these extra allowances are all wrong. I think every officer should be paid a fair compensation for his services. I do not intend now to participate in this debate, for it is too late to do anything with the system on this resolution; but I give notice to the Senate that if I shall live to the commencement of the next session, I will introduce a resolution at an early period instructing the proper committee to inquire into the compensation allowed to the employees of the Senate; and if it is not sufficient in the judgment of the Senate, that they fix by law the amount to which they are entitled. Increase their compensation if it is not enough. I am willing to do that, but I am opposed to the extra compensation. I am willing to pay them what is fair and reasonable. But I shall not oppose this resolution. As the extra compensation is allowed to others, I see no reason why it should not be allowed to the persons mentioned in this resolution.

Mr. BORLAND. As chairman of the Committee on Public Printing, I feel it to be my duty to state to the Senate, that if there are any employees of the Government, who, on account of arduous and important services rendered to us, can in any way be considered entitled to the extra allowance, the Superintendent of Public Printing, his clerks, and messenger are entitled to it. I know the amount of labor which they have to perform. I was astonished when the Superintendent of Public Printing told me that with two clerks and a messenger he could perform the duties required of him. I thought, and so stated at the first session of the last Congress, that it would take six clerks; and I think his reducing them to two, and the amount of labor which I know he performs, which requires all day and sometimes late at night, entitle him and those who assist him, if anybody is entitled, to this extra compensation. There is another circumstance which would make it peculiarly hard as well as invidious to make this distinction against them. The bill which passed at the recent session making appropriation for their compensation failed to receive the signature of the President, and is not a law. They will have to wait until the next session before they can get any compensation for their services at all. It would therefore be very hard to refuse them this allowance. I do hope it will not be done. I will go as far as any Senator, at the next session, to get clear of the system of extra allowance and fix the regular salaries of our employees at a fair rate, and oppose always afterwards any extra compensation; but do not let us begin with this case, and make this invidious distinction.

Mr. BADGER. I was persuaded by the clear and distinct statement made by the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] yesterday, that there was a propriety in striking out "the Superintendent of the Printing" from the proposition to give extra pay, and I consequently voted with him this morning in Committee of the Whole to strike it out; but, sir, I am obliged to say, for truth and candor require it, that the Senators from Maine and Arkansas have satisfied me that I was misled by the plausible statement of the Senator from Michigan, and that the strength of the argument is the other way. The Senator from Maine has shown that we are in the habit of paying extra compensation to two officers who are appointed precisely as the Superintendent of the Public Printing is appointed; and the reason why we have been in the habit of paying them is precisely in full force and operation, as a reason for paying this officer; that is, that they are engaged in discharging duties which properly are connected with the two Houses of Congress. The real difficulty and incongruity, Mr. President, has arisen from this, that Congress by its legislation has given the appointment of the Librarian, of the Superintendent of Public Buildings, and of the Superintendent of their own printing to the President. That is the error. You ought to have retained the appointment of every officer who is concerned in discharging duties in which we alone are primarily interested. But there can be no reason, under the circumstances, why we should except the Superintendent of the Public Printing, after having paid to others standing in precisely the same relation as to the mode of appointment and the duties which they have to discharge towards us; and therefore my attention being called to that fact, I am obliged to say that the honorable Senator from Michigan, I think, will, by persisting in his amendment, be accomplishing what the Senator from Maine says: making fish of one and flesh of another.

But, Mr. President, I did not rise particularly for the purpose of saying this, but just to drop a word in behalf of an expiring system which everybody condemns, but which I really do think is in itself a very good system—that of extra compensation. Why, Mr. President, before we yielded to the influences operating upon us from the other House, and the clamors raised throughout the country, to a certain extra mileage to which we used to be entitled——

Mr. BORLAND. Constructive.

Mr. BADGER. "Constructive" mileage. I wish to know whether any member of the Senate ever found it inconvenient to him to receive that constructive mileage at an extra session?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I never received it.

Mr. BADGER. Here is an honorable Senator who says he never took it. Then he did not find it inconvenient to receive it. [Laughter.] No man can be inconvenienced by receiving a thing which he does not receive; therefore my proposition remains in full force.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the Senator allow me——

Mr. BADGER. I am in the midst of my argument now, and I cannot give way.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Mississippi will help you.

Mr. BADGER. I know he will. He is always right, [laughter;] but I shall prefer at present to go on. We found it convenient to ourselves to receive this mileage. I did, though my amount was small. The honorable Senator from Mississippi found it much more convenient, because his was larger. [Laughter.] I did not grudge him his. I was never for leveling his down, but I would have been always willing to level mine up. [Renewed laughter.] We cannot retain this for ourselves. It is said to be an abominable system with regard to our officers; we are told to raise their salaries to the amount requisite and pay them that, and no more. Now, sir, I think there is something extremely agreeable at the close of the session, when the officers have been serving us with fidelity and attention and kindness, doing everything they could to promote our convenience as Senators, and enable us, by their assiduity and attention, to discharge our public duties with more advantage to ourselves and to the country, and promoting our personal convenience—I say there is something to me exceedingly grateful in this "free-will offering," by which we tell them, beyond the demands of law, "You are to receive this as a testimonial of the estimate in which we hold your assiduous and voluntary service beyond the demands of your official duties." Therefore, sir, I wish merely to pay a testimony of my respect and consideration for a system which is soon to leave nothing but its memory behind.

I would say to the Senator from Mississippi that his resolution at the next session will be entirely unnecessary, for we have already burdened a most laborious and overburdened committee of this body—that is the Committee on Retrenchment, one of the standing committees of the body provided for by our rules, because it is necessary that it should always be in existence and ready to meet the large demands of the public upon its service—by a resolution introduced by the Senator from Virginia, with the duty of producing a scheme of compensation to be adopted at the next session, which will relieve us of what some gentlemen consider a painful necessity, but what I look upon as the agreeable office of voting extra compensation to our officers. Therefore, we have nothing at present to do but simply to pass this resolution, and then the whole system will be broken up, because at the next session, should such be the decided sense of the Senate, we will revise the salaries of the officers and stop the contingencies.

Mr. ADAMS. My object in attempting to interrupt my friend from North Carolina, was to make an acknowledgment to him and other Senators. If I do injustice to any one I always take pleasure in retracting it. Heretofore, I have with most of the country condemned what has been known as constructive mileage; but since I have had the honor of being a member of this body, and experienced during the last six weeks especially, the labor of sitting up here all night when the public interest required it—the labor which we have had to perform here and elsewhere connected with the duties of a Senator, I say now that I acknowledge I have done injustice, and that Senators ought to have the constructive mileage; nay, it ought to be more than it ever has been, [laughter,] and if I had the liberty now, I would take it most conscientiously. [Laughter.]

Mr. BADGER. So would I. [Laughter.]

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was not concurred in.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I offer the following amendment:

Provided, That no extra compensation shall hereafter be allowed to any one out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. BADGER. I hope my friend will not insist on that. What does it signify? Suppose we pass a resolution hereafter to make the allowance, will that control us?

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I am aware that we can override it. But what does the Senator from Arkansas and every other Senator who advocates the resolution say? Just what has been said at every other session: "This is the last time we will make the allowance." I have been made the instrument under which these things have been brought here, under the pressure of men, women, and children; at midnight and daylight I have been dragooned, and bedeviled, and hunted down, until I had to succumb. [Laughter.] You are now taking in everybody connected with the Senate—officers created and appointed by the President as well as the others. You fixed the salary of the Superintendent of the Public Printing, upon your deliberate judgment, at $2,500, the highest price which anybody says should be given for the talents and knowledge which he possesses; and yet you immediately vary the proposition to add to his pay $250 or $300. You have also included the reporters in the list of those to whom you give the extra compensation; and the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate are annoyed day after day to give such a construction to the allowance as will bring in every man who is engaged in cutting stone, or has anything to do on the Capitol extension. It is now extended so far that the whole thing is about to fall by its own weight. My proviso is in the shape of a proclamation to everybody connected with the Senate, that hereafter this thing is to stop, and when the Committee on Retrenchment and Reform, will because it was committed to them, take up the subject at the next session, they will not be put off with the apology that "this is the last time" that the extra allowance shall be made. That is all I ask. I know we can hereafter disregard the proviso. My friend from North Carolina comprehends my motive. He knows I am the last man who would deal illiberally with any of our employees.

Mr. BADGER. I know it, and therefore I will make an appeal to the Senator for the last time [laughter] to withdraw his amendment, not on account of any objection to the principle contained in it, but I think it will place us in rather a ridiculous attitude.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I withdraw it.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I think the amendment ought not to be withdrawn. I do not think it is the last time; I do not believe this is an expiring system.

Mr. BADGER. Oh, yes; it is dead. [Laughter.]
